ey assessed as damages, the deposit was a voluntary payment of the award, whereby the South Portland Improvement Company became immediately entitled thereto, and that the plaintiff, having taken possession of the land and built its railroad thereon, thereby accepted all the benefits that could be obtained from the adjudication and waived its right to appeal therefrom. The plaintiff's counsel, disputing these propositions, maintain that the fundamental law of Oregon, which asserts that "no person's property shall be taken by any corporation, under authority of law, without compensation being first made or secured in such manner as may be prescribed by law" (Const. Or. art. 11, § 4) permits the remuneration for private property when taken for a public use by any corporation to be secured; that the enactments adopted conformable to the superior rule, authorizing such compensation, when assessed by a jury as damages, to be deposited in court, is intended to secure the payment of the award; and that the statute expressly grants to a plaintiff corporation the right to appeal from a judgment appropriating land, and also confers authority to take possession of the premises, notwithstanding a stay of proceedings may have been executed.

The legislative act referred to, so far as deemed involved herein, contains the following clauses: "Upon the payment into court of the damages assessed by the jury, the court shall give judgment appropriating the lands, property, rights, easements, crossing, or connection in question, as the case may be, to the corporation, and thereafter the same shall be the property of such corporation." B. & C. Comp. § 5102. "Either party to the action may appeal from judgment therein, in like manner and like effect as in ordinary cases; but such appeal shall not stay the proceedings so as to prevent such corporation from taking such lands into possession, and using them for the purposes of the corporation, or from proceeding to exercise the right, enjoy the easement, or make the crossing or connection condemned." Id. § 5103. "If a judgment in such action be reversed, and a new trial had, and at such second trial the jury assesses the damages of the defendant at a greater sum than before, the court shall, in addition to the judgment appropriating the land, right, easement, crossing, or connection as provided in section 5102, give judgment in favor of the defendant for such excess." Id. § 5105. "If the defendant accept the damages paid to the clerk, he waives his right of appeal, and if he do not, such sum shall remain in the control of the court, to abide the event of the appeal, and if the defendant or unknown owner of the land do not appear and claim the same, it shall be invested for the benefit of whom it may concern, as in case of unclaimed moneys in the sale and partition of lands." Id. § 5106. In case a judgment of condemnation is reversed and a new trial ordered, the statute makes no provision that judgment shall be given in favor of the plaintiff for the excess of the money which it has paid into court, if, at a subsequent hearing, the jury assess the defendant's damages at a less sum than was awarded to that party at a prior trial. It will be remembered that section 5102, supra, provides that, when the damages assessed in the manner indicated have been paid into court, a judgment shall be given appropriating the lands to the plaintiff corporation, "and thereafter the same shall be the property of such corporation." It would seem from this clause that the right to the land or easement was thus forever transferred. The property, however, is held by a plaintiff corporation so long apparently as the judgment remains unreversed, for a perusal of section 5105, supra, would seem to indicate that, in case a new trial is had, the court is required to give another judgment of condemnation. It would thus appear that, while a party to a judgment may appeal from some specified part thereof (B. & C. Comp. § 549), the questions of law appearing upon the transcript may be reviewed (Id. § 555), and the judgment reversed or modified in the respect mentioned in the notice of appeal, and not otherwise (Id. § 556), and that on a reversal of a judgment of condemnation the cause is remanded for retrial on all the issues. It is quite probable that a recognition of such assumed consequences prompted the plaintiff's counsel to specify in the notice of appeal that a review of the entire judgment was sought, and not that part of it which expressed the measure of damages awarded.

The right to take an appeal from a judgment of condemnation is expressly granted by the legislative assembly to a plaintiff corporation. B. & C. Comp. § 5103. An examination of the clause contained in that section of the statute, "but such appeal shall not stay the proceedings so as to prevent such corporation from taking such lands into possession," etc., would seem to denote that the right of a plaintiff, after securing a judgment of condemnation, to use the lands for the purposes of the corporation, notwithstanding a stay of proceedings, is limited to appeals taken by a party defendant. An undertaking on appeal does not stay the proceedings, unless, in addition to the appellant's stipulation to pay all damages, etc., that may be awarded against him on the appeal, he further engage, if the judgment be for the recovery of the possession of real property, that during his possession thereof he will not commit, or suffer to be committed, any waste thereon, and that, if the judgment or any part thereof be affirmed, he will pay the value of the use and occupation of such property, so far as affirmed, from the time of the appeal until the delivery of the possession thereof. B. & C. Comp. § 550. The section of the statute last mentioned also declares that, to secure a stay of proceedings under a judgment, given for the recovery of money, the undertaking, in addition to the prior stipulations adverted to, must further provide that the appellant will satisfy the judgment, so far as it is affirmed. In the case at bar the judgment given was based upon a recovery of money, the sum of which was paid into court before an appropriation of the land was granted, and the undertaking given by the plaintiff, on the first appeal, contains the necessary stipulations to show that it was designed to prevent the defendants from securing the money so deposited until the appeal could be heard and determined in this court. The undertaking on appeal, specified in section 5103, supra, when executed as a stay of proceedings, was evidently not designed to interdict an appellant in any manner, but to restrain a respondent from taking advantage of the provisions of a judgment. The undertaking mentioned, when given to stay proceedings under a judgment of condemnation, regardless of which a plaintiff corporation may take possession of the land or easement specified, is, in our opinion, the undertaking executed by a party defendant. The only provision made by statute for securing the payment of the award is to be found in section 5106, supra, to the effect that, if the defendant or unknown owner of the land do not appear and claim the money, it shall be invested for his benefit. If section 4 of article 11 of the Constitution is applicable to condemnation proceedings, when instituted by a railway company, the legislative assembly has failed to prescribe the manner whereby the compensation of land taken for a public use may be "secured." In the absence of such enactment, we think a fair construction of the several provisions of the statute quoted warrants the conclusion that when a plaintiff corporation pays into court the damages awarded as the measure of the injury sustained, and thereupon secures a judgment of appropriation, it cannot, after taking possession of the land, prosecute an appeal from the judgment under which the use of the premises for the purposes of the corporation has been secured, though the necessary undertaking for a stay of proceedings may have been given. By voluntarily accepting the benefits of the judgment the plaintiff herein, like any other appellant, waived its right to appeal from the adjudication rendered. Moore v. Floyd, 4 Or. 260; Portland Construction Co. v. O'Neil, 24 Or. 54, 32 Pac. 764; Bush v. Mitchell, 28 Or. 92, 41 Pac. 153; Jacksonville School Dist. v. Crowell, 33 Or. 11, 52 Pac. 693; Moore v. Moores, 36 Or. 261, 59 Pac. 327.

It is unnecessary to consider the second appeal, for, if the first cannot be maintained, the other is equally unavailing.

The motion is therefore allowed, and both appeals will be dismissed.

STATE v. WOLFLEY.

(Supreme Court of Kansas. May 11, 1907.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW—INSTRUCTIONS—CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE.

A conviction upon a criminal charge will not be reversed because of an omission of the trial court to instruct the jury that the facts relied upon to justify a conviction upon circumstantial evidence must be consistent with each other, where no separate request was made with regard to that proposition, and where the court gave an instruction regarding the effect of circumstantial evidence, which was otherwise sufficient.

2. SAME—PRESUMPTION OF INNOCENCE—REASONABLE DOUBT—INSTRUCTION.

An instruction that "the law presumes and you [the jury] must presume him [the defendant] to be innocent of the crime with which he is charged * * * until he is proved guilty beyond a reasonable doubt by competent evidence" sufficiently indicates that the presumption of innocence is an affirmative force, equivalent to so much evidence in his behalf, at least where no request is made for a more specific statement of the proposition, except in connection with other matters.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 14, Criminal Law, §§ 1905-1922.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

On petition for rehearing. Denied.

For former opinion see 89 Pac. 1046.

MASON, J. In a petition for a rehearing the defendant's attorneys have again presented at considerable length and with much force the grounds relied upon for a reversal. These have all been re-examined with care, but the court remains of the opinion that no reversible error has been shown. Some of the contentions to which more specific attention has now been directed perhaps require fuller discussion than they received in the original opinion. It was there said that, although many of the instructions asked in behalf of the defendant were correct statements of the law, no complaint could be made of their refusal, because the charge of the court included everything really necessary to be said on the subjects to which they related. It is now pointed out that the instructions given with regard to circumstantial evidence did not include the statement that the circumstances relied upon to establish the defendant's guilt must all be consistent with each other. The correctness of such statement as a proposition of law of course cannot be questioned. Its truth is so obvious, however, as to make its omission from the charge a matter of doubtful importance under any circumstances. There was nothing in what was said to the jury to suggest that a conviction might be based upon facts that were inconsistent with each other. They were informed in set terms that in order to convict upon circumstantial evidence they must find each essential fact in the chain of circumstances to be true beyond a reasonable doubt. They could not by the evidence be convinced beyond a reasonable doubt of the existence of two separate circumstances or conditions that were inconsistent with each other. A jury may be given credit for knowing this as well before as after it is told to them. It is true that in stating what is essential to a conviction upon circumstantial evidence it is usual to mention the necessity that all the matters relied upon shall be consistent with each other, but this is done ordinarily by way of recital or assumption. The accepted formula is that the facts proved must be not only consistent with each other and with the defendant's guilt, but inconsistent with any other reasonable hypothesis. All reference to the requirement that the facts should be consistent with each other is sometimes omitted, however, doubtless on the theory that it is superfluous. See State v. Asbell, 57 Kan. 398, 411, 46 Pac. 770; State v. Andrews, 62 Kan. 207, 61 Pac. 808; Burrill, Circum. Ev. 737; Blashfield, Instr. to Jur. § 314. We cannot regard its omission in the present case as material error, especially as no separate request was made covering this particular point. In four of the instructions asked with regard to the effect of circumstantial evidence the phrase in question was used, and in five others on the same subject and substantially of the same scope it was omitted. The matter was never presented to the court as an independent proposition.

Complaint is also made that the jury were not sufficiently advised concerning the character and effect of the legal presumption of the defendant's innocence. This presumption amounts to something more than a requirement that the state must take the initiative and prove its case beyond a reasonable doubt. It is tantamount to affirmative evidence, and it is right that the jury should so understand it. Five instructions were asked in which this matter was referred to, but no one of them stopped with the mere statement of the rule. In each there was an admonition to observe it, or a direction how to apply it, that was at least unnecessary, and gave the instruction something of the aspect of an argument for the defendant. The distinction between the presumption of innocence and the requirement that the prosecution shall prove its case beyond a reasonable doubt is fully treated in Coffin v. United States, 156 U. S. 432, 15 Sup. Ct. 394, 39 L. Ed. 481, upon which case the defendant places great reliance. There a conviction was reversed because of the refusal of the trial court to give an instruction reading as follows: "The law presumes that persons charged with crime are innocent until they are proven by competent evidence to be guilty. To the benefit of this presumption the defendants are all entitled, and this presumption stands as their sufficient protection, unless it has been removed by evidence proving their guilt beyond a reasonable doubt."

In the present case the following language was embodied in the charge: "The law presumes and you must presume him [the defendant] to be innocent of the crime with which he is charged, and each and every material ingredient thereof, until he is proved guilty beyond a reasonable doubt by competent evidence; and if the evidence in this case leaves upon the minds of the jury any reasonable doubt of the defendant's guilt, the law makes it your duty to acquit him." This must be regarded as a sufficient indication that the presumption of innocence is a positive force on the side of the defendant, at least in the absence of a request for a more explicit statement of that principle disassociated from other matters. Substantially the same language has been held sufficient, even where a specific request was made to instruct that the presumption had the force of evidence, as in the cases here quoted from: "A still further contention is that the court erred in refusing the eighth instruction asked by defendant. The instruction reads as follows: 'The court instructs the jury that the law presumes the innocence, and not the guilt, of the defendant, and this presumption is to be taken by you as evidence in the defendant's behalf. This presumption of innocence goes with the defendant throughout the trial, and protects him at every stage of the proceedings, entitling him finally to an acquittal at your hands, unless overcome by other evidence which satisfies you of his guilt beyond a reasonable doubt.' It was refused as asked, the words in italics stricken out, and then given. While the presumption of innocence in favor of a defendant upon trial for a criminal offense is a rebuttable presumption, it requires evidence to overcome it, and to show his guilt beyond a reasonable doubt before he can be convicted, yet the calling it evidence adds no significance to its force or effect. After all, it is still a presumption, which the law indulges in his favor. No error was committed, we think, in the refusal of this instruction as asked." State v. Hudspeth, 159 Mo. 178, 209, 80 S. W. 130, 144. "Another instruction refused by the court was as follows: 'The law in this case presumes * * * that every man is innocent, * * * and this legal presumption of innocence is to be regarded by the jury in every case as a matter of evidence to the benefit of which the defendant is entitled.' The judge had already of his own motion charged the jury that 'the law presumes every man innocent until he is proven guilty by proper legal evidence, and if you have any reasonable doubt as to the guilt of the defendant, arising from the evidence, you shall acquit him.' * * * The instruction given was a correct exposition of the law. * * * As to the special language of the instruction asked, that 'this presumption of innocence is to be regarded by the jury in every case as a matter of evidence to the benefit of which the defendant is entitled,' we are of the opinion that there was no error in the failure of the judge to use it. It is true that Mr. Greenleaf uses the same language in one place in section 34, vol. 1, of his work on Evidence, and refers to State v. Pike, 49 N. H. 399, 6 Am. Rep. 533. Considering the whole of section 34 and the New Hampshire case, we see nothing in either that makes the use of the language in question essential or indispensable, nor do we think its use would have strengthened the instruction given. The law presumes, according to all of the authorities, every man innocent of any crime with which he may be charged until and unless the testimony shows beyond a reasonable doubt that he is guilty of it. The charge is in the usual language and is sufficient, and there was consequently no error in the refusal to give the one asked by the defendant's counsel." A. L. Wooten v. State of Florida, 24 Fla. 335, 353, 5 South. 39, 1 L. R. A. 819.

It is contended that the state was permitted to introduce evidence the purpose and effect of which was to suggest to the jury that the defendant had been guilty of other crimes than that for which he was on trial. The court is of the opinion, however, that the evidence was not offered for that purpose, and had no substantial tendency in that direction.

Upon the entire record the defendant appears to have had a fair trial. The petition for a rehearing is denied.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from District Court, Lane County; Chas. E. Lobdell, Judge.

Action by George T. Sparks against H. C. Smeltzer. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Dismissed.

Jno. F. Wood, for plaintiff in error. J. S. Simmons, for defendant in error.

JOHNSTON, C. J. On January 10, 1906, H. C. Smeltzer was awarded a judgment against George T. Sparks and others quieting his title to a tract of land in Lane county. The judgment was based alone on a publication notice. On April 24, 1906, Sparks began this action to vacate that judgment, and his petition contained 14 distinct paragraphs, purporting to state reasons for setting the judgment aside. The sufficiency of the petition was challenged by a demurrer alleging that the facts stated did not constitute a cause of action against Smeltzer. The court overruled the demurrer, and Smeltzer then filed what he termed a "special demurrer," separately attacking 8 paragraphs of the petition on the grounds that they "do not state or tend to state nor partially state any cause of action against the said defendant." A motion was made by Smeltzer to strike the so-called special demurrer from the files, but this was denied, and later the court sustained the demurrer taken separately to the several paragraphs of the petition, and this ruling has been brought here for review. Is the ruling reviewable at this time?

While the petition is divided into a number of paragraphs, it is not contended that each is a separate cause of action, nor that all together constitute more than a single cause of action. On the demurrer addressed to the entire count it was held that a cause of action was stated, and, as we have seen, the special or second demurrer was directed at parts of this cause of action. The demurrer, whatever it may be called, cannot be used to rid a single count of irrelevant, redundant, or improper matter. Under our Code it is hardly accurate to designate demurrers as general or special, as we have no other than the statutory demurrer, and it has no other office than to challenge the sufficiency of pleadings upon one or more of the six specific grounds prescribed by the Code. Mayberry v. Kelly, 1 Kan. 116. Some of the parts of the petition attacked by the misnamed demurrer state inferences of fact and conclusions of law, and some are only argumentative in character, and the evident purpose of the challenge was to eliminate from the petition these impertinent and irrelevant matters. A somewhat similar pleading has been treated as a motion to strike out (Seaton v. Chamberlain, 32 Kan. 239, 4 Pac. 89), and this one may have been so regarded by the trial court; but if it is so treated, the decision of the motion is no more than an intermediate order, which cannot be reviewed prior to the final judgment or decree. Neither is the ruling refusing to strike out the special demurrer open to review at this time.

The proceeding must therefore be dismissed.

GEMMEL v. FLETCHER.

(Supreme Court of Kansas. Jan. 11, 1908.)

On petition for rehearing. Denied.
For former opinion, see 92 Pac. 713.

GRAVES, J. A petition for rehearing has been filed in this case, presenting some matters not discussed in the opinion which we deem proper to consider now.

It is urged that as the undisputed evidence and the findings of the court show that David L. Gemmel paid the original purchase price of $10 an acre for the lands in question, and it does not appear that he has been repaid therefor, he should at least be credited with that amount on the judgment entered against him. As an abstract proposition this statement has great force; but as presented in this case it has another phase. The petition contains a statement of facts claimed to constitute the resulting trust sought to be enforced. The answer of David L. Gemmel rests upon the claim that he is the owner in fee of the land and that no trust of any kind exists in relation thereto in favor of the plaintiff. No suggestion is made in it that he has equitable interests of any kind which ought to be protected. The pleadings, therefore, present no issue under which the parties were called upon to, or could properly, present testimony concerning this or any similar equity. The evidence showing payment of the purchase price of the land by David L. Gemmel was not presented for the purpose of establishing a claim for its recovery, but it necessarily came out as a part of the history of the case. This evidence, and the finding of the court thereon, were therefore immaterial under the issues presented by the pleadings. The plaintiff had no occasion or opportunity to show that this money had been refunded to the defendant, and in the absence of any evidence or issue upon the subject we do not feel at liberty to find that it was not, especially when the evidence offered for other purposes indicates that it may have been and probably was repaid.

When David L. Gemmel promised his dying wife to convey the land to the plaintiff, no suggestion was made by him of any right or claim on account of this purchase money, improvements, or other equity. When, afterwards, plaintiff demanded a conveyance of the land, no claim was then made of this kind; and when confronted with an action to compel performance of his promise, where he was called upon to disclose fully all the rights, legal or equitable, or both, which he claimed to have in the land, no such suggestion was made. It appears that he had means in his possession belonging to his wife out of which he might have paid himself; that he and his wife kept their business matters separate and had accounts against each other. While these circumstances were not deemed sufficient to justify an affirmative finding that this money had been refunded, it indicates what the evidence might have shown if the case had been tried under proper issues. We regard these facts as a suggestion that the order here requested in behalf of the defendant as plain equity might, and probably would, be an injustice to the plaintiff. This situation is due to the failure of the defendant, David L. Gemmel, to plead this matter, so that all the facts relating thereto could be presented to the trial court and the rights of the parties intelligently determined. As the case was presented here, we felt compelled to make the order of affirm-ance as it now stands, and are not satisfied that justice would be subserved by any change therein.

It is urged that the defendant in error could have no standing in equity until he tendered to plaintiff in error an amount equal to the sum invested by him in the land. We do not understand that equity requires a tender where nothing is due. If the plaintiff in error had equities of any kind in the property in controversy, he ought to have so informed the trial court, and sought protection there. This court cannot consider questions outside of the pleadings and proof, and which were not presented by the parties to the district court.

As to the other questions presented by the petition for rehearing, we have nothing to add to what is contained in the opinion heretofore filed.

The petition for rehearing is denied.

O'NEILL v. RISINGER et ux.

(Supreme Court of Kansas. Jan. 11, 1908.)

MINES AND MINERALS—MINING LEASE—FUTURE.

An oil and gas lease, giving the lessee the exclusive right for a term of years to enter upon lands and prospect and procure oil and gas, and providing, in case no well is drilled within six months, all rights and obligations under the lease shall cease and determine, unless the lessee shall elect to continue the lease in force by payment in advance of an annual rental of $1 per acre for all the land, and which contains no covenant, promise, or agreement on the part of the lessee to drill a well, or pay the rental, or do anything, is a mere naked option, and the failure of the lessee to drill a well within six months or to make a payment of rental forfeits the lease.

Error from District Court, Wilson County; L. Stillwell, Judge.

Action by Joseph Risinger and Nellie Risinger against James O'Neill. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant brings error. Reversed and remanded.

John J. Jones and Eugene Mackey, for plaintiff in error. Mikesell & Wilson, for defendants in error.

PORTER, J. On November 2, 1905, Joseph Risinger and wife made and delivered to James O'Neill an oil and gas lease of certain lands in Wilson county of which they were owners. Two of the provisions of the lease are involved in this proceeding. The first reads: "In case no well for oil or gas be drilled on said premises within six months of date hereof, all rights and obligations secured under this contract shall cease and determine, unless the second party shall elect to continue this lease in force as to all of said premises by paying an annual rental of $1 per acre, payable yearly in advance, for all of said premises." The second is as follows: "Provided, however, that the second party shall have the right at any time to terminate this lease, by surrendering this lease, released from records, and shall thereafter be released from all obligations and liabilities under the same." No well for oil or gas was drilled within six months of the date of the lease, nor at any time, and the lessee never paid any rental. In July, 1906, the owners of the lands, who are defendants in error, brought this action to recover from plaintiff in error the sum of $480 for rental of the lands for one year. The petition set up a copy of the lease and alleged that no well for oil or gas was drilled on any of the premises within six months of the date of the lease, nor at any time since, and then alleged that defendant, O'Neill, "elected to retain said premises under the said lease, by failing to surrender the said lease to plaintiffs upon the expiration of the six months within which time a well for oil or gas was to be drilled on said premises." The $480 was alleged to be due, that no part of it had been paid, and that a demand had been made for it and refused. A demurrer to the petition was overruled by the trial court, and defendant, electing to stand upon his demurrer, brings the case here for review.

Plaintiff in error contends that the lease is merely an option, giving him the right to operate thereunder by drilling a well for oil or gas within six months from the date the lease was executed, and that a failure to do this forfeited the lease unless he elected to continue it in force by paying in advance the annual rental of $1 per acre, and that a failure either to drill a well within six months or to pay the rent forfeited the lease and the rights of all parties thereunder. On the other hand, it is the contention of defendants in error that the general provision giving the second party the right to terminate the lease at any time by surrendering it, released from the records, controls, and that the failure of plaintiff in error to surrender the lease under this provision continued it in full force and effect. Defendants in error rely upon the doctrine that a "lessee cannot set up his own default in order to terminate the lease, or escape liability under its provisions." The doctrine contended for is stated in Brown v. Cairns, 63 Kan. 584, 66 Pac. 639, the syllabus of which reads: "Covenants in a lease, providing for its termination upon failure of the lessee to comply with specified conditions, are for the benefit of the lessor only; and the lessee cannot, by a breach of its covenants, abrogate the lease and thus secure advantage from his own default." The doctrine has no application to a lease of this character. It would undoubtedly control if the lease in question contained covenants requiring the lessee to do anything; for instance, if it required the lessee to drill an oil or gas well within a certain period, his failure to perform his covenant could not be taken advantage of by him to declare a forfeiture. But the lease does not bind the lessee to do anything. It is a mere naked option. Under it the control of the premises remains in the grantors. The lessee has the right, if he sees fit, to enter upon the premises and prospect for oil or gas. In case oil or gas is found, the lease provides what shall be done with it, and what the rights and obligations of both parties shall be; but nowhere in the lease does the lessee agree that he will drill a well, or that he will enter upon the premises for any purpose. The absence of any covenant in the lease requiring the lessee to drill a well, or even to enter upon the lands and prospect for oil or gas, or to pay rental for such privileges, creates the distinction between this case and cases like Brown v. Cairns, supra, where the lessee was obliged by the terms of the lease to perform certain things. The lease here being a mere option, the doctrine declared in Brown v. Cairns has no application. If authorities are needed in support of this proposition the following are directly in point: Glasgow v. Chartiers Oil Co., 152 Pa. 48, 25 Atl. 232; Snodgrass v. South Penn Oil Co., 47 W. Va. 509, 35 S. E. 820. The lease in this case provides in plain language that it shall be no longer binding upon either party in case no well be drilled for oil or gas within the first six months, unless the second party shall elect to continue it in force by paying an annual rental per acre. This provision protects the lessor by preventing the property from being tied up indefinitely; for, if the lessee has failed to complete a well within six months, the lessor knows that the lease has expired, unless within that time the lessee has extended it by making payments in advance for one year. The clause in the lease providing that the lessee should have the right at any time to terminate the lease by surrendering it canceled is a general provision, and must be construed in connection with the other clause, which expressly declares that a failure to drill within six months or to pay rent shall terminate the lease. The latter clause does not pretend to exclude the first from becoming operative. It follows that the demurrer to the petition should have been sustained.

The judgment will be reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to sustain the demurrer.

SHELTON v. BORNT et ux.

(Supreme Court of Kansas. Jan. 11, 1908.)

APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR.

In an action for damages for unlawfully removing plaintiff's household goods from a dwelling house into the street, where it is admitted on the trial that under the pleadings plaintiff is not entitled to recover any damages for injury to her property, and it appears that she suffered no physical injury of any kind, and the only claim for damages is based upon mental suffering, fright, humiliation, and disgrace occasioned by the acts of defendant in removing the goods, the judgment will not be reversed for alleged error in sustaining a demurrer to the evidence, since it appears that plaintiff was only entitled to nominal damages.

Porter, J., dissenting.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from District Court, Saline County; R. R. Rees, Judge.

Action by Flora Shelton against L. Bornt and Minnie H. Bornt. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

C. M. Holmquist, for plaintiff in error.
Z. C. Millikin, for defendants in error.

PORTER, J. Flora Shelton brought this action to recover damages for the unlawful acts of the defendants in forcibly depriving her of the possession of two rooms in a dwelling house and in removing therefrom her household goods. The petition set forth that on January 9, 1902, she was in the lawful possession of two rooms in a dwelling house in Salina; that on that date the defendants, with wanton and malicious intent to injure, damage, and humiliate the plaintiff, unlawfully broke into, entered, and took possession of said rooms, and removed therefrom plaintiff's household goods, and pitched them into the street. She sued for $1,000 damages. The case was tried to the court and a jury. At the conclusion of plaintiff's testimony the court sustained a demurrer to the evidence, and this is alleged as error.

The evidence disclosed the following facts: The defendants are husband and wife. The dwelling house in question belonged to the wife; but the husband had some care and control over it, made repairs, and served notices to tenants as agent. Defendants lived in another house on an adjoining lot. In August, 1901, they rented the dwelling house to L. S. Conner, who was to have possession until the following May. On November 30, 1901, Conner rented two of the rooms to plaintiff, and she paid him $6 for the first month. He gave her a receipt, and also a written statement that she was to have the privilege of occupying the rooms on the same terms until March 1, 1902. About January 1st Conner arranged to remove to Missouri. He surrendered his lease and served the following written notice upon plaintiff: "Salina, Kansas, Jan. 4, 1902. Mrs. Shelton: You are hereby notified to vacate the two rooms you now occupy on or before Jan. 7, 1902. Reason why: I no longer occupy building. L. Bornt, Agent. L. S. Conner, Renter." She told Conner she would get out as soon as she could find rooms. On January 7th L. Bornt, as agent, served her with another written notice to leave. On the 9th day of January plaintiff had arranged to vacate the premises and secured another house. She was downtown for the purpose of procuring a dray to remove her goods. During her absence Mr. Bornt took some men and entered the rooms and began to remove her household goods and to place them in the street. When she returned and found the men removing her goods in this manner, she was frightened and went downtown and complained to the county attorney and to the mayor. She returned to the house, and found both defendants there, and inquired if she could go in and get some of her property, which was missing. The husband, in the presence of the wife, informed her that the house was locked to her. The wife said: "You had better let her in." She secured the rest of her goods, and soon afterwards they were loaded upon a dray and taken to her new quarters. The evidence showed that the weather was clear, and that the damages, if any, to the property, were trifling. No act of assault or violence was offered to plaintiff or any member of her family. In fact, there is no allegation in the petition of any damages to plaintiff's person or property.

During the trial the following admission was made by plaintiff: "It was conceded by the plaintiff on the trial of this cause that her amended petition did not entitle her to any recovery of damage on account of the injury, if any, to her property, and that she based her right of recovery upon alleged trespass upon her personal rights, and not upon her property rights." The purpose or object of the foregoing admission on the part of plaintiff's attorney is inexplicable, except upon the theory that the petition failed to allege that the person or property of plaintiff was injured. In view of this admission that there was no damage sustained to property, and the fact that the evidence shows that plaintiff suffered no physical injury, there remained nothing upon which to base a claim of damages, except mental suffering caused by the humiliation and disgrace which would naturally follow from having one's household goods emptied into the street. The rule adopted by this court years ago, and followed in numerous cases, denies recovery for injuries caused by mental pain, anguish, or humiliation, except when accompanied by some physical injury to the person. City of Salina v. Trosper, 27 Kan. 544; West v. Telegraph Co., 39 Kan. 93, 17 Pac. 807, 7 Am. St. Rep. 530; A. T. & S. F. R. Co. v. McGinnis, 46 Kan. 109, 28 Pac. 453; Railroad Co. v. Dalton, 65 Kan. 661, 70 Pac. 645; Manser v. Collins, 69 Kan. 290, 76 Pac. 851. It becomes, therefore, unnecessary to look further into the record for alleged error, because, in case we were to determine that the court erred in sustaining the demurrer, the judgment must nevertheless be affirmed, on the ground that nothing but nominal damages were shown.

The judgment will be affirmed.

JOHNSTON, C. J., and BURCH, MASON, SMITH, GRAVES, and BENSON, JJ., concurring.

PORTER, J. (dissenting). I am unable to concur in the doctrine that damages may never be recovered for mental suffering, except as an incident to some physical injury or damage to the person. This is the general rule as applied to cases of negligence, for two sufficient reasons: (1) Such damages are regarded as too remote to justify recovery in cases of negligence, because they could not reasonably be anticipated to result from the accidental or unusual combination of circumstances. (2) The law looks with disfavor upon them, because the proof of their existence lies often wholly within the breast of the one who claims to have suffered, and their allowance would open the door to fraud. I have no quarrel with the rule as applied to cases arising out of negligence, but the reasons suggested for the rule have no application to a case of willful tort. The authorities quite generally agree that in a case like the present the plaintiff would be entitled to recover for disgrace and humiliation suffered by having her family and household goods put into the street, provided she first show that some physical damage was sustained by her. Moyer et al. v. Gordon, 113 Ind. 282, 288, 14 N. E. 476; Kimball v. Holmes, 60 N. H. 163. And the courts which refuse to uphold damage for mental suffering unaccompanied by injury to the person allow such damages when very slight or trivial injury to the person is shown. In my opinion the rule has no application to a case where the defendant, taking the law into his own hands, has committed a willful tort, and the injuries are the direct and proximate result of his willful wrong.

In support of this doctrine see the case of Williams v. Underhill, 63 App. Div. 223, 71 N. Y. Supp. 291. The opinion recognizes the rule, laid down in Mitchell v. Rochester Railway Co., 151 N. Y. 107, 45 N. E. 354, 34 L. R. A. 781, 56 Am. St. Rep. 604, that in an action to recover damages for alleged negligence, where the only injury resulting was fright and excitement producing a miscarriage and consequent illness, and the right to recover was denied, but says: "No such rule of proximate damages is applicable to actions to recover damages for willful tort. * * * The reason for limiting liability in actions for negligence is founded in the principle of law governing such actions, viz., that the measure of damage shall be confined to the natural and probable consequences of the act or omission constituting the cause of action. The distinction between such a case and one founded upon a willful tort, such as assault, is very clear." One of the authorities cited is the case of Preiser v. Wielandt, 48 App. Div. 569, 62 N. Y. Supp. 890. That was a case where a landlord had notified plaintiff to vacate certain premises, and was informed by plaintiff that his wife was sick and unable to leave her bed without danger. A few days afterward defendant's workmen commenced tearing down the house, which created a noise and caused plaintiff's wife to become excited and hysterical. Plaintiff removed his wife the next day, and her death resulted from the sickness a few days later. It was held that defendant was liable, although deceased suffered no immediate physical injury, and her death was due solely to fright and excitement. In the opinion in that case it is said: "The defendants had ample remedy by legal process for their summary removal, and, so far as the assault upon the house was designed to accomplish that removal by force, the act was wrongful and unjustified." The opinion further says: "The point is raised, however, by the respondents, that under the decision in Mitchell v. Railway Co., 151 N. Y. 107, 45 N. E. 354, 34 L. R. A. 781, 58 Am. St. Rep. 604, there can be no recovery, because there was no actual, immediate, personal injury suffered by Mrs. Preiser, and her miscarriage and death were due solely to fright and excitement. The case referred to has no application to this one. It applies only to actions based on negligence, and not to cases of willful tort. In that case it was held that no recovery could be had for mere fright occasioned by negligence, and as no action would lie for the fright alone, it necessarily followed that none could be maintained merely because the fright was followed by serious consequences. If the act complained of was not in itself actionable, the gravity of the consequences would not make it so. In this case, however, the act of the defendants was in itself wrongful. It was a willful and violent trespass upon the plaintiff's house, for which an action will lie; and if the death of the plaintiff's wife can be clearly and directly traced to it, as a natural and necessary consequence which they might or should have reasonably anticipated, the defendants are liable, even although no actual blow was struck in the course of the destruction of the building. The defendants knew her condition, and the risk to her which was involved in their contemplated act; and it would be ridiculous to say that, without the shadow of a right, they could tear the house down from over her head, with no liability for the consequences unless she chanced to be hit by a falling beam."

After we have said, in the language of Mr. Chief Justice Johnston in the case of Wilson et al. v. Campbell, 75 Kan. 159, 88 Pac. 548, 8 L. R. A. (N. S.) 426, followed in Whitney et al. v. Brown et al., 75 Kan. 678, 90 Pac. 277, that "the court rightly told the jury that not even an owner has a right to forcibly take real estate from the peaceable possession of another, no matter how justly he may be entitled to it, and that if Campbell was in the peaceable possession of the premises, and Wilson's men entered the premises when the doors were locked and removed his goods during his absence and against his will, and while his possession continued, it would constitute a forcible entry under the law of this state," I am unwilling to say to the landlords of the state: "You may take forcible possession of your real estate in the absence of the tenant holding over, you may dispossess his family and turn them into the street with no fear of being held liable for damages, provided that in so doing you take care not to injure his person. You are justified in taking the law into your own hands, and, no matter how much fright, humiliation, and disgrace your acts may occasion to the person or family of the dispossessed tenant, you will not be liable therefor in an action for damages, unless the tenant prove that he suffered some physical injury." It is said in 13 Cyc. 45: "In the absence of personal injury or aggravating circumstances, a party is not entitled to recover damages for mental anguish in connection with injury done to his property; but where the acts complained of are willful and wanton, and the element of malice is apparent, the courts have been inclined to allow damages for injured feelings."

Plaintiff in this case was not a trespasser, and, while she had been served with notice to quit, her refusal to leave the premises had not been persisted in for such a length of time as to make an aggravated case of holding over, or to furnish excuse for extreme measures on the part of the landlord. She had certain rights, including the right not to be forcibly and unlawfully dispossessed. The law furnished the defendants ample remedies, and I think the evidence shows such a willful tort on their part as to warrant the allowance of substantial damages for the humiliation and disgrace suffered by plaintiff, and which resulted directly from their willful and wrongful acts.

HARPER v. IOLA PORTLAND CEMENT CO. et al.

(Supreme Court of Kansas. Jan. 11, 1908.)

On petition for rehearing. Denied.

For former opinion, see 93 Pac. 179.

PER CURIAM. In a petition for a rehearing it is pointed out that the record is open to the interpretation that it was an unexploded charge of a "pop hole" which injured the plaintiff. Apparently this is true; but the fact does not affect the decision of the cause or the validity of the opinion rendered.

The plaintiff testified as follows: "Q. I will ask you to state what the rule of the company was at the time you was injured, or previous to that time, and within a short time previous to that time, with reference to finding out whether or not the pop shots that were loaded had exploded. If there was any rule, state that rule. A. Yes, sir; there was a rule of that, that they should find how many they had loaded to see that they all had went. Q. Who should do that? A. Why, the foreman; that was his place to see they all went. Q. Did the shooter have anything to do about the matter? Who counted them when they went, or who repeated the number? A. The man counted them; and then the foreman counted them, too. Q. What man? A. The one that done the shooting, and then he would come back there and look. Q. Did the same man do the loading and the shooting? A. Yes, sir. Q. Then the rule, as I understand you, was this: That the man who loaded the holes also shot the holes? A. Yes, sir. Q. It was his duty to count the number he loaded? A. Yes, sir. Q. Who counted the number that were shot? A. Why, then the foreman counted them, too. Q. He and the foreman both counted the number of shots? A. Yes, sir. Q. Then suppose a load hadn't gone? A. Well, then he would go back, and hunt it, and shoot it. Q. Who? A. The one that does the shooting. He put something there if they didn't wait to shoot it, so they would know there was a loaded hole there. Q. It was the duty of the shooter to mark it, if he could not shoot it? A. If it was too late, he would tell him he could not shoot it, and he would mark it, and tell them there was a loaded hole such a place—them that was working there by it. Q. From whom would the shooter get his instructions with reference to his duty? A. From the foreman of the quarry. Q. At the time you was injured I will ask you to state whether or not you had any knowledge of any notice that the rock you were drilling upon was loaded. A. No, sir. Q. Did you know of any way of finding out or of telling that rock was loaded? A. No, sir; I had no way of finding out. It looked like any of the rest of them. * * * Q. The rock you drilled—I will ask you to state whether or not, in drilling the rock where you was hurt, you noticed or could tell, from the way it drilled, that it had been drilled before? A. No, sir; could not tell any difference. Q. Was there anything about the location of the rock, or the consistency of it, or the surroundings, that suggest to you, or from which you could tell, that the rock had been drilled? A. No, sir. Q. Was there anything from which you was able to tell that the rock had been loaded? A. No, sir."

The assumption in the petition for rehearing that this position was abandoned upon cross-examination is unsupported by the record. The plaintiff was not cross-examined upon the defendant's duty to mark unshot holes and warn workmen of them, and in respect to the counting of shots he testified on cross-examination as follows: "Q. Whose duty was it to count the shots? A. It was the foreman's duty to count them. He counted them while I was shooting. Q. That is what you are testifying about? A. Yes, sir. Q. Mr. Bliss was your foreman then? A. Yes, sir; I counted them, and I worked under Lang. He quit after that, and Lang was foreman. Q. Did you count them for Lang? A. He asked me how many holes I had drilled—I had loaded; and I told him I had so many holes to shoot. Q. When he wasn't there, would you shoot them off? A. He was always there. You had to shoot before 9 o'clock, and he would come around and tell me in time, and ask me how many holes I had. Q. He always did that? A. Yes, sir."

A witness, Hardie Jones, testified that it was the duty of the man who did the shooting to count the shots, locate the holes that missed, and afterward shoot them, and that the shooter worked under the direction of the quarry foreman. This evidence supports the contention of the plaintiff in respect to the duty resting upon the defendant. It does not lie with the defendant cavalierly to waive the plaintiff's evidence out of the case by saying he "undertook to concoct some rule or regulation established by and to be personally carried out" by the quarry foreman. In this state it is the province of the jury to weigh evidence and to pass upon the credibility of witnesses.

In the petition for rehearing the following question is asked: "Suppose plaintiff's own statement was true, that defendant promised to repair the lights, but without such repair the plaintiff with full knowledge goes to work; does he not assume the risk of working with the lights as they are?" A full answer may be found in the case of K. C., M. & O. Ry. Co. v. Loosley (Kan.) 90 Pac. 990.

All other matters presented by the petition for a rehearing are fully covered by the original opinion, which proceeds upon principles of law long settled in this state and in full accord with justice and right between employers of labor and laborers, who must be furnished a reasonably safe place in which to work.

The petition for a rehearing is denied.

SCHIAFFER v. GOLD CORD MINING CO.
(Supreme Court of Montana. Jan. 18, 1908.)

1. JUDGMENT—DEFAULT—SETTING ASIDE—AFFIDAVITS ON APPLICATION.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 774, giving courts power to relieve against default judgments "in furtherance of justice," a party must support his application to open a default by an affidavit of merits, or tender a copy of his proposed answer.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 30, Judgment, § 311.]

2. SAME.

An affidavit that a corporation against which judgment was entered fully and fairly stated the case to counsel by its president, and that it had a good defense, not being a statement of the facts relied on, did not authorize the opening of the default.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 30, Judgment, §§ 312, 313.]

3. SAME—NATURE OF REMEDY.

A default judgment will not be opened to allow a demurrer to be interposed.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 30, Judgment, §§ 249, 292-295.]

Appeal from District Court, Lewis and Clark County; J. M. Clements, Judge.

Action by Hulda Schaefer against the Gold Cord Mining Company. From a default judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a motion to set the judgment aside, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

In December, 1906, this action was commenced in the district court of Lewis and Clark county by filing a complaint and having a summons issued. Service of summons was made upon the defendant on February 14, 1907, by delivering to an officer of the defendant a copy of the summons together with a copy of the complaint. The return of the sheriff, made on the last-mentioned date, however, recited that such service had been made by delivering to the president of the defendant company a copy of the summons. On March 1st the sheriff made application to the judge of the district court for permission to withdraw the summons from the files and correct the return to conform to the facts, and, such permission having been granted, an amended return was indorsed upon the summons, which recites that service of summons was made by delivering to the secretary of the company a copy of the summons together with a copy of the complaint. On March 9, 1907, the plaintiff had the default of the defendant entered for failure to appear and answer or demur, and a judgment was thereupon rendered and entered in favor of the plaintiff for the relief demanded in the complaint. On April 5th the defendant moved the court to vacate the judgment, set aside the default, and permit the defendant to "appear, answer, or demur to the complaint." The ground of the motion was that the sheriff's return had been amended without notice to the defendant, that the defendant had relied upon the defective return first made, and had not appeared in the action within the time allowed by law. This motion was supported by an affidavit of counsel for defendant showing the principal facts set forth above, and which affidavit also recites: "That deponent further says that on or about the 16th day of February, 1907, as aforesaid, E. A. Wetmore, Esq., the president of the said defendant corporation, fully and fairly stated the case in this cause to the undersigned, its counsel, of Helena, Mont., and after such statement was advised by them that the defendant corporation had a good and substantial defense on the merits of the action, and that deponent verily believes the same to be true, and this deponent says that said defendant has a good and meritorious defense to said action." Upon consideration, this motion was denied, and defendant appealed from the judgment and from the order denying its motion.

Henry R. Thompson, for appellant. C. E. Pew, for respondent.

HOLLOWAY, J. (after stating the facts as above). It may be said to be the settled doctrine in this state that in an instance of this character, where a party defendant in default applies to the court to have the default set aside, he must, in addition to excusing his default, support his application by an affidavit of merits setting forth the facts constituting his defense, or tender with his motion and affidavit a copy of his proposed answer. Donnelly v. Clark, 6 Mont. 135, 9 Pac. 887; Bowen v. Webb, 34 Mont. 61, 85 Pac. 739. And there is good reason for this rule. A court would not be justified in setting aside a judgment manifestly just. In order to move the court the defendant must make it appear prima facie that the action sought is in the interest of justice; for section 774 of the Code of Civil Procedure gives to the court power to relieve against a judgment entered by default, only when such relief is in furtherance of justice, and it is from such affidavit of merits, or proposed answer, that the trial court is to determine whether the defendant has prima facie a defense upon the merits. The statement in the affidavit filed in this instance, that the defendant, by its president, "fully and fairly stated the case in this cause to the undersigned, * * * and this deponent says that said defendant has a good and meritorious defense to said action," is not a statement of facts, and could not enlighten the court upon the subject of the defense intended to be made. Indeed, the defendant did not ask to be permitted to answer the complaint, but did ask to have the default set aside, and that it be permitted to answer or demur. Courts do not open defaults in order to allow demurrers to be interposed. Bowen v. Webb, supra.

While there is also an appeal from the judgment, no contention is made that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. Appellant's brief is devoted exclusively to a consideration of the appeal from the order.

In the absence of an affidavit of merits setting forth the facts constituting the defendant's defense, or a copy of the answer proposed, the district court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to set aside the default, and the judgment and order are therefore affirmed.

Affirmed.

HILL et al. v. ELLINGHOUSE et al.

(Supreme Court of Montana. Jan. 25, 1908.)

1. NEW TRIAL—MOTION—AFFIDAVITS—FILING—TIME.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1173, allows 10 days after notice of motion for a new trial in which to prepare, serve, and file the evidence, statement, etc. A finding and decision having been filed August 30, 1905, on September 6th a written stipulation was made that either party might have 30 days "additional" time in which to give notice of intention to move for a new trial, and 90 days "additional" time in which to prepare, serve, and file affidavits, bills of exception, or statements in support of the motion. Appellant gave notice of motion for a new trial October 7th, and all the affidavits were filed January 3, 1906. Held, that appellant was entitled to 30 days in addition to the 4 days of the 10-day period not yet expired when the stipulation was made in which to serve notice of motion for a new trial, and that the 90 days stipulated for in which to file affidavits, bills of exception, or statements, etc., in support of the motion, began to run on the expiration of 10 days after the service of notice, and hence the affidavits were filed in time.

2. SAME—SURPRISE.

A motion for a new trial for surprise will be granted only when it is clearly shown that petitioner was actually surprised, that the facts from which the surprise resulted had a material bearing on the case, that the verdict resulted mainly therefrom, and that applicant was not negligent, but that he acted promptly, exercising every means reasonably available to remedy the condition, and that the result of a new trial would probably be different.

3. SAME—AFFIDAVITS.

On an application for a new trial for surprise at the testimony of certain witnesses as to the priority of petitioner's right to certain water, he testified that when he talked with the witnesses they stated that when his predecessor in interest was deprived of the water which petitioner claimed "he went and took it," while on the stand the witnesses testified instead that he recognized the rights of others to priority. It did not appear that the finding against petitioner was based on the testimony of such witness, and it was also shown that there were many other witnesses found after the trial who could furnish the evidence petitioner desired. He made no application for a continuance at the trial, nor to have the case reopened until the filing of the motion for a new trial. Held, that the application was properly denied.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 37, New Trial, §§ 181-183.]

4. APPEAL—NEW TRIAL—REVIEW—RECORD.

Where, on appeal from an order denying an application for a new trial because of surprise, the evidence given at the trial was not in the record, the Supreme Court could not say that certain newly discovered evidence would change the result.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, § 2946.]

Appeal from District Court, Madison County; Geo. B. Winston, Judge.

Action by Charles C. Hill and others against Fred. Ellinghouse and others. A decree was rendered in favor of plaintiffs, and an order was entered denying the motion of defendant Alex. McKay for a new trial for surprise, and he appeals. Affirmed.

E. B. Howell, for appellants. E. J. Callaway and Word & Word, for respondents.

BRANTLY, C. J. This action was brought to obtain a decree adjudicating the respective rights of the parties plaintiff and defendant against each other and among themselves, to the use of the waters flowing in Indian creek, a tributary of Ruby river, in Madison county. Each of the 11 plaintiffs claims separate rights, though they were represented by a single attorney. The 8 defendants were represented by the same attorneys, though each filed a separate answer. From this condition of affairs it would seem that the parties plaintiff and defendant made common cause against each other, but, as among themselves, proceeded upon the theory that their respective interests were not conflicting. In any event, the trial resulted in findings of fact and conclusions of law upon each right involved, as to the date of appropriation, the amount thereof, the character of the beneficial use, etc., and a decree was entered accordingly.

The defendant McKay (appellant) is the owner of certain lands situate on Mill creek, another tributary of Ruby river. He also owns a flouring mill, situate on the same stream, which is propelled by water power. It seems that the water diverted by him through his mill ditch, and for the irrigation of his lands on Mill creek, does not, after its release, return to Indian creek, but flows into the channel of Mill creek. The issue at the trial, so far as appellant is concerned, was whether the right asserted by him through his mill ditch was superior to the rights of the other claimants during the season of the year when irrigation was necessary for farming purposes, or whether it was available only during the other portions of the year. The appellant claims as the successor in interest of one Hall, now dead, who, with others, built the mill and constructed the ditch in 1866. The court found that "it was the intention of those who built the mill ditch and appropriated the waters of Indian creek thereby to use the waters for mill and power purposes when the waters of Indian creek were not needed for irrigation purposes." It was accordingly adjudged that the defendant's use must be confined to the autumn, winter, and early spring months, when the "waters of Indian creek are not required for the proper irrigation of lands." This defendant has appealed from an order denying his motion for a new trial. The ground of his motion was surprise, in that two witnesses, introduced by him to establish his right, made statements at the trial directly contrary to what they had induced him to believe they would make when he had interviewed them to ascertain what their testimony would be touching his right. His affidavit in support of the motion states, in substance, that he was charged by his counsel with the duty of finding and producing witnesses in support of his water right through his mill ditch; that in performance of this duty he questioned witnesses John Hatfield and William Fern as to the use of the water in the mill during the time Hall was one of the owners of it; that he questioned them fully, but neither of them disclosed to him any fact or information tending to impair the superiority of his right during Hall's ownership, or tending to show that Hall ever recognized any right in Indian creek superior to the mill ditch right; that, on the contrary, Hatfield, when questioned by affiant as to the conduct of Hall when the farmers without his consent diverted the water from the mill ditch, told him that Hall "went and took it," meaning and intending that affiant should understand thereby that Hatfield would testify that under such circumstances Hall reclaimed the water, thus asserting the superior right of the mill ditch; that, relying upon the information so given him by Hatfield and Ferm, and believing that they had fully stated the facts to which they would testify, affiant called them to testify in his behalf, and took no steps to secure testimony from other witnesses to establish the facts; that Hatfield testified upon the trial directly contrary to what he had informed affiant prior to the trial, by saying that Hall had an understanding with the farmers below the head of his ditch that when they wanted the water they could take it and shut the mill down, that the farmers took the water whether it was needed for the mill or not, that this arrangement was the result of a bargain, made about the year 1868 with one Bateman and sundry other persons; that William Ferm testified that Hall had obtained permission from certain unnamed persons to build the mill ditch with the understanding that when they needed the water it was to be returned to them; that Ferm, being called by plaintiffs as their own witness in rebuttal, testified positively that Hall had told the witness that he used the water from Indian creek with the consent of the people living along the stream below; that both these witnesses constantly associated with the plaintiffs and their witnesses; and, upon information and belief, he charges that their testimony at the trial was the result of collusion with plaintiffs. It is further alleged that if a new trial should be granted, the appellant can produce six witnesses, naming them, whose testimony will show that Hall, his predecessor, always possessed and asserted the right to the use of the mill ditch, to the exclusion of all other rights below the mouth of that ditch. The affidavits of these witnesses were also used in support of the motion, and, generally, support the Hall right, as claimed by the appellant. The plaintiffs filed no counter affidavits, and hence the statements of the appellant, so far as they are statements of fact, are not controverted.

Do the facts stated make out a case upon which the court should, in its discretion, have granted a new trial? Before proceeding to a determination of this question, however, it is necessary to notice a question of practice, arising upon an objection to the consideration of the affidavits, that they were filed out of time. The findings and decision in the case were filed on August 30, 1905. Of this fact the parties all seem to have had notice. On September 6th the parties, by their attorneys, entered into a stipulation in writing that any one, either of the plaintiffs or defendants, who might be dissatisfied with the decision, might have 30 days "additional" time in which to give his notice of intention to move for a new trial, and also 90 days "additional" time in which to "prepare, serve, and file" affidavits, bills of exception, or statements in support of his motion for a new trial, in case he desired to make such motion. Notice of intention was given by appellant on October 7th. The affidavits were all filed on January 3, 1906. On the hearing of the motion objection was made that under the terms of the stipulation the affidavits should have been filed within 90 days after September 20th; in other words, since the stipulation was made on September 6th, four days before the time for giving notice had expired (Code Civ. Proc. § 1173), the 90 days stipulated for should be computed from the 10th day after the expiration of this period, or from September 20th. The statute, however (section 1173, supra, subd. 1), allows 10 days after the notice is given in which to prepare, serve, and file the affidavits, statement, etc., in support of the motion. Since this is so, the 90 days stipulated for this purpose clearly began to run on the expiration of 10 days after the service of notice, else the term "additional," used in the stipulation, can have no significance. The effect of the use of this term in the stipulation extending the time for giving notice (supposing that an extension of time for the giving of this notice may lawfully be made), was to allow 30 days besides the 4 days of the 10-day period not yet expired. It was so construed by the parties, and properly so (Emeric v. Alvarado, 64 Cal. 529, 2 Pac. 418); for there can be no addition where there is not something to which it may be made. The same rule must apply to both extensions.

Coming now to the merits of the motion, it is the general rule that a new trial will be granted on the ground of surprise, only when it is clearly shown that the movant was actually surprised, that the facts from which the surprise resulted had a material bearing on the case, that the verdict or decision resulted mainly from these facts, that the alleged condition is not the result of movant's own inattention or negligence, that he has acted promptly and claimed relief at the earliest opportunity, that he has used every means reasonably available at the time of the surprise to remedy the disaster, and that the result of a new trial will probably be different. O'Donnell v. Bennett, 12 Mont. 242, 29 Pac. 1044; Schellhous v. Ball, 29 Cal. 605; Doyle v. Sturla, 38 Cal. 456; Chicago & Great Eastern Ry. Co. v. Vosburgh, 45 Ill. 311; Hull v. Minneapolis St. Ry. Co., 64 Minn. 402, 67 N. W. 218; Spelling on New Trial & Appellate Practice, § 201; 14 Ency. Pleading & Practice, 723. If at the time the condition arises the party can make use of other evidence at hand, or can avoid the threatened disaster by securing a continuance, or by submitting to a nonsuit, he must do so; and not only so, but, after these means have failed, he must by his showing make it clear that his allegation is not a mere pretense to cover his own lack of diligence. As was said in Schellhaus v. Bail, supra: "It is the duty of the courts to look upon applications for new trials upon the ground of surprise with suspicion, for the reason that from the nature of the case surprise may be often feigned and pretended, and the opposite party may be unable to show that such is the case. Hence the party alleging surprise should be required to show it conclusively, and by the most satisfactory evidence within his reach." In Chicago & Great Eastern Ry. Co. v. Vosburgh, supra, the court said: "In applications for new trials on such ground it is not only necessary that the party should have been surprised, but that it was in a matter material to the issue, and that it produced injury to the party; that it was not the consequence of neglect or inattention on the part of the party surprised; also that he used all reasonable efforts to overcome the evidence which worked the surprise, or that it was not within his power to have done so by the employment of reasonable diligence." Applying this rule to the appellant's affidavit, we find that it is insufficient in several particulars. It does not appear therefrom, except by way of conclusion of the affiant, what inquiry appellant made of the witnesses whose conduct is complained of; nor does it appear, except in the same way, what they told him they would testify to. Except the statement of Hatfield that Hall said he "went and took it," referring to the water, we have but the conclusion of the appellant as to what the purport of the statements to him by the witnesses were. They may have had the purport and evidentiary value assigned to them by the appellant, but that this is true we cannot say, because the details of them are not before us. The evidence heard by the trial court is not before us. Therefore we cannot say, except from the statements in the affidavit, that the court based its findings as to the mill ditch mainly upon their testimony. So far as we know, there may have been other evidence in the case, and sufficient to justify the finding, even if the witnesses had testified as appellant supposed they would. For while we may infer from the affidavit that they were the only witnesses called by appellant, there is no positive statement that such was the case, or that they were the only witnesses who testified as to the mill ditch. From the affidavit, as a whole, coupled with the fact that many other witnesses were found after the trial was over who could furnish the desired evidence, we think the inference permissible that the appellant was negligent in the search for evidence to sustain his contention prior to the trial, and that the judge who decided the motion thought so.

There is a total want of any showing of prompt action and diligence on the part of the appellant in his effort to avoid the result of his alleged surprise at the testimony, when it came out. He made no application for a continuance. He did not call the attention of counsel to the matter; nor was it called to the attention of the court. It does not appear that he did not have other evidence at hand or within reach which would have been available. In fact, so far as we can judge, he sat silent during the trial, and, though the cause was tried by the court sitting without a jury, and it was held under advisement from June 4th, the date of the trial, until August 30th, the appellant made no application to have the cause reopened, but still remained silent, thinking, no doubt, that the result would be satisfactory. Evidently the surprise upon which he relies is the surprise at the result, rather than at anything that occurred during the trial. A consideration, which is conclusive, however, is that it is not at all apparent that there is any probability that the result reached by the trial judge would be different if a new trial were granted. As stated above, the evidence is not before us, and though it may be conceded that the new witnesses whose affidavits are embodied in the record would testify as they allege, in the absence of the evidence, we cannot say that a different result would probably be reached.

We are of the opinion that no abuse of discretion is shown, and that the order denying a new trial should be affirmed. It is so ordered.

WHITE et al. v. BARLING.

(Supreme Court of Montana. Jan. 25, 1908.)

1. APPEAL—REVIEW—NEW TRIAL.

An order granting a motion for a new trial, which does not specify the particular ground on which it was granted, will be approved on appeal, if it was justified on any one or more of the grounds of the motion.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, §§ 3404-3427.]

2. SAME.

A motion for a new trial, on the ground that the findings are not supported by the evidence, is addressed to the sound legal discretion of the trial court, and its order will not be disturbed, except in a case of manifest abuse of such discretion.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, §§ 3871-3873.]

3. NEW TRIAL—FINDINGS NOT SUPPORTED BY EVIDENCE.

It is the duty of the trial court to set aside a finding against which it concludes that the evidence preponderates.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 37, New Trial, §§ 135-149.]

4. EQUITY—NEW TRIAL—MODIFICATION OF FINDINGS—CONTROL BY COURT.

A litigant, in an equity case, may move for a modification of a finding, or for a new trial, and the court may not dictate the method to be pursued.

5. NEW TRIAL—DISCRETION OF COURT—VIEW BY JURY.

Where, in an action to determine water rights, one of the questions was the capacity of plaintiffs' ditch as of the date of defendant's appropriation, made more than three years prior to the date, when the jurors viewed the premises by order of court, and the evidence showed that during the interval the ditch had become greatly out of repair, so that the jurors could not have received much assistance, if any, from viewing the ditch, the court did not abuse its discretion in setting aside the findings.

Appeal from District Court, Yellowstone County; C. H. Loud, Judge.

Action by William D. White and another against Fred. W. Barling. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

This is an action to determine the relative rights of the parties to the use of the waters of Blue creek, a tributary of Yellowstone river. Upon the trial a large number of special interrogatories were submitted to the jury and answered. These special findings were approved by the court, and a decree in conformity therewith rendered and entered. The plaintiffs then moved for a new trial, specifying as one of the grounds, among others, insufficiency of the evidence to sustain certain of the findings. The court, in an order general in its terms, sustained the motion, and the defendant has appealed from the order granting a new trial.

T. S. Hogan and M. J. Lamb, for appellant. O. F. Goddard, for respondents.

HOLLOWAY, J. (after stating the facts as above). It must be conceded to be the rule, now firmly established in this jurisdiction, that, where a trial court has granted a motion for a new trial in an order such as the one before us, which does not specify the particular ground upon which it was granted, the action will be approved by this court, if it was justified upon any one or more of the grounds of the motion. Walsh v. Conrad, 35 Mont. 68, 88 Pac. 655; Fournier v. Coudert, 34 Mont. 484, 87 Pac. 455; Case v. Kramer, 34 Mont. 142, 85 Pac. 878; Gillies v. Clarke Fork Coal Min. Co., 32 Mont. 320, 80 Pac. 370; Wright v. Mathews, 28 Mont. 442, 72 Pac. 820; Beach v. Spokane R. & W. Co., 25 Mont. 367, 65 Pac. 106. It is also well settled that a motion for a new trial upon the ground that the findings are not supported by the evidence is addressed to the sound legal discretion of the trial court, and its order will not be disturbed, except in a case of manifest abuse of such discretion. Fournier v. Coudert, above; Case v. Kramer, above; Vogt v. Baldwin, 20 Mont. 322, 51 Pac. 157; Murray v. Heinze, 17 Mont. 353, 42 Pac. 1057, 43 Pac. 714; Haggin v. Salle, 14 Mont. 79, 35 Pac. 514.

One of the principal questions in issue in this case was the capacity of a certain ditch owned by the plaintiffs, and by means of which they conveyed water to their lands; and it was of particular importance to determine the capacity of this ditch at the date of defendant's appropriation, September 19, 1902, which was three years and seven months prior to the date of the trial. The jury found that such capacity was 30 miners' inches, and this finding (No. 28) was approved by the court. Upon motion for new trial this particular finding was attacked, as were others, and, after a hearing, the trial court granted the motion. Upon the question submitted, and of which finding No. 28 is the answer, the evidence offered by the respective parties was extremely conflicting, and it appears to us that different courts might reasonably differ as to the weight of the evidence so offered. At least we are not prepared to say that this record discloses that the evidence upon that subject preponderates in favor of that finding. If the trial court came to the conclusion that finding No. 28 was not supported by the evidence, that is, that the evidence preponderated against that finding, then it was the duty of the court to set it aside. Harrington v. Butte & Boston Min. Co., 27 Mont. 1, 69 Pac. 102; Patten v. Hyde, 23 Mont. 23, 57 Pac. 407. But it is said that this finding No. 28, or any other one to which plaintiffs took exception, might have been corrected upon motion to modify the findings, without putting the parties to the trouble and expense of a new trial, and in this appellant is correct. But under our cumbersome practice a litigant in an equity case may move for a modification of the findings, or may move for a new trial, and we know of no rule of law which authorizes a court to dictate to a litigant which method he shall pursue. Plaintiffs did not ask the court for a modification of the findings, but did ask for a new trial, and with their selection of the remedy to be pursued we cannot interfere.

But it is earnestly contended by appellant that, since the trial court directed a view of the premises, and such view was had, the court thereafter abused its discretion in setting aside the findings made. While under some circumstances this argument might be advanced with great force, we think it can hardly be done in this instance. As said above, the effort was directed to a determination of the capacity of plaintiffs' old ditch, as of the date of defendant's appropriation, which was more than three years prior to the date when the jurors viewed the premises; and the evidence tends very strongly to show that during that interval the ditch had become greatly out of repair by reason of stock running over it, the ditch being located for a considerable distance along a hillside. So that, so far as this record discloses, the jurors could not have received very much assistance, if any, by reason of the view of the ditch at the time of the trial.

Appellant relies upon the case of Ormund v. Granite Mt. Min. Co., 11 Mont. 303, 28 Pac. 289, in which case this court reversed the district court for granting a new trial after a view of the premises by the jury. But in the Ormund Case it appeared that the only issue was as to whether the plaintiff had made a discovery within the boundaries of his mining claim. Three or four witnesses swore to the discovery. Thirteen witnesses for the defendant swore to the contrary, and their evidence was not rebutted. Under these circumstances this court held that the trial court abused its discretion in granting a new trial, and, in doing so, said, among other things: "In deliberating upon their verdict, they (the jury) had a right to take into consideration their observations in connection with the evidence. It must be understood, however, that the verdict under these circumstances is not to be treated as conclusive upon any issue."

In Murray v. Heinze, above, this court had under consideration an appeal from an order granting a new trial in a case in which the jury had inspected the premises; and, in affirming the order of the trial court, this court reviewed the opinion in the Ormund Case, and, among other things, said: "There was in the Ormund Case apparently a great preponderance of un rebutted testimony in favor of the defendant and in support of the verdict; but in the case at bar the record shows no such preponderance of un rebutted evidence in support of the verdict. Here there is an irreconcilable conflict upon the material issues, which distinguishes it from the Ormund Case." We think this observation pertinent and particularly applicable to the case now under consideration.

In conclusion we quote from the opinion in Walsh v. Conrad, above, as applicable to the question first considered above in this case, the following: "Upon this question there was a conflict in the evidence; and, as the trial court, which had the witnesses before it, was in a much better situation to judge of the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict than is this court, we cannot say that this record discloses any abuse of discretion on the part of the court in setting aside the verdict and granting a new trial."

The order from which this appeal is taken is affirmed.

Affirmed.

CHICAGO, M. & ST. P. RY. CO. OF MONTANA v. WHITE et al.

KENYON v. CANNON et al.

(Supreme Court of Montana. Jan. 25, 1908.)

1. EMINENT DOMAIN—COMPENSATION — PARTIES ENTITLED—TRUSTEE.

On a petition by a trustee holding the legal title to land condemned for an order that a fund deposited in court in the condemnation proceedings be paid to him, an answer by some of the beneficiaries that the trustee was insolvent, and that an action for an accounting was pending against him, admitted that he was prima facie entitled to the fund, the proper remedy of the beneficiaries to protect the fund being by a proceeding in the action for accounting.

2. APPEAL—DECISIONS REVIEWABLE—ORDER AFTER JUDGMENT.

An order authorizing the payment of a fund deposited in court in condemnation proceedings to the person entitled thereto is not a special order after final judgment from which an appeal may be taken.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 2, Appeal and Error, § 521.]

3. SAME—ORDER FOR DELIVERY OF PROPERTY.

The order is not one directing the delivery, transfer, or surrender of property, within Code Civ. Proc. § 1722, as amended by Laws 1899, p. 146, authorizing appeal from such an order.

4. EMINENT DOMAIN—COMPENSATION—PERSONS ENTITLED.

It is only where no dispute arises as to who is entitled to a fund deposited in court in condemnation proceedings that the court can entertain a motion to direct the clerk to pay it over.

5. APPEAL—RIGHT OF REVIEW—PARTY AGGRIEVED.

Beneficiaries are not aggrieved so as to entitle them to appeal from an order directing the payment of a fund in court in condemnation proceedings to their trustee, since their rights under the trust agreement are not affected.

Appeal from District Court, Silver Bow County; Geo. M. Bourquin, Judge.

Condemnation proceedings by the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway Company of Montana against W. McC. White and others. From an order directing payment of part of a fund in court to John A. Cannon, trustee, O. E. Kenyon appeals. Dismissed.

O. P. Connelly and W. A. Pennington, for appellant. John J. McHatton, for respondent.

SMITH, J. The above-entitled matter was in this court once before, on the appeal of Mary D. Forbls, as administratrix. Forbls, Adm'x, v. Cannon et al., 35 Mont. 424, 90 Pac. 161. The nature of the proceeding is explained in the opinion, wherein the court said: "We decide that, under the issues raised and tried in the district court, John A. Cannon, the holder of the legal title to the land taken, was prima facie entitled to the money that was ordered paid to him, and affirm the order appealed from. We do not decide whether or not it is an appealable order, because that question is not presented in the briefs of counsel. Also, upon the question as to the jurisdiction of the district court to determine the rights of the respective claimants to this money in a summary manner, we express no opinion." It appears from the record that O. E. Kenyon filed an answer to the petition of Cannon and wife, substantially the same as that of Mary D. Forbls, as administratrix, and he now appeals from the same order from which she appealed. Perhaps, in view of the fact that the language employed in the last sentence of the former opinion may have led the present appellant to believe that upon that appeal the question was given no consideration at all, it is advisable to add something to what was said in Forbis v. Cannon. The money was deposited in court by the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway Company of Montana as payment for 105 lots in the city of Butte, the legal title to which was vested in John A. Cannon, as trustee. We held, in effect, that the so-called answers to the Cannon petition set forth no reason why the money should not be paid to Cannon as the person entitled thereto. In other words, no question was raised but that Cannon was still trustee, and that the lots in question were a part of the trust estate. The so-called answering defendants sought to prevent Cannon from receiving the money, because, in another action pending, they were attempting to have him removed as trustee, after accounting for the trust funds. Had this appellant gone before the district court in answer to the Cannon petition, and alleged facts showing that Cannon was not entitled to the money, we have no doubt the district court would have refused to try the issue thus raised or make any summary order in the premises. But when his own pleading, if such it may be called, admitted in effect that Cannon was still trustee, and that the property of which the money was the proceeds was a part of the trust estate, he admitted that Cannon was prima facie entitled to the same. We suppose there is no question that a trustee is entitled to the possession of the trust estate. How, otherwise, could he be charged with, and required to account for, the same? That is this case. The appellant's so-called answer requested the court to try, on motion, the question whether Cannon had been faithful, or otherwise, to his trust. In fact, it requested the court to try, on motion, the issues involved in the action brought to remove him. If the appellant desired to have this money safeguarded so that Cannon could not dissipate the same, he should, by some appropriate proceeding in the action for an accounting, have invoked the power of the court having jurisdiction in that case to preserve the fund until the final determination of that action. We indulge in the foregoing remarks upon the merits of this matter, because appellant appears to misconstrue the former decision of this court.

Respondents have moved to dismiss the appeal, for the reason that the order appealed from is not an appealable one. That order is not a special order made after final judgment. Neither is it an order directing the delivery, transfer, or surrender of property such as is referred to in section 1722 of the Code of Civil Procedure, as amended by Laws 1899, p. 146. The order had no connection with the cause in which it was entitled. That cause had been finally determined, and the money paid into the hands of the clerk. Any controversy as to the disbursement of the money must necessarily have been determined in another action. The special order, made after final judgment, from which an appeal lies, must be an order affecting the rights of some party to the action, growing out of the judgment previously entered. It must be an order affecting rights incorporated in the judgment. The order appealed from had no connection with the judgment in Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Ry. Co. v. White. It is only in cases where no dispute arises as to who is entitled to the money that the district court has power to entertain a motion to direct the clerk to pay it over. In this case the so-called answers raised no such issue, and the matter stood as though they had not been interposed. Therefore the court made the order. But it was not appealable, first, because it was not a special order, made after final judgment, such as is contemplated by the Code; and, second, because the appellant was not aggrieved thereby, his rights under the trust agreement remaining in statu quo.

The appeal is dismissed.

STATE ex rel. BRASS v. HORN, Police Judge.
(Supreme Court of Montana. Jan. 25, 1908.)

1. SUPERSEDEAS—AUTHORITY TO GRANT.

Under Const. art. 8, § 3, giving the Supreme Court power to issue such writs as may be necessary or proper to the complete exercise of its appellate jurisdiction, the court has power to issue a supersedeas or any other appropriate writ in aid of an appeal which would otherwise be ineffectual.

2. APPEAL—REVIEW—MOOT QUESTION.

An appeal from a judgment awarding a writ of mandamus to compel the police judge of a city to transfer a charge against relator to the nearest justice of the peace would be dismissed, where it appeared that the transfer of the cause had already been made; a contention that since Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1726, 1733, do not provide for a stay of the execution of a judgment in such a case, and that since respondent was bound to obey the writ on peril of punishment for contempt under sections 1973, 2170, so that such refusal to review would deprive respondent of his right of appeal granted by Const. art. 8, § 15, being without merit, since, conceding that sections 1726, 1733, do not provide for a stay, the Supreme Court has power to issue a supersedeas or other appropriate writ to effectuate an appeal, under Const. art. 8, § 3.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, § 3122.]

Appeal from District Court, Lewis and Clark County; J. M. Clements, Judge.

Mandamus by the state, on the relation of John Brass, to compel Charles Horn, as police judge of the city of Helena, to compel respondent to transfer a charge against relator to the nearest justice of the peace of said city. From a judgment awarding the writ, respondent appeals. Appeal dismissed.

Edward C. Russell, for appellant. E. A. Carleton, for respondent.

BRANTLY, C. J. On May 20, 1907, the relator was, by complaint filed in the police court of the city of Helena, charged under an ordinance with disturbing the peace. Having been arrested and brought into court, he entered his plea of not guilty, and thereupon made his application to the court, upon affidavit setting forth his grounds therefor, for a transfer of the cause for trial to the nearest justice of the peace in the city. The application was denied. Thereupon he applied to the district court of Lewis and Clark county for a writ of mandamus to compel the transfer to be made. After a hearing, the court entered judgment awarding the writ. Thereupon the defendant appealed.

As soon as the record was filed in this court, the relator moved to dismiss the appeal on the ground that the defendant had fully complied with the writ, and thus satisfied the judgment, before the appeal was taken. The motion was directed to be submitted at the hearing on the merits. This has been done. It appears from the record and briefs of counsel that the defendant fully complied with the mandate of the district court on the same day the appeal was taken, and that the only purpose sought by the appeal is to have this court decide the moot question whether the statutes defining the jurisdiction of police and justice of the peace courts authorize a change of venue from the former to the latter in cases arising under the ordinances of a city and prosecuted in the name of the city. In State ex rel. Begeman v. Napton, 10 Mont. 369, 23 Pac. 1045, this court held that jurisdiction would not be taken of an appeal from a judgment of a trial court directing a writ of mandamus to issue, when it appeared that the writ had been issued and obeyed pending the appeal. The court said: "We are of the opinion that it is not a safe precedent to depart from the rule that courts will hear only genuine controversies, and will not tender advice upon matters not in litigation." In Snell v. Welch et al., 28 Mont. 482, 72 Pac. 988, an injunction had been issued by a district court restraining the defendants from letting contracts under an act of the Legislature providing for a uniform series of text-books for use in the public schools. The defendants appealed. Pending the appeal the parties settled their differences and the contracts were let. The court, on the authority of State ex rel. Begeman v. Napton, supra, refused to hear the appeal, saying: "There is nothing in this case now for us to decide. It has been disposed of by the parties themselves pending the appeal." Again, in Re Black's Estate, 32 Mont. 51, 79 Pac. 554, there was an appeal by two of the distributees from a decree of distribution and from an order denying them a new trial. Immediately after the decree had been made and entered, but before the order denying the motion had been made, the appellants made settlement with the administrator, recelpting him in full for their distributive shares. Upon this fact being made to appear to this court, the appeals were dismissed. It was held to be an insuperable objection to the entertainment of the appeals that, in case of a reversal of the decree, the parties would not stand relatively in the same position as when the decree was entered, and so the district court could not retry the issues and do justice to the parties. So here it would serve no useful purpose to reverse the judgment appealed from, because the cause was, immediately upon the issuance of judgment and service of the writ, transferred to the justice, and has doubtless long since been disposed of. The parties cannot, under these circumstances, be put in statu quo. The very purpose of an appeal is to relieve a party who has been aggrieved by the judgment or order complained of, and to restore him to the position occupied by him in the controversy before the judgment was rendered or the order made. On the ground stated in the motion as well as for the reasons stated in Re Black's Estate, supra, we do not think the appeal should be determined on the merits.

But counsel for appellant insists that, since the statutes (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1726, 1733) do not provide a stay of the execution of the judgment in such cases, and since the defendant was bound to obey the writ at the peril of punishment for contempt (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1973, 2170; State ex rel. Coad v. District Court, 23 Mont. 171, 57 Pac. 1095), an application of the rule of the Begeman and Snell Cases, supra, will deprive him of his right of appeal, guaranteed under the Constitution (Const. § 15, art. 8, as construed in Finlen v. Heinze, 27 Mont. 107, 69 Pac. 829, 70 Pac. 517, and Raymond v. Raymond, 32 Mont. 170, 79 Pac. 1056). We shall not pause to consider the question whether the sections of the statute supra prohibit, or do not provide for, a stay in such cases. It may be conceded that they do not; yet it does not therefore follow that the defendant may not nevertheless have a stay of execution and therefore an effective appeal. Under another provision of the Constitution (section 3, art. 8) this court has power to effectuate its appellate jurisdiction by the use of any original or remedial writ which the necessities of a particular case may demand. Finlen v. Heinze, supra. This, of course, includes the power to issue a super-seedeas or any other appropriate writ in aid of an appeal which would otherwise be ineffectual.

Let the appeal be dismissed.
Dismissed.

FRYE v. MOFFET.*

2. SAME—TITLE—CONTEST.

Where complainant, after being divorced from her husband, sued for partition of property purchased while they were husband and wife, and averred that defendant was in sole possession of the property, and the record disclosed a dispute as to the title and right of possession, she could not maintain partition until the contested title had been determined and she had secured possession in some appropriate proceeding.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Malheur County; George E. Davis, Judge.

Partition by Emma Frye against James T. Moffet. From a decree in favor of complainant, defendant appeals. Reversed and dismissed.

This is a suit by Emma Frye against James T. Moffet for the partition of real property. The complaint alleges that plaintiff and defendant are the owners in fee, as tenants in common, of the property in question, but does not allege that plaintiff is in possession as such tenant. On the contrary, it is averred that defendant "has had the sole use and occupancy" of the property since the 1st of November, 1904, and has been receiving the rents and profits therefrom, and prays that he be required to account to plaintiff therefor. A demurrer to the complaint, because it does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of suit, was overruled, and defendant answered, denying the material averments thereof, and for a further and separate defense alleging that he is the sole owner of the property, and has been in the exclusive possession thereof since the 17th day of November, 1902. The reply put in issue the averments of the answer, and upon the issues thus joined a trial was had. From the evidence it appears that plaintiff and defendant were formerly husband and wife, but were divorced in October, 1903. On the 17th of November, 1902, and while they were such husband and wife, one J. H. Wright executed a deed, without his wife joining therein, and having but one witness, purporting to convey the property in controversy to them jointly, and delivered it to plaintiff. Shortly thereafter she separated from her husband, and subsequently secured a divorce. About the time of the separation defendant entered into possession of the property in dispute, and has ever since remained in the sole and exclusive possession thereof. In June, 1904, plaintiff commenced this suit, claiming that the deed from Wright conveyed the property to her and defendant, who were then husband and wife, as tenants by the entirety, which was subsequently dissolved by the decree of divorce, leaving them tenants in common. Defendant claims, however, that he purchased the property of Wright for his own use and benefit, paying a part of the purchase money at the time, and was to receive a deed upon payment of the balance; that the deed made by Wright to himself and plaintiff was without his knowledge or consent, and that he knew nothing about it until after the decree of divorce, when he discovered it in a trunk in his house; that he immediately repudiated the transaction, offered to return the deed to Wright, and thereafter tendered him the balance of the purchase money, and demanded a good and sufficient conveyance from him. Plaintiff on the other hand claims that she was a joint purchaser with defendant of the property, and furnished the money with which to make the first payment, and afterwards paid a part of the balance; that the deed from Wright was made to herself and defendant, with his knowledge and consent, and by his direction. The court below found that plaintiff and defendant were the owners in fee and in possession as tenants in common; that the property could not be divided without great prejudice to their interests, and directed a sale and division of the proceeds. A sale was afterwards made and confirmed, and defendant appeals.

W. H. Brooke, for appellant. Geo. W. Hayes, for respondent.

BEAN, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). We think the decree must be reversed. It is incumbent on a plaintiff in a suit for partition, unless the suit is brought by one or more tenants in common of a vested remainder or reversion, to allege and prove, if denied, that he and the defendant were in possession of the property as tenants in common at the time of the commencement of the suit. Sterling v. Sterling, 43 Or. 200, 72 Pac. 741. And this the present plaintiff does not do. She does not allege that she was in possession; but, on the contrary, avers that defendant was and ever since November, 1904, has been in the sole occupancy of the premises, and such are the facts that appear from the evidence. Ordinarily the possession of one tenant in common is the possession of both; but this record discloses a dispute as to the title and right of possession of real property, and until it is determined, and plaintiff secures possession in some appropriate proceeding, she cannot maintain a suit for partition.

Decree reversed, and complaint dismissed.

KING, C., having been of counsel, took no part in this decision.

STANLEY v. J. N. RACHOFSKY & SON.*
(Supreme Court of Oregon. Jan. 21, 1908.)1. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE—SUMMONS—CONTENTS.

Laws 1905, p. 315, provides that a justice's summons shall require the defendant to appear and answer within seven days from the date of service, or suffer judgment for the sum specified in the complaint with the disbursements of the action, and B. & C. Comp. § 2203, provides that such summons shall be served by delivering a copy thereof, together with a certified copy of the complaint, etc. Held, that where a summons properly issued and signed contained sufficient information to warn defendant that a judicial proceeding was pending against him in a particular court, and that if he did not appear and answer a judgment would be taken against him for a specified sum, it was not fatally defective for failure to state the rate of interest demanded and the date from which it was to be computed, such facts appearing from a copy of the complaint served with the summons.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 31, Justices of the Peace, § 253.]

2. SAME—IRREGULARITY IN PROCESS—SERVICE—REMEDY.

An irregularity in the process or in the manner of its service by which a justice's jurisdiction was acquired must be taken advantage of by some motion or proceeding in the court where the action is pending.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 31, Justices of the Peace, § 264.]

3. SAME—COPY OF SUMMONS—CERTIFICATION.

Where a return of service of a justice's summons certified that a copy was served, such return was sufficient proof that the instrument served was a copy under B. & C. Comp. § 2203, requiring only that a copy of the summons be served, and not requiring that it be certified by any one to be a copy.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 31, Justices of the Peace, §§ 262, 263.]

4. SAME—TIME TO ANSWER.

Under Laws 1905, p. 315, providing that a defendant in a justice's court shall be required to answer within seven days from the date of the service, he may answer on any one of those dates.

5. SAME—APPEARANCE—DOCKET ENTRY.

Laws 1905, p. 315, requires defendant in a justice's court to answer within seven days from the date of service, and B. & C. Comp. § 2211, provides that his plea or answer must be in writing and be filed with the justice. Held, that where a defendant in a justice's court could not have been in default until the date on which judgment was rendered, and was in default on the beginning of that day, and the judgment recited that defendant had failed to answer the complaint as required by law, such recital being in the form prescribed by section 786 was sufficient to sustain the judgment without a docket entry of defendant's failure to appear.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Grant County; Geo. E. Davis, Judge.

Writ of review by J. C. Stanley against J. N. Rachofsky & Son to annul a justice's judgment recovered by default by the latter against the former. From an order setting the judgment aside, Rachofsky & Son appeal. Reversed and remanded, with directions to dismiss the writ.

*Rehearing denied March 10, 1908.

On February 12, 1907, Rachofsky & Son filed, in the justice's court for the Third justice's district of Grant county, a complaint embracing two causes of action against plaintiff. On the first cause of action judgment was demanded for $29.60, with interest at 6 per cent. per annum from October 7, 1903, and on the second cause of action for the sum of $20, with interest at the rate of 6 per cent. from July 15, 1903, and for their costs and disbursements. The summons was issued on February 12th, and required the defendant in the action to appear and answer the complaint within seven days from the date of the service thereof, or suffer judgment to be taken against him for the sum of $49.60, with interest thereon, with the disbursements of the action. It was returned and filed with the justice on the 21st, with an indorsement thereon showing personal service on February 13th, in Grant county, Or., on defendant, by a delivery to him of a copy thereof prepared and certified by the deputy sheriff, together with a copy of the complaint certified to be such by plaintiff's attorney. After the issuance of the summons, no entry was made by the justice in his docket that in any way referred to the date of the making or filing of any pleading by the defendant, or of his appearance or failure to appear in the action until the 21st, when the following entry was made: "Plaintiff appeared, and it appearing that the defendant has failed to answer the complaint as required by law, it is considered that the plaintiff recover off the defendant the sum of $59.89, and the disbursements of the action taxed at $13.90." On March 4, 1907, plaintiff herein sued out a writ of review to set aside and annul such judgment on the ground (1) that no summons was issued as required by law; (2) that there was no service upon the petitioner of the pretended summons; (3) that the justice did not enter in his docket the failure of the defendant to appear; (4) that it does not appear from the judgment as entered in the justice's docket that the defendant therein was ever served with a summons in said action, or that he was served more than seven days prior to the rendition of the judgment; and (5) that the amount for which it was entered does not conform it to the amount specified in the summons, for which judgment would be taken in default of an answer. The lower court set aside the judgment, and Rachofsky & Son appeal.

A. M. F. Kirchheiner, for appellant. Errett Hicks and J. E. Marks, for respondent.

SLATER, C. (after stating the facts as above). The only deficiency in the summons urged as a reason for overturning the judgment is that, although there is given the amount of the principal of the debt for which judgment is demanded, it fails to state the rate of interest demanded, and the date or dates from which it was to be computed. At the time of the commencement of the action, the law governing trials and proceedings in civil actions in justices' courts provided that the summons "shall require the defendant to appear and answer the complaint within seven days from the date of the service thereof upon him or suffer judgment to be taken against him for the sum specified in the complaint with the disbursements of the action" (Laws 1905, p. 315), and that it shall be served by delivering a copy thereof, together with a certified copy of the complaint, etc. (section 2203, B. & C. Comp.). While it is advisable in the issuance of the summons that the statute should be literally complied with, nothing short of a substantial departure therefrom can properly be held to be fatal to a proceeding under it, and the recent decisions are to the effect that a substantial compliance with statutes of this character is all that is required. Higley v. Pollock, 21 Nev. 198, 27 Pac. 895; Bewick v. Muir, 83 Cal. 368, 23 Pac. 389; Clark v. Palmer, 90 Cal. 504, 27 Pac. 375; Bucklin v. Strickler, 32 Neb. 602, 49 N. W. 371; McPherson v. First National Bank, 12 Neb. 202, 10 N. W. 707; Keybers v. McComber, 67 Cal. 395, 7 Pac. 838; Shinn v. Cummins, 65 Cal. 97, 3 Pac. 133; White v. Iltis, 24 Minn. 43; Kimball v. Castagnio, 8 Colo. 525, 9 Pac. 488; Warren v. Gordon, 10 Wis. 499; Behlow v. Shorb, 91 Cal. 141, 27 Pac. 546. Doubtless the summons was slightly irregular or defective in the respect mentioned, but it was nevertheless issued and signed by the proper officer, and contained information sufficient to warn the defendant that a judicial proceeding was pending against him in a particular court, and that if he did not appear therein and answer the complaint within a specified time a judgment would be taken against him for a certain sum of money. Upon proper service of such a summons a judgment given for want of an answer would not be void. North Pacific Cycle Co. v. Thomas, 26 Or. 381, 38 Pac. 307, 46 Am. St. Rep. 636; Perry v. Gholson, 39 Or. 438, 65 Pac. 601, 87 Am. St. Rep. 685. The deficiency in the summons is no more than an irregularity, and such a one as does not affect a substantial right of the defendant, when, as in this case, a copy of the complaint was served with the summons. The relief demanded in the complaint is full and explicit, and carried notice to the defendant of all the facts of which he says the summons was lacking. "But if the complaint is served with the summons," says Mr. Justice Allen, in McCoun v. Railroad Co., 50 N. Y. 176, "the defendant has more full and perfect knowledge of the cause of action and the consequences of default than he could get from the summons alone, and if there is an error or defect in the summons, it carried with it the remedy and correction, and an effectual preventive against error by any one." Also, if there is any irregularity in the process or in the manner of its service, the defendant must take advantage of such irregularity by some motion or proceeding in the court where the action is pending. Free-man on Judgments (4th Ed.) § 126.

2. The second reason assigned in support of the petition is that there was no legal service of the summons on the petitioner, but the return of the officer successfully disproves that averment. It is particularly urged in this connection that, because the copy of the summons delivered to the defendant was certified to by the deputy sheriff instead of the sheriff, it amounted to no service. The statute, however, required only that a copy of the summons be served, and does not require that it shall be certified by any one to be a copy. Section 2203, B. & C. Comp.; Bank v. Richardson, 34 Or. 518, 54 Pac. 359, 75 Am. St. Rep. 664. The return shows that a copy was served, and that is sufficient proof that it was a copy.

3. As a further reason for overturning the judgment, it is averred that the justice did not enter in his docket the failure of the defendant to appear as required by section 2198, subd. 4, B. & C. Comp. Plaintiff relies solely upon the decision of this court in the case of Loan Ass'n v. Osburn, 38 Or. 568, 64 Pac. 383, to support that contention. It was there held that there must be a substantial compliance with the requirement of that section to authorize the entry of a judgment by default which will not be subject to direct attack. But the state of the law of procedure and practice in justices' courts in civil actions at the time of the commencement of that case is radically different from what it is now. At that time the summons required the defendant to appear at a specified time to answer the complaint, so that he could not appear or answer at any other time, so, also, no formal or written pleadings were required, but they may have been either oral or written (Laws 1893, p. 38), while at the time of the commencement of the present action the defendant is required to answer within seven days from the date of the service, and he may, therefore, answer on any one of those days (Laws 1905, p. 315). And his plea or answer must be in writing and be filed with the justice. Section 2211, B. & C. Comp. It is also material to note that subdivision 4 of section 2198, B. & C. Comp., requiring the justice to enter in his docket the time when the parties appeared or their failure to do so, is a part of the original justices' act of 1864, which recognized an oral pleading. Under such practice the personal appearance of a party and the making of an oral plea could not be evidenced in any other manner than by an entry in the docket of that fact. While the absence of such an entry might have been sufficient proof that no appearance was made, yet the Legislature saw fit to enact that the failure of a party to appear should also be entered. But it did not provide that a failure to file a written plea should be noted by the justice. It is stated in Hardy v. Miller, 11 Neb. 395, 9 N. W. 475, cited in Loan Ass'n v. Osburn, supra, that: "The finding of a court that Hardy and wife made 'default of answer' is one of fact. No judgment can lawfully be rendered by default until the time for filing an answer has elapsed, and the authority of the court to render such judgment follows from the failure of the defendant to answer, and not from the particular manner in which the default entered. The essential fact is the failure to answer." The deduction made from this case by Mr. Chief Justice Bean, in the case of Loan Ass'n v. Osburn, supra, as applied to the law as it was then, is that "where a record shows that the court convened at the time and place specified in the summons, and after waiting the statutory time a judgment was rendered against a defendant for want of an answer, it will perhaps be sufficient, although no formal default was entered, as the record actually made is practically equivalent thereto." In the case now under review the defendant could not have been in default until February 21st, and he was in default at the beginning of that day on which judgment was entered. Prior to the 21st no entry or record of the defendant's failure to appear and answer the complaint could have been made. When the recitals of the judgment embodied in the record show that in fact the defendant was in default, it is sufficient to authorize the action of the court, and the judgment will be sustained on appeal or error. 6 Pl. & Pr. 56. The judgment recites "that the defendant has failed to answer the complaint as required by law." This is a conclusion, it is true, but one that the court is bound to draw from the state of the record, because there is no entry therein of the filing of any pleading by defendant, and that is sufficient in itself to contravene the assumption that one may have been filed. Under the present state of the law, the recital is sufficient to support a default, especially so since the forms of the docket entries used by the justice in this instance are precisely those set forth in section 786, B. & C. Comp., for the guidance of such courts.

The remaining averments of the petition do not appear to have been relied upon, and we think are without merit. The judgment should be reversed and the cause remanded, with directions to dismiss the writ.

JACKSON v. SUMPTER VALLEY RY. CO.*

(Supreme Court of Oregon. Jan. 7, 1908.)

1. NEGLIGENCE—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—BURDEN OF PROOF.

Contributory negligence is a matter of defense and the burden of establishing it is on defendant, unless plaintiff's declaration or evidence establishes it.

*Rehearing denied February 4, 1908.

2. TRIAL—NONSUIT.

The province of a motion for nonsuit is in the nature of a demurrer to the evidence, and when it is sought to take advantage of a defect in the pleadings by such a motion, the pleadings should be construed liberally as if on a motion by defendant for judgment notwithstanding the verdict against him.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 46, Trial, §§ 359-367.]

3. PLEADING—DEFECTS.

A party relying on a technical defect in a pleading is subjected to observance of technical rules.

4. RAILROADS—INJURY TO ANIMALS—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—PLEADINGS.

Where, in an action against a railroad company for killing cows on its track, the company as an affirmative defense alleged that plaintiff negligently herded cows along the right of way within switching limits at a station, with knowledge that the right of way was dangerous, a reply denying the averments of the answer, except that "certain cows of the plaintiff, being then and there under the immediate care, custody, and control of plaintiff," construed liberally in favor of plaintiff, did not admit contributory negligence.

5. SAME.

An answer, in an action against a railway company for killing cows on its track, which alleges that plaintiff negligently herded "certain" cows along the right of way within switch limits at a station, with knowledge of the danger, and that he negligently permitted the stock to remain on and along the track, and that thereby the stock sustained injuries, etc., does not, on a strict construction, raise the defense of contributory negligence, in the absence of any identification of the "certain" cows with those whose killing is sued for.

6. SAME—QUESTION FOR JURY.

In an action against a railway company for killing animals on its track, the question of contributory negligence of the owner held for the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 41, Railroads, § 1030.]

7. TRIAL—QUESTION FOR JURY.

Where different deductions may reasonably be drawn from the evidence in a cause, the issues are for the jury; and, to justify the granting of a nonsuit, the facts and inferences must be undisputed.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 46, Trial, § 336.]

8. RAILROADS—INJURY TO ANIMALS—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

Whether one is guilty of contributory negligence in turning his stock out to graze on uninclosed lands near a railroad track is a question for the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 41, Railroads, § 1039.]

9. NEGLIGENCE—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—ORDINARY CARE.

One is not guilty of contributory negligence, unless he fails to exercise ordinary care; and there is no want of ordinary care, when, under the circumstances, he does not omit anything which an ordinarily prudent person similarly situated would not have omitted.

10. SAME—QUESTION FOR JURY.

Where both the duty to exercise care and the extent of its performance are to be ascertained as facts, the jury alone can determine what is negligence, and whether it has been proven.

11. RAILROADS—INJURY TO ANIMALS—STATION GROUNDS.

In an action against a railroad for injuries to animals on its track, the evidence showed that there were about 1½ miles of unfenced track from one station towards another, that it was three-quarters of a mile from the station to the head of a switch for a siding running back towards the station used for storing engines, etc.; and that further on in the direction of the other station about 150 yards from the switch was a branch line leaving the main line and forming the head of a "Y." The animals were killed near the switch for the siding. There was nothing to show that the siding was used in connection with a depot at the station. Held, that the question whether the animals entered the track within depot grounds was for the jury.

12. APPEAL—REVIEW OF EVIDENCE—BILL OF EXCEPTIONS.

Where the evidence is not in the bill of exceptions, and a transcript of what appears to be evidence is in the record, but the same is not identified by the court, or certified to be any or all of the testimony in the case, the court on appeal will not consider it.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, §§ 2094-2096.]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Baker County; William Smith, Judge.

Action by S. H. Jackson against the Sumpter Valley Railway Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Plaintiff sues on two causes of action to recover in damages the value of some of his milch cows, which were killed and injured by defendant's moving railroad cars and engine on its track near the town of Sumpter, in Baker county. A nonsuit was granted as to the first cause of action, which is not to be considered here. For the second cause of action it is averred that a number of plaintiff's cows, on August 6, 1900, went upon defendant's unfenced track, and four of them were killed and two were injured by one of defendant's moving trains and engine drawing the same. The answer denies generally the averments of the complaint, excepting defendant's incorporation and ownership and operation of the railroad leading from Baker city to Sumpter on which the cows were killed. As an affirmative defense, it is alleged, in substance, that on August 6, 1900, certain cows of plaintiff being then and there under the immediate care, custody, direction, and control of plaintiff and his servant, one Robert Allen, were by them carelessly and negligently, and without right or authority, wrongfully herded and pastured upon and along defendant's right of way and railroad track, within its switching and station yards, inside the corporate limits of the city of Sumpter, and that plaintiff and his servant, Robert Allen, well knowing that defendant's trains were regularly passing over said tracks and right of way, and well knowing said stock was within defendant's switching yards, and that said right of way and said switching yards were dangerous and unsafe places for said stock to be, and that they had no right to have said stock in said places, carelessly and negligently permitted said stock to remain upon and along said track and right of way, and that thereby said stock sustained the injuries alleged, if at all, and that whatever damage plaintiff may have suffered from said injuries was due solely to his own said negligence and carelessness in driving and herding his said stock upon and along defendant's track and right of way, as aforesaid, and not to any fault or negligence of this defendant. By the reply, plaintiff denied generally all the averments of the answer, excepting that "certain cows of the plaintiff, being then and there under the immediate care, custody, and control of plaintiff." After the issues were thus joined a trial was had before a jury, and at the conclusion of plaintiff's testimony defendant moved a nonsuit, on the ground that the evidence shows plaintiff to have been guilty of contributory negligence sufficient to bar his right to recover. This being overruled, defendant offered his testimony, and the cause was submitted to the jury, which returned a verdict in favor of plaintiff in the sum of $330, upon which judgment was entered, from which defendant appeals.

V. W. Tomlinson, for appellant. C. H. McCulloch, for respondent.

SLATER, C. (after stating the facts as above). The first and principal error relied upon to reverse the judgment is the denial by the court of defendant's motion for a nonsuit to the second cause of action. In this state contributory negligence is a matter of defense, and the burden of establishing it is on the defendant. Johnston v. O. S. L. Ry. Co., 23 Or. 94, 31 Pac. 233; Grant v. Baker, 12 Or. 329, 7 Pac. 318. But, if plaintiff's declaration or evidence establishes his own contributory negligence, it bars his recovery, no matter where the burden rests. 7 Am. & Eng. Ency. (2d Ed.) 454; Tucker v. Northern Terminal Co., 41 Or. 82, 68 Pac. 426; Scott v. Oregon Ry. & N. Co., 14 Or. 211, 13 Pac. 98.

To support its contention counsel for defendant urges with much earnestness that the pleadings on the part of plaintiff admit that the cattle went upon the track while under the immediate care, custody, and control of plaintiff. This arises, it is argued, from the form of the denial used in the reply. What the pleader intended to admit by excluding the quoted words from the effect of his denial is doubtful. Defendant's counsel arrive at their conclusion by a strict construction of the language quoted, and contend that such should be the rule. But, if their assumption as to the rule of construction and their interpretation of the implied admission be correct, the result would have entitled defendant to a judgment on the pleadings, which they should have asked before going to trial, and not wait to raise the question on motion for nonsuit. The prov-inced of a motion for a nonsuit is in the nature of a demurrer to the evidence (Brown v. Oregon Lumber Co., 24 Or. 315, 33 Pac. 557), and it is an unusual method of taking advantage of a defect in the pleadings, and the appellant rather than respondent should be held to strict rules. "It has been held," says Mr. Justice Thayer, in Specht v. Allen, 12 Or. 117-122, 6 Pac. 494, 495, "that when a pleading did not contain a cause of action or defense as the case might be, and the objection to it was made for the first time at the trial by opposing the introduction of evidence to support it, the party would be deemed to have waived any objection to its sufficiency. I am of the opinion that the party in such case should be compelled to resort to a motion for judgment, notwithstanding the verdict, in case one were to be rendered against him, as the party interposing the pleading ought, when it had not been demurred to, to be entitled to the presumptions a verdict in his favor would afford. That appears to me to be the course the Code intends should be pursued. But, on the other hand, where a party has no sufficient pleading to stand upon, and judgment has gone against him, he is not in a favorable condition to ask for its reversal, particularly where a verdict would not have cured the defect. An appellate court in such a case would, I think, consistently determine that the error had not injured him." So, then, in this instance the reply should be construed as if the question arose upon a motion by defendant for a judgment, notwithstanding the verdict, that is, liberally, so that, if possible, the verdict may be sustained. Under these limitations, we are constrained to hold that the language used in the reply was intended to mean no more than that certain cows of the plaintiff were at the time of the accident under the care, custody, and control of plaintiff, not that they were under his care, custody, or control at the time they went upon the track and right of way of the defendant. When so construed and applied to the testimony hereinafter considered, plaintiff has relieved himself from any necessary inference of negligence on his part. But defendant is in no better condition, even if the language of the reply be construed strictly. A party who relies upon a technical defect is subjected to observance of technical rules. Hermann v. Hutcheson, 33 Or. 239, 53 Pac. 489; Small v. Lutz, 34 Or. 131, 55 Pac. 529, 53 Pac. 79; Billyeu v. Smith, 18 Or. 335, 22 Pac. 1073. The admission, claimed by defendant to be included in the language of the reply above quoted, could not arise, except that reference be made to the affirmative matter of the answer to interpret it. The words "certain cows of the plaintiff" of themselves do not necessarily mean the cows mentioned in the complaint upon which the cause of action is based. The answer contains the same language, and there is nothing elsewhere therein that identifies the "certain cows of the plaintiff" to be those described in the complaint. For all that appears upon the face of the pleadings, the averments of the answer may be true, and yet be no bar to a recovery on the cause of action set forth in the complaint. Plaintiff may have had another and different cause of action, which for some reason he did not see fit to include in his complaint.

It necessarily follows that upon a strict construction of the answer the defense of contributory negligence is not in this case; at least defendant, when judgment has gone against him, is not in a favorable position to ask for its reversal for this particular alleged error. Specht v. Allen, supra. Assuming, however, that the issue of contributory negligence is made by the answer, we will now examine plaintiff's testimony and ascertain whether any indisputable inference can be drawn from the uncontradicted facts which disclosed the omission or commission of any act by plaintiff or his servant, which the law adjudges negligent. The facts disclosed by the record are: That plaintiff operates a dairy in the vicinity of Sumpter, and had in his herd about 38 cows. That in the month of August, 1906, he pastured his cows for the most part on a farm called in the record the "Jett" place, situate about 2 miles east from the dairy and about 1½ miles south and east of Sumpter Depot, and through which defendant's main line going from Sumpter to Baker City passes, but sometimes the cows were turned out to feed upon the commons. That defendant's track is unfenced from Sumpter Station to the Jett place. On the morning of August 6, 1906, the cows were driven by one of plaintiff's hired men out to feed upon the commons, and left back of the Jett place and in the vicinity of the smelter, which is upon or near a branch road leaving the main line between 1¼ and 1½ miles south and east of the Sumpter Depot and going to Austin. That between the smelter and defendant's right of way and plaintiff's barn or dairy the country is not fenced, and is covered with brush, but affords good pasturage. About 3 o'clock in the afternoon of that day Robert Allen, plaintiff's employé, whose duty was to drive the cows home in the evening, went from the dairy easterly down the valley hunting some stray horses, intending to bring the cows home on his return in the evening. As he went he noticed three of the cows coming towards Sumpter up the track of the branch road from a quarter to a half mile distant from the main track, and about one-half mile from where the cows were killed. The rest were scattered between the Jett place and the smelter. Allen went on down the valley, secured the horses, and returned, arriving in the same vicinity between half past 5 and 6 o'clock. He then saw 15 or 20 head of plaintiff's cows feeding and drifting towards Sumpter on defendant's right of way, and between the arms of a "Y" formed by the branch line to Austin, the main line to Baker City, and a connecting curve. The horses having taken a canter along the county road towards home, Allen turned out of the road after the cows and drove those nearest him from the "Y" a distance of 200 or 300 yards to the county road, then turned back to get 17 or 18 others which had gone ahead up the main track towards Sumpter beyond the junction a distance of some 450 feet. At this point on the west side of the track there is a rocky point within 5 feet of the center of the track, and on the east side within about 30 feet is Powder river. The space between the track and the river was at one time traveled as a county road, but for a long time prior to the date of the accident it had been filled within a few feet of the track with sawlogs and brush, leaving very little space for loose stock to travel on. But there is a stock trail there, winding through the logs for a distance of 75 to 100 yards, then turns off to the left into the county road. About 150 feet further up the track towards Sumpter from the rocky point is a switch for a short siding called "Sumpter Siding," and 25 feet beyond this switch is the frog of the switch. Sumpter Depot or Station is three-fourths of a mile distant from the switch. Allen had consumed about 10 minutes of time in getting the first bunch of cows out of the "Y" and into the county road, when he turned back to get the remainder. These were 200 or 300 yards from where the first ones were found, and were feeding along the track towards this rocky point. Before Allen overtook them they had passed this point, and just as he arrived at the point he saw the train coming from Sumpter towards him. He endeavored to get in ahead of the cows and turn them off the track, but the engine struck two of the cows at the frog, injuring them, and killed four others at the switch stand.

The theory of the defense is that Allen was driving the stock homeward when they first went upon defendant's track, and that he was attempting to drive them along this trail on the right of way because by that route it was one quarter of a mile nearer to the dairy than by the county road. But he positively denies both of these assertions, and swears that he never at any time drove them through there; that when he first saw the cows upon the right of way he immediately went to them and began rounding them up and getting them off the right of way into the county road, taking those first that were nearest to him, preparatory to driving them home; that he had been engaged in that matter no more than 10 minutes when the cows were killed. To support its theory, however, defendant on cross-examination of plaintiff offered in evidence, as containing admissions against his interest, what purports to be an owner's statement of stock injured or killed, with plaintiff's name as claimant typewritten at the bottom thereof, under which is written "per, G. E. Allen." This statement is upon a printed blank form furnished by the company, and is in the form of questions and answers. It contains a statement of the time and place of the accident, a description and the value of the cows injured and killed, and, besides others, these questions and answers: "Was stock in charge of any one at the time? If so, who? Robert Allen. State how you know the stock was struck by the train? The cows were being driven home." Plaintiff swears that he did not personally know how the stock were killed, or whether they were being driven home by any one; that, by telephone, he directed G. E. Allen to fill out and present this claim blank for him, giving Allen, at the time, information about the number, description, and value of the stock, and told him that Robert Allen could give him other necessary facts; that he never saw the blank after it was filled out, and did not know that it contained such answers. Robert Allen swears that he did not give this particular information to his father, G. E. Allen. Under such circumstances, it could hardly be said, as a matter of law, that plaintiff is bound by the answers; but, if he were, it is but a statement, not conclusive, and is subject to explanation. On the face of it without explanation the statement is that at the time of the accident the stock was in charge of Allen and were being driven home by him, not that they were in his charge when they went upon the track. When, however, the statements are placed with the explanatory facts as disclosed by the evidence of Allen, it can at least be said that different deductions may honestly and reasonably be drawn therefrom by different minds, and under such circumstances the question is one proper to be submitted to a jury. Hedin v. Suburban Ry. Co., 26 Or. 155, 37 Pac. 540.

It is also contended by defendants that Allen was negligent in not going first to those cows that were on the main track and removing them; for, it is argued, they were in the most danger, and his duty was to attend to them first. It may be conceded that it is the law that one who sees his cattle in danger upon a railroad track and can by reasonable exertions get them off he is bound to do so (Milburn v. Kansas City, etc., Co., 86 Mo. 104), or that one having stock under his immediate care, custody, and control, who voluntarily drives or puts them in a place of danger, or carelessly permits them to wander from his control into a place of danger, is guilty of contributory negligence (Keeney v. O. R. & Nav. Co., 19 Or. 291, 24 Pac. 233; Ohio & Missouri Ry. Co. v. Eaves, 42 Ill. 288). But a motion for a nonsuit is in the nature of a demurrer to the evidence. It admits the truth of plaintiff's evidence and of every inference of fact which the jury may legally draw from it. The sufficiency of the evidence is for the jury, provided the court shall be of the opinion that there is any evidence tending to sustain the complaint. Brown v. Oregon Lumber Co., 24 Or. 315, 33 Pac. 557. And to justify granting a nonsuit facts should be not only undisputed but conclusions to be drawn from them indisputable. If different minds may honestly draw different conclusions from the facts, though undisputed, the case should be left to the jury. Peabody v. O. R. & N. Co., 21 Or. 121, 26 Pac. 1053, 12 L. R. A. 823. As a matter of law, then, the court cannot say that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence in turning his stock out to graze on unclosed lands near defendant's track or depot. That is a question for the jury. Wilmot v. Oregon R. Co., 48 Or. 494, 87 Pac. 528, 7 L. R. A. (N. S.) 202. Nor if plaintiff's testimony is to be believed can negligence be imputed to him because his stock was found upon defendant's track. They were not in his immediate care, custody, or control when they went upon the track, nor in the care of his servant, nor did either of them carelessly permit them to wander from his control into the place of danger where they were found.

If counsel by argument can draw a different inference from the evidence, it is derived only by the process of weighing testimony and by giving credence to one piece of testimony and rejecting another where there is a conflict. But when the right determination of a case depends upon the weight to be given evidence, it is for the consideration of the jury. Anderson v. North Pacific Lumber Co., 21 Or. 281, 23 Pac. 5. It is undisputed, however, that the servant about 10 minutes before the accident found plaintiff's stock in a place which imparted notice of danger, not notice of a present and imminent danger by seeing a train approaching, for that is not the fact, but because the track itself is a warning of possible danger. Durbin v. Oregon R. & Nav. Co., 17 Or. 5, 17 Pac. 5, 11 Am. St. Rep. 778. He did not then know that any train was due from either direction, and he was compelled to act on the assumption that one part of the track was no more dangerous than another. Hence he first attended to those nearest to him. Had the fact been that when he first came upon the ground he saw a train coming from the opposite direction, or that he knew that a train was then due from that direction, it may have been his duty to have gone first to those cows that were nearest to the anticipated danger; but the facts show that Allen immediately upon discovery of the dangerous position of the cows went with reasonable diligence to the scene and made at least some effort in good faith to perform his duty, the degree of which is for the jury. Richmond v. McNeill, 81 Or. 342, 49 Pac. 879. There could be no contributory negligence by plaintiff, except there is a failure on his part, or on the part of some person with whose negligence he is chargeable, to exercise ordinary care to avoid the injury, and such lack of ordinary care is the proximate cause of the injury. 7 Am. & Eng. Ency. (2d Ed.) 373. And there has been no want of ordinary care, when, under all the circumstances and surroundings of the case, the person injured, or those whose negligence is imputable to him, did or omitted nothing which an ordinarily careful and prudent person similarly situated would not have done or omitted. Id. 378. When both the duty and the extent of its performance are to be ascertained as facts, a jury alone can determine what is negligence and whether it has been proven. West Phlla. Pass. Ry. Co. v. Gallagher, 108 Pa. 524; Robinson v. Cone, 22 Vt. 213, 54 Am. Dec. 67. The court did not err in denying defendant's motion for a nonsuit.

The court refused to instruct the jury upon defendant's request to return a verdict in its favor, and this action of the court is assigned as error. This request was based upon no other contention than that made to support the motion for nonsuit, and that has been considered and disposed of adversely to defendant. Defendant excepted to the giving of this instruction: "Whether or not defendant should have fenced that portion of its track upon which plaintiff's cattle entered is a matter for your determination from the evidence. If you find from the evidence that that portion of defendant's track was within defendant's depot yards, then the defendant was under no obligation to fence; otherwise it should have fenced," and error is assigned on that account. It is insisted that as evidence in this case is not conflicting or uncontradicted, it was not a question for the jury to determine whether or not the defendant ought to have fenced its track at the place or places where plaintiff's cattle were killed, or whether or not such places were within defendant's depot and switching yard, but that it was a matter of law for the court to declare.

Plaintiff's evidence shows that there are about 1½ miles of unfenced track from Sumpter toward Baker City; that it is three-fourths of a mile from Sumpter to the head of a switch for a siding running back towards Sumpter about 200 feet, which is used for storing slab wood for the use of defendant's engines; that further on in the direction of Baker City about 150 yards from this switch the branch line to Austin leaves the main line and forms the head or point of the "Y." The cows were killed near the switch for the "Sumpter Siding," and on the side thereof toward Baker City. There is no suggestion in plaintiff's evidence that Sumpter Siding was a part of or was used in connection with the depot at Sumpter.

The defendant's evidence is not found in the bill of exception; but there is on file a separate transcript of what appears to be some evidence taken in this case, and includes what purports to be some at least of defendant's testimony, but it is not identified in any manner by the court, or certified to be any or all of the testimony in this case, and for that reason it cannot be legally considered. However, as the parties have printed in their briefs some excerpts therefrom, we have not refrained from looking into it. It shows, in substance, that switching is done daily at the "Y" in reversing engines and trains for the branch line; but this of itself does not tend to make the "Y" or that part of the main track between it and Sumpter Siding a part of the depot grounds of Sumpter Station, three-fourths of a mile distant, or that of itself it constituted a separate and distinct depot or station, within the limitations stated in Willmot v. O. R. & N. Co., 48 Or. 494, 87 Pac. 528, 7 L. R. A. (N. S.) 202. Switching is not the principal thing that constitutes a depot, but is only an incident of it. In our judgment, the correct distinction is stated in an extended footnote to that case found in 7 L. R. A. (N. S.) 203, where it is said: "A very clearly defined principle regulates this question—the principle of paramount public importance of the public good or convenience over private rights. Fence laws have been passed very generally in all parts of the country, compelling railroad companies to fence their tracks in order to protect individuals from injuries to their stock straying thereon. But at stations where the general public has a right of access, and the necessary transactions of the road require it, an exception either by express language in the statute or by construction of the courts has come to be made in almost every instance to the general obligation to fence, on the ground that the public right of access overrules the private right of protection. The question, then, of how far this exception to the obligation to fence extends, or, in other words, how far or what are station or depot grounds, is decided by determining how far the public convenience requires an open track." There is no public convenience to be conserved at a place used exclusively for switching. The public has no right of access where no passengers get on or off the train or no freight is loaded and unloaded. There is a suggestion in the evidence, however, that sometimes freight billed to Sumpter is put off at this "Y" as an accommodation. But that fact cannot, as a matter of law, be said to be sufficient to create a general public right of access to defendant's tracks at that point, so as to excuse it from the duty of fencing. We are of the opinion, therefore, that the court could not, as a matter of law, declare the place where plaintiff's cows were killed to be a necessary part of defendant's station at Sumpter, or part of an independent station at the "Y," so as to excuse it from the legal duty to fence its tracks.

It follows that the judgment must be affirmed.

THORSEN et al. v. HOOPER et al.

(Supreme Court of Oregon. Jan. 21, 1908.)

1. GARNISHMENT — CLAIMS SUBJECT TO GARNISHMENT—INDEBTEDNESS OF ESTATE.

A debt due from a decedent's estate is not subject to garnishment until the share of the creditor, heir, or legatee has been ascertained and ordered paid by the court, prior to which the money or funds of the estate are in custodia legis, and not subject to levy.

2. PAYMENT — VOLUNTARY PAYMENT — RECOVERY.

One who voluntarily pays money in satisfaction of an asserted demand, with full knowledge of all the facts, cannot recover it when the transaction is unaffected by any fraud, trust, confidence, or the like because at the time of the payment he was ignorant of his legal rights.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 39, Payment, §§ 253–266.]

3. SAME—MISTAKE OF FACT.

Payment of an illegal demand made under a mistake of fact may be recovered in an action for money had and received.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 39, Payment, §§ 272–281.]

4. SAME.

An administrator having been garnished in a suit in which the attorney for the state represented the creditor, judgment was recovered in favor of the creditor, on which an execution was placed in the hands of the sheriff for service, who notified the administrator that he had an order from the circuit court directing him to pay out of the funds of the estate the amount of the judgment and costs. The administrator thereupon advised with the attorney of the estate without knowledge that he was also representing the creditor in the garnishment proceedings, and was advised that the proceedings were regular, and that he was compelled to pay the money to the sheriff as demanded, which he thereupon did. Held, that the circuit court never having made an order in the garnishment proceedings requiring the administrator to pay the amount of the judgment out of the funds of the estate, the payment was made on mistake of fact, and was recoverable.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 39, Payment, §§ 272–281.]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Union County; T. H. Crawford, Judge.

Action by J. B. Thorsen and others, as administrators of the estate of H. L. Buell, deceased, against J. A. Hooper and another. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed and remanded.

This is an action for money had and received, and comes here on appeal from a judgment on the pleadings in favor of defendants. The facts are set out in detail in the pleadings of the respective parties. Briefly, they are: That plaintiffs are the administrators of the estate of H. L. Buell, deceased, and N. C. McLeod was their attorney and legal adviser. At the time of his death Buell was indebted to H. C. Brown on a promissory note for $1,000, with John Graham as surety. After the appointment of plaintiffs Brown presented to them a duly verified claim against the estate of their decedent for the amount due on such note. After such presentation the defendants, Hooper & Hudson, through McLeod, as their attorney, commenced an action at law in the circuit court of Union county against Oscar Eaden and H. C. Brown, partners doing business under the firm name of Eaden & Brown, to recover the sum of $342.35, and caused a writ of attachment to issue in such action. A copy of the writ, together with a notice of garnishment, was served on J. B. Thorsen, one of the plaintiffs, and in answer thereto he stated that "there is a balance due H. C. Brown of $500, on principal and accrued interest." The defendants afterwards recovered judgment in their action against Eaden & Brown, and an order of the circuit court reciting the attachment of the claim of Brown against the Buell estate, and directing that the attached property be sold as on execution to pay the judgment, costs, and disbursements, and that the "claim in said hands of said administrators may be collected if the proceeds thereof can be so collected by the sheriff under his execution or order of sale herein." A few days later an execution was issued on this judgment, and placed in the hands of the sheriff for service, who notified plaintiff Thorsen, by telephone, that he had an order from the circuit court directing him to pay out of the funds of the Buell estate the amount of the judgment and costs of Hooper & Hudson against Eaden & Brown. Thorsen thereupon advised with McLeod, his attorney, without knowledge that McLeod was also attorney for defendants, and McLeod told him that the attachment proceedings were regular, and that he was compelled to pay the money over to the sheriff as demanded. Thorsen, acting upon the statement of the sheriff as to the nature of the order of the circuit court and the advice of McLeod, paid the money over to the sheriff, and it was afterwards paid by that officer to the defendants. At the time of the service of the garnishment process upon Thorsen no order of the county court had been made for a distribution of the funds of the Buell estate or directing the administrators to pay the claim of Brown, and the promissory note, upon which such claim was based, did not belong to Brown, but had previously been assigned by him to Jennie P. Brown, who subsequently sued and recovered the amount thereon from Graham, the surety.

J. D. Slater, for appellants. C. H. Finn, for respondents.

BEAN, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). The debt due from the Buell estate on the claim presented by Brown was not subject to attachment by Brown's creditor at the time the writ of garnishment was served upon Thorsen, one of the administrators. No order of the county court had been made settling the claim or directing its payment, and until the share of a creditor, heir, or legatee of an estate has been ascertained and ordered paid by the court the money or funds of the estate are in the custody of the law, and not subject to levy under execution or process of garnishment. But the defendants contend that the payment of the money to the sheriff by Thorsen was voluntarily made, and therefore cannot be recovered by him and his co-administrators. It is well settled that one who voluntarily pays money in satisfaction of an asserted demand, with full knowledge of all the facts, cannot recover it when the transaction is unaffected by any fraud, trust, confidence, or the like, because at the time of the payment he was ignorant of his rights under the law. Shriver v. Garrison, 30 W. Va. 456, 4 S. E. 660; Brumagin v. Tillinghast, 18 Cal. 265, 79 Am. Dec. 176; Evans v. Hughes County, 3 S. D. 244, 52 N. W. 1062; Commercial Bank of Rochester v. City of Rochester, 42 Barb. 488; Erkens v. Nicollin, 39 Minn. 461, 40 N. W. 567. But it is equally as well settled that when the payment of an illegal demand is made under a mistake of fact it may be recovered in an action for money had and received. Stokes v. Goodykoontz, 126 Ind. 535, 26 N. E. 391; Wolf v. Bealrd, 123 Ill. 585, 15 N. E. 161, 5 Am. St. Rep. 565; Walker v. Hill, 17 Mass. 380; Rogers v. Weaver, 5 Ohio, 536. These questions are ably and exhaustively considered by Mr. Justice Wolverton, in his opinion in Scott v. Ford, 45 Or. 531, 78 Pac. 742, 80 Pac. 899, and it is unnecessary to add to the discussion at this time.

Now it appears from the facts, as alleged in the pleadings in the case at bar, that the payment by Thorsen to the sheriff was made under a mistake of fact as to the nature of the order of the circuit court and upon the advice of the attorney for the defendants, who he supposed at the time was acting for the estate. Thorsen was notified by the sheriff that the circuit court had made an order in the attachment proceedings requiring him to pay the amount of the judgment, recovered by Hooper & Hudson against Eaden & Brown, out of the funds of the estate, and that such order was in the hands of the officer for execution, when, in fact, no such order had been made. Relying upon this statement, and the erroneous advice of the attorney for the defendants, he paid the amount of the judgment out of the trust funds in his hands, and the money was subsequently paid to the defendants. If these facts are true, and for the purposes of this case it must be so assumed, we think that in equity and good conscience plaintiff should be permitted to recover it.

Judgment of the court below will therefore be reversed, and cause remanded, with directions to overrule the motion of defendants for judgment on the pleadings, and for such further proceedings as may be proper, not inconsistent with this opinion.

(Supreme Court of Oregon. Jan. 21, 1908.)

1. COURTS—PROBATE COURTS—JURISDICTION.

The county court, in exercising jurisdiction in probate, is a superior court of general jurisdiction.

2. JUDGMENT—PLEADING—PROBATE DECREE.

In pleading a judgment of the county court sitting in probate, it is only necessary to allege that the judgment was rendered in a probate matter, it being presumed therefrom that the court acted within the authority conferred on it by law.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 30, Judgment, § 1797.]

3. REFORMATION OF INSTRUMENTS — ADMINISTRATOR'S DEED—COMPLAINT.

A complaint to reform an administrator's deed, after alleging the issuance of letters of administration and the application of the proceeds of the sale of all personal property to the payment of administration expenses and debts of the estate, and reciting the filing of a petition for the sale of real estate and the necessity therefor, alleged an order by the county court authorizing the administrator to sell all the real estate of the decedent, including property specially described, the court finding that it was necessary to sell the real estate in order to pay debts and administration expenses. Held, that the complaint sufficiently showed that the county court when it rendered the judgment was sitting as a probate court having under consideration a probate matter, and that on the administrator's petition it directed the sale of real estate, the title to which was in question, so that complainant was entitled to the reformation of the administrator's deed on an allegation that by mutual mistake the lands were misdescribed.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Wheeler County; W. L. Bradshaw, Judge.

Suit by J. B. Nolan against Clyde Hughes. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

H. B. Nicholas, for appellant. H. H. Hendricks, for respondent.

EAKIN, J. Plaintiff brings this suit in equity to reform the deed of an administrator, made upon the sale of real estate in a probate proceeding. A demurrer to the complaint was overruled, and a decree rendered for the relief asked, and defendant appeals.

But one question is raised upon this appeal, viz., whether the county court had jurisdiction of the heirs in the probate proceeding to order the sale of the property. This question, however, is not before us upon the facts, but only upon the sufficiency of the pleading.

The complaint, after alleging the issuance of letters of administration to F. M. Templeton, and the application of the proceeds of the sale of all personal property to the payment of expenses of the administration and debts of the estate, and reciting the filing of the petition for the sale of the real estate and the necessity therefor, alleges the order for the sale of the realty in the following language, viz.: "That thereafter, on the 25th day of February, 1895, such proceedings were had in said county court that the said F. M. Templeton, as the administrator of the estate of said decedent, was duly and regularly authorized and empowered, by an order of said court, which was duly entered, to sell all of the real estate of said decedent, including the said E. ½ of S. W. ¼ of section 33, township 8 S., range 25 E. W. M., properly describing it, the court finding that it was necessary to sell the said real estate of decedent in order to pay the remaining expenses, funeral charges, and claims still due and unpaid against the said estate."

The principal contention of the defendant is that the county court did not have jurisdiction of the parties, and that before it can acquire jurisdiction there must be personal service upon the heirs in the manner provided by law. But the question arises here whether the complaint in this suit sufficiently alleges the decree of the county court. The county court, in exercising the jurisdiction pertaining to probate matters, is a superior court of general jurisdiction, and in such case it is necessary, in pleading the judgment of such court, only that it appear that the judgment was rendered in a probate matter; and thereafter the presumption arises that the court acted within the authority conferred upon it by law. In Rutenic v. Hamakar, 40 Or. 444, 450, 67 Pac. 196, 199, Mr. Justice Moore reviews the authorities on both these questions at length, and holds: "In a judgment rendered by a court of general and superior jurisdiction, however, every fact necessary to confer jurisdiction will be presumed in order to support the validity of the judgment. * * * The county court in probate matters is a court of general and superior jurisdiction, * * * and as it is unnecessary to allege a fact which the law will presume, * * * the plaintiff was not required to allege that said court had secured jurisdiction of the person and subject-matter, so that the complaint is not vulnerable to the objection that it does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, notwithstanding it failed to allege that the order removing the administrator was 'duly' given or made." This ruling is sustained by all the authorities. 11 Ency. Pl. & Pr. 1130; Black, Judgments, § 966. The cases of Galpin v. Page, 85 U. S. 366, 21 L. Ed. 959, and Cox v. Matthews, 17 Ind. 376, and other cases cited by defendant, are not in point on these questions, as they were before the court upon the facts.

The complaint sufficiently shows that the county court, when it rendered the judgment, was sitting as a probate court, having under consideration a probate matter in the administration of the estate of a deceased person, and that upon the petition of the administrator it directed the sale of the real estate of decedent, the title to which is in question here, and further alleges that, in the execution of the deed to the purchaser at such sale, by mutual mistake of the administrator and the purchaser, viz., by a clerical error, the lands were misdescribed in such deed, and asks that the deed be reformed.

These matters being uncontroverted, this is sufficient to entitle plaintiff to the relief claimed, and the decree of the lower court is affirmed.

BADE v. HIBBERD.

(Supreme Court of Oregon. Jan. 21, 1908.)

1. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE—APPEAL—RECORD—CONCLUSIVENESS—IMPEACHING BY AFFIDAVITS.

Where the record of a justice's court states that a reply was filed in that court before trial, and the reply is attached to the justice's transcript and returned as one of the original papers in the case, the record cannot be impeached by ex parte affidavits because the justice failed to indorse on the reply the date of its filing.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 31, Justices of the Peace, §§ 633-636.]

2. RECORDS—FILING FOR RECORD—NECESSITY OF INDORSEMENT.

A paper is filed for record in contemplation of law when it is delivered to the proper officer with the intention that it shall become part of the official record, and by him received to be kept on file, and the filing is not affected by the officer's failure to indorse the paper as filed.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 42, Records, § 6.]

3. PLEADING — COMPLAINT — OBJECTION ON TRIAL—PRESUMPTION.

Where an objection to the sufficiency of the complaint is made for the first time on the trial by objecting to the reception of any evidence thereunder, the same presumption will be indulged in to support the pleading as if the objection had been made after verdict, and unless the complaint is so defective that it would not be good after verdict the objection will be overruled.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 30, Pleading, §§ 1433-1436.]

4. SAME — INSUFFICIENT DESCRIPTION OF INSTRUMENT SUED ON—CURE BY VERDICT.

An insufficient description of contracts on which suit is brought is merely a defective statement of the cause of action, which would be cured by verdict.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 39, Pleading, §§ 1467-1472.]

5. ACTION—JOINDER—CAUSES ARISING UNDER CONTRACT.

Under the express provisions of B. & C. Comp. § 94, causes of action arising out of contract may be united in the same complaint.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 1, Action, §§ 430-443.]

6. PLEADING — COMPLAINT — SEPARATE CAUSES OF ACTION—SEPARATE STATEMENT—OBJECTION WHEN TO BE TAKEN.

The objection that separate causes of action are not separately stated cannot be raised during the admission of testimony, but should be taken by motion to strike out under B. & C. Comp. § 106, providing that when a pleading contains more than one cause of action, if they be not pleaded separately, the pleading may be stricken out on motion of the adverse party.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 39, Pleading, § 1151.]

7. CONTRACT — ACTION FOR BREACH — EVIDENCE.

In an action to recover a balance due for services and for merchandise sold, evidence examined, and held for the jury.

8. EVIDENCE—PAYMENT—PAYMENT BY CHECK—PAROL EVIDENCE TO EXPLAIN.

A memorandum on a check received in payment of merchandise sold that it is for the balance due on a particular item of indebtedness is not conclusive on the seller, but may be explained by parol.

9. APPEAL—REVIEW—PRESUMPTION — PLEADINGS.

Where a complaint is indefinite as to the character of a contract sued on, but contains averments which seem to imply that it was an express contract, and no objection is made to the complaint until the trial, on appeal the action will be construed as on an express contract.

10. CONTRACTS—RESCISSION.

The fact that defendant, after contracting with plaintiff to cut grain, rented the land upon which the grain was to be grown to a tenant, who was to pay for the cutting of the grain, did not operate as a rescission of his contract with plaintiff, nor relieve him from liability thereon, since plaintiff was not a party to the second contract.

11. TRIAL—RECEPTION OF EVIDENCE—ORDER OF PROOF—ADMISSION IN REBUTTAL OF EVIDENCE PROPER IN CHIEF—DISCRETION OF COURT.

Where defendant placed in evidence during plaintiff's evidence in chief a check given by defendant to plaintiff containing a memorandum implying that it was for the balance due on an item of plaintiff's claim, and introduced evidence to show that plaintiff received the check without objecting to the memorandum, the court could in its discretion allow plaintiff in rebuttal to testify that the memorandum was not on the check when he received it.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Union County; T. H. Crawford, Judge.

Action by G. W. Bade against C. R. Hibberd. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

This action was commenced in the justice's court to recover money. The complaint alleges that between January and September, 1906, defendant became indebted to plaintiff in the sum of $369.50 for work and labor in cutting 79 acres of grain at the agreed price of $1.25 per acre, amounting to $98.75, and for 285 sacks of wheat sold and delivered at 95 cents per sack, amounting to $270.75, which defendant promised and agreed to pay; that no part thereof has been paid, except by the delivery to plaintiff of 120,000 feet of saw logs, at the agreed price of 85 cents per 1,000, amounting to $102, and by a check of $187.40, leaving a balance due of $80, for which judgment is demanded. Defendant by his answer denies all the material allegations of the complaint, and for a further and separate defense avers that on or about the 18th of October, 1906, he and plaintiff had a full and complete settlement for cutting 15 acres of the grain, set out and included in the first item of the complaint, at $1.25 per acre, and 285 sacks of wheat, mentioned in the second item of the complaint, and it was then and there mutually agreed that the credits referred to in the complaint in the sum of $289.40 should be applied in full payment for cutting said 15 acres of grain, and for the 285 sacks of wheat and for no other purpose. Plaintiff had a judgment for $80 in the justice's court, and defendant appealed to the circuit court. A transcript on appeal was filed in the circuit court; but, being incomplete and not properly certified, was, on motion of defendant, withdrawn and returned to the justice for correction and certification, and as again filed contained a copy of the justice's docket, showing that a reply was filed before the cause was set for trial, and annexed to the transcript is a reply, denying generally all the allegations of the answer, but which has no file marks thereon. Defendant moved the circuit court to strike such reply from the transcript, for the reason that it was not filed by the justice, and neither accompanied or was referred to in the transcript as first filed in the circuit court. This motion was overruled, and trial had, resulting in judgment in favor of plaintiff, from which defendant appeals.

C. H. Finn, for appellant. J. F. Baker, for respondent.

BEAN, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). The motion to strike the reply from the transcript was properly denied. The record of the justice's court states that the reply was filed in that court before trial, and the justice attached such reply to the transcript and returned it as one of the original papers in the cause, and this record cannot be impeached by ex parte affidavits. The fact that the justice failed to indorse on the reply the date of its filing is of no consequence. A paper is filed in contemplation of law when it is delivered to the proper officer with the intention that it shall become a part of the official record, and by him received to be kept on file, and such filing is not affected by the officer's failure to indorse the same. McDonald v. Crusen, 2 Or. 258; Conant's Estate, 43 Or. 530, 73 Pac. 1018.

On the trial defendant objected to the admission of any testimony on behalf of plaintiff, for the reason that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and because two causes of action are improperly united. The objection to the sufficiency of the complaint being made for the first time on the trial, the same presumption will be indulged in to support the pleading, as if the objection had been made after verdict. Specht v. Allen, 12 Or. 117, 6 Pac. 494; McCall v. Porter, 42 Or. 49, 70 Pac. 820, 71 Pac. 976; Patterson v. Patterson, 40 Or. 560, 67 Pac. 664; Currey v. Butcher, 37 Or. 380, 61 Pac. 631. Unless, therefore, the complaint is so fatally defective that it would not be good after verdict, the objection to the admission of testimony in its support was properly overruled. The objection made to the complaint is that the contracts under which the services are alleged to have been rendered and the grain sold by plaintiff to defendant are not sufficiently set out; but this is manifestly nothing more than a mere defective statement and of good cause of action, and such as would be cured by verdict. Booth v. Moody, 30 Or. 222, 46 Pac. 884. The causes of action mentioned in the complaint both arise out of contracts, and can be properly united in the same complaint. B. & C.

Comp. § 94. The objection that they are not separately stated should have been taken by motion at the proper time (B. & C. Comp. § 106), and cannot be raised during the admission of testimony.

The plaintiff testified that he cut 79 acres of grain for defendant under a contract by which he was to receive $1.25 per acre, to be paid in logs at 85 cents per 1,000, and that he sold and delivered to him 285 sacks of wheat at 95 cents per sack; that he received of defendant, on account thereof, 120,000 feet of logs at 85 cents per 1,000, and $187.40 by check, and identified a check for that amount in his favor signed by defendant, which had, as a memorandum thereon, the words "balance on wheat"; that the logs received by him more than paid for cutting the grain, but that defendant had not paid in full for the wheat. At the close of plaintiff's testimony defendant moved for a nonsuit on the ground that since defendant admitted that the cutting of the grain had been paid by logs delivered to him by defendant, and the check received by him as a payment on the wheat, shows on its face that it was for the balance thereon, nothing remained due plaintiff on the causes of action set out in the complaint. But this motion was properly overruled. While defendant testified that the value of the logs delivered to him by plaintiff, if applied on the account for cutting the grain, would overpay such account, he insisted that there was still a balance due on the wheat sold and delivered. The action is brought to recover a balance of $80, alleged to be due plaintiff from defendant on the two items mentioned in the complaint, and it can make no difference, so far as the ultimate rights of the parties are concerned, whether the value of the logs be applied on one or the other. The memorandum on the check that it was for the balance due on the wheat was not conclusive on plaintiff, but was subject to be explained by parol, and the weight to be given it was for the jury.

Plaintiff, over defendant's objections and exceptions, gave testimony tending to show that in January, 1906, he contracted with defendant to purchase from him some saw logs, thereafter to be cut, at 85 cents per 1,000. In consideration of which he agreed to cut certain grain for defendant during the following season at $1.25 an acre. Objection is made to this testimony, because it tends to show an express contract, while it is claimed the complaint is on a quantum meruit. The complaint is somewhat indefinite and uncertain as to the character of the contract sued upon; but it is averred that the work was to be done at an agreed price per acre, which would seem to imply that it was under an express contract, and as no objection was made to the complaint until the trial, it should now be construed as an action on such a contract.

Defendant gave evidence tending to show that in May, 1906, after the making of the alleged contract with plaintiff, he informed him that he had leased the land upon which the grain was to be grown to one McCulloch, who was to pay for the cutting of the grain and all expenses of the farm after the 1st of March, 1906. Defendant claims that this amounted to a rescission of the contract between himself and plaintiff, and requested the court to so instruct the jury. A rescission of the contract is not pleaded as a defense, nor is the evidence referred to sufficient for that purpose. It is only to the effect that after the making of the contract with plaintiff defendant leased the land upon which the grain was to be grown, and the tenant agreed to pay for the harvesting thereof; but this was a contract between the defendant and his tenant, to which the plaintiff was not a party, and did not relieve defendant from his liability on his contract with the plaintiff.

Complaint is also made because the court permitted plaintiff in rebuttal to testify that the words "balance on wheat," appearing on the check given to him by defendant and introduced in evidence, were not on such check at the time it was delivered; but this evidence was competent, and the order of proof was in the discretion of the trial court.

There are several other assignments of error in the record, but on examination we are satisfied that they are without merit. Judgment of the court below is affirmed.

RODMAN v. MANNING et al.

(Supreme Court of Oregon. Jan. 21, 1908.)

1. APPEAL — FILING NOTICE AND PROOF OF SERVICE — TRANSCRIPT — IMPEACHING OR CONTRADICTING RECORD.

B. & C. Comp. § 549, provides that, when an appeal is not taken at the time the decision is rendered, it may be taken at any time within six months thereafter by serving a notice on the adverse party or his attorney, and filing the original with proof of service indorsed thereon with the clerk. Held that, where the notice of appeal as it appeared in the transcript showed that it was filed August 26th, while the indorsement of proof of service was dated September 26th, appellants could not contradict the transcript by extraneous evidence showing that the service was in fact admitted August 28th, and the notice with the indorsement of such admission thereon was afterwards filed with the clerk, the remedy being by application to the court below to correct the record.

2. SAME—WAIVER.

Service and filing of notice of appeal are essential to give the Supreme Court jurisdiction, and cannot be waived by the parties.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 2, Appeal and Error, §§ 2168-2172.]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Lane County; L. T. Harris, Judge.

Action by Jack Rodman against Wm. P. Manning and others. Decree for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Appeal dismissed.

I. N. Harbaugh and Covert & Stapleton, for appellants. Williams & Bean, for appellee.

PER CURIAM. On August 1, 1907, plaintiff recovered a decree in the circuit court for Lane county against defendants, and from this decree defendants attempt to appeal. The notice of appeal, as it appears in the transcript, shows that it was filed on August 26th, and the indorsement of proof of service is dated the 26th of the following month. The plaintiff moves to dismiss the appeal for want of jurisdiction, because the proof of service of the notice was not indorsed thereon at the time it was filed. The statute provides that, when an appeal is not taken at the time the decision is rendered, it may be taken at any time within six months thereafter by serving a notice on the adverse party or his attorney, "and filing the original with proof of service indorsed thereon," with the clerk. Section 549, B. & C. Comp. It has been held under similar statutory provisions that a notice of appeal, when filed, must be accompanied by proof of service in the shape of an indorsement thereon, and that service cannot be made and proof thereof placed on the notice after it has been filed. Briney v. Starr, 6 Or. 207; Hennessey v. Wells, 16 Or. 266, 19 Pac. 121. Defendants claim, however, and have filed ex parte affidavits to show, that the dates of filing of notice and acknowledgment of service thereof, as they appear on the transcript, are erroneous, and in fact the service was admitted on August 28th, and the notice with the indorsement of such admission thereon was afterwards filed with the clerk. But, if there is an error in the record in this respect, the remedy is by application to the court below to correct the same, and the transcript as filed here cannot be contradicted or impeached by extraneous evidence. Briney v. Starr, supra. Again, it is said that plaintiff has waived the objection by filing his brief in this court; but the service and filing of the notice of appeal are indispensable in order to give this court jurisdiction, and cannot be waived by the parties. Oliver v. Harvey, 5 Or. 360; Wolf v. Smith, 6 Or. 73.

We need not consider at this time what the effect would have been if defendants had applied to and obtained permission from the court below to withdraw the notice from the files, and had refiled it, after the date of admission of the service thereon, as that question is not before us. Upon the record as it stands we have no alternative, under the previous decisions of the court, but to dismiss the appeal, and it is so ordered.

FIRST NAT. BANK OF POMEROY, IOWA. v. McCULLOUGH et al.

(Supreme Court of Oregon. Jan. 21, 1908.)

1. TRIAL — RECEPTION OF EVIDENCE — ORDER OF PROOF — STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

In an action by a bank on notes transferred to it without indorsement, admission of evidence tending to show that the original holder had agreed to cancel the notes before showing that the one transferring the notes to the bank had knowledge of the agreement is not error, in view of B. & C. Comp. § 842, providing that the order of proof shall be regulated by the sound discretion of the court.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 46, Trial, §§ 138-141.]

2. APPEAL—QUESTIONS TO BE CONSIDERED—MATTERS NOT RAISED IN LOWER COURT.

Where a bank sues on notes indorsed to its cashier in his own name only, and the question of the bank's right to maintain the action is not raised at the trial, it cannot be considered on appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 2, Appeal and Error, §§ 1184-1189.]

3. EVIDENCE—PAROL EVIDENCE AS TO INDORSEMENT—STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

The provision of the negotiable instruments law (B. & C. Comp. § 4444) that, when an instrument is drawn or indorsed to a person as "cashier" of a bank, it is deemed prima facie to be payable to the bank of which he is such officer, and may be negotiated by the indorsement of either the bank or the officer, was based on the theory that the qualifying word creates an ambiguity as to the real party intended, to explain which parol evidence is admissible; but, where a note is indorsed to N. without any qualifying word, even if N. is in fact the cashier of a bank, parol evidence is not admissible to show that the bank was the party intended as the indorsee.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 20, Evidence, § 2110.]

4. APPEAL—REVIEW—CROSS-EXAMINATION—BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—MATTERS TO BE SHOWN.

An assignment of error as to permitting cross-examination of a witness regarding matters not testified to on direct examination cannot be considered, when the bill of exceptions does not purport to contain all his testimony on direct examination.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, §§ 2900-2904.]

5. BILLS AND NOTES—TRANSFER WITHOUT INDORSEMENT—EFFECT—DEFENSES.

Under the law merchant, which has become a part of the common law, a transfer of a promissory note, payable to order, to bar equities, must be by indorsement to one who has no notice of the equities, and for a valuable consideration before maturity. Hence, where a note is indorsed to the cashier of a bank, who delivers it to the bank without indorsement, in a suit thereon by the bank the note is subject to all equities existing in favor of the makers.

6. SAME—RIGHT OF ACTION—STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

A transfer without indorsement of a promissory note, payable to order, assigns under the law merchant only an equitable right, which could be enforced by suit in the name of the payee only; but under B. & C. Comp. § 27, providing that every action, with certain exceptions, shall be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest, a bank may maintain an action in its own name on a note transferred to it without indorsement.

7. APPEAL—DECISIONS REVIEWABLE—FINAL ORDERS—DENIAL OF NEW TRIAL.

The denial of a motion for a new trial is not a final order from which an appeal will lie.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 2, Appeal and Error, § 741.]

8. SAME—RESERVATION OF GROUNDS OF REVIEW.

A decision of a trial court is not reviewable on appeal, unless the question was distinctly presented to the trial court for its action. Hence, where the trial court was not requested to give any instruction involving a consideration of all the testimony, the evidence will not be examined on appeal to determine whether, on the whole evidence, the judgment was right.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 2, Appeal and Error, §§ 1309-1314.]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Umatilla County; Henry J. Bean, Judge.

Action by First National Bank of Pomeroy, Iowa, against B. F. McCullough and another. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

This is an action by the First National Bank of Pomeroy, Iowa, a corporation, against B. F. McCullough and M. H. Gillette, to recover on two promissory notes. The facts, so far as deemed material herein, are that on March 2, 1904, and November 23d of that year the defendants obtained from one W. J. Furnish leases of certain lands in Umatilla county for a term which would expire March 1, 1907, agreeing to give for the use of the premises $640 annually. This sum was evidenced by their negotiable promissory notes, executed to Furnish, for $512 and $128, respectively, which instruments, given for the rent of 1905, were payable June 1, 1906. The leases did not contain a covenant to the effect that in case of a sale of the real property the tenancy could be terminated at the option of either party. The landlord, in the fall of 1905, listed the land with one M. L. Moody, an agent, for sale, to whom he duly indorsed the notes, which would mature June 1, 1906. The agent having entered into a contract for the sale of the premises with one G. E. York, the defendants surrendered to the latter the possession of the real property, and relinquished to him all their rights under the leases. The notes mentioned were, prior to their maturity, transferred by the following indorsement: "Pay A. B. Nixon or order, waiving demand and notice of protest. H. L. Moody." The person named as the last indorsee was at the time of such transfer the cashier of the plaintiff bank. No part of the notes having been paid, this action was instituted without any other written transfer of the negotiable instruments. The complaint, embracing two causes of action, is in the usual form, states when the notes were executed, and contains, inter alia, in each count, the following averment: "That thereafter, and before the maturity thereof, said note was indorsed, transferred, and assigned to the plaintiff herein, and plaintiff is now the owner and holder of said note." The answer denies the material allegations of the complaint, states the facts, in substance as hereinbefore detailed, and avers, in effect, that about March 8, 1906, and while the defendants had a crop growing on the leased land, they, at the request of Furnish, who then was the owner and holder of the notes sued on, and at the solicitation of York, who had secured a contract for the purchase of the premises, surrendered to the latter the possession of the real property, in consideration of the cancellation of the notes given for the rent; that at that time Moody, who was then the agent of Furnish, was advised by the defendants of the payment of the notes, which, without any consideration therefor, and not in the ordinary course of business, were delivered to the plaintiff. The allegations of new matter in the answer were denied in the reply, and the cause having been tried, the defendants secured a verdict, and from the judgment rendered thereon, the plaintiff appeals.

John McCourt, for appellant. J. P. Winter, for respondents.

MOORE, J. (after stating the facts as above). It is contended that an error was committed in permitting the defendants to introduce evidence tending to show that the notes sued on were agreed to be canceled by Furnish without having first shown that Nixon, the cashier of the plaintiff bank, had knowledge of the alleged agreement. The order of proof is a matter within the sound discretion of the trial court, the exercise of which will not be disturbed, except for an abuse of such discretion. B. & C. Comp. § 842; Jones v. Peterson, 44 Or. 101, 74 Pac. 661. An examination of the bill of exceptions fails to disclose any misuse of the power thus reposed.

It is maintained that the court erred in striking out, over objection and exception, Moody's testimony to the effect that the notes in question were indorsed to the plaintiff. No question seems to have been raised at the trial as to the right of the bank to maintain this action as the real party in interest. The consideration of the exception reserved is therefore limited to an inquiry as to whether or not parol evidence was admissible to show that the indorsement of the notes to Nixon, though not designated as cashier, was such a transfer as vested the legal title in the bank, and precluded the defendants from maintaining any defense that they might have had against the payee or indorsee. We will examine the cases to which plaintiff's counsel call attention in support of the legal principle which they seek to invoke. In Arlington v. Hinds, 1 D. Chip. (Vt.) 431, 12 Am. Dec. 704, it was held that a note made to a town treasurer, "or his successors in office," might be sued by the town. In National Life Ins. Co. v. Allen, 116 Mass. 398, it was ruled that a principal might sue in his own name on a nonnegotiable promissory note, given for its benefit, but by its terms made payable to "J. T. Phelps, agent." In Bank of New York v. Bank of Ohio, 29 N. Y. 619, in adhering to the rule announced in the case of Bank of Genesee v. Patchin Bank, 19 N. Y. 312, it was determined that a bill drawn payable to "D. C. Converse, Esq., cashier," was payable to the bank of which he was the officer. So too, in Baldwin v. Bank of Newbury, 1 Wall. (U. S.) 234, 17 L. Ed. 534, it was adjudged that, where negotiable paper was drawn to a person by name, immediately after which appeared the word "cashier," but with no designation of the particular bank of which he was such officer, parol evidence was admissible to show that he was the cashier of the bank which was plaintiff in the suit, and that in taking the paper he was acting as agent for the corporation. The rule to be extracted from these decisions has been embodied in our statute, known as the "Uniform Negotiable Instrument Law," as follows: "When an instrument is drawn or indorsed to a person as 'cashier,' or other fiscal officer of a bank or corporation, it is deemed prima facie to be payable to the bank or corporation of which he is such officer, and may be negotiated by either the indorsement of the bank or corporation, or the indorsement of the officer." B. & C. Comp. § 4444. The clause just quoted, and the decisions adverted to, are undoubtedly based on the theory that the employment of the qualifying word "cashier" or other designation of a fiscal office, appended to the name of a payee or indorsee of commercial paper, creates an ambiguity as to the real party intended, to explain which parol evidence is admissible to show who is the principal for whose benefit such agent received or accepted the promise to pay a stipulated sum of money. In the case at bar, however, no official designation is added to Nixon's name, and hence no uncertainty is apparent from an inspection of the indorsement made by Moody to him, and parol evidence was inadmissible to control or vary the terms of the writing. In view of the purpose for which Moody's testimony was evidently offered, no error was committed in striking it out.

It is insisted that the court erred in requiring Moody to be cross-examined, over objection and exception, as to certain matters to which he had not theretofore testified. The bill of exceptions shows that this witness, on direct examination, identified the notes sued on, and stated that he sent them with other negotiable instruments to Nixon, from whom he received a draft in payment therefor. On cross-examination he was required to testify as to other matters, but as the bill of exceptions does not purport to contain all his testimony on direct examination, the error thus assigned is unavailing.

It is argued that, having taken an exception to the following part of the court's charge, an error was committed in giving it, to wit: "I instruct you, gentlemen of the jury, that the indorsement on the notes in question, under the evidence in this case, plaintiff did not come into possession of the notes in controversy in due course, or in the ordinary and usual course of business as recognized by the law; and therefore that any defense which these defendants may have had against said notes, if in the hands of the indorsee, H. L. Moody, will be available to the defendants as against this plaintiff." The uniform practice of merchants in transferring credits, represented by commercial paper, as a means of purchasing goods or settling accounts, gave rise to certain rules, demanded by the wants and convenience of trading communities, which are known as the law merchant, and have become a part of the common law. 7 Cyc. 520; Woodbury v. Roberts, 59 Iowa, 348, 13 N. W. 312, 44 Am. Rep. 685. An observance of these rules requires that the property represented by a promissory note, payable to order, when transferred to a designated party before maturity for a valuable consideration and without notice, should be evidenced by an indorsement on the instrument, or on a paper attached thereto, in order to bar the equities of antecedent parties. This method of transferring such property constitutes the ordinary or usual course of business, a departure from which is equivalent to a notice of equities, and subjects the negotiable instrument to defenses in the hands of a holder who has acquired a right thereto in any other manner. B. & C. Comp. § 4433; Randolph, Com. Paper (2d Ed.) § 789; Roberts v. Hall, 37 Conn. 205, 9 Am. Rep. 308; Franklin v. Twogood, 18 Iowa, 515; Elias v. Finnegan, 37 Minn. 144, 33 N. W. 330. In Osgood's Adm'rs v. Artt (C. C.) 17 Fed. 575, Mr. Justice Harlan, in discussing this subject, says: "It is a settled doctrine of the law merchant that the bona fide purchaser for value of negotiable paper, payable to order, if it be indorsed by the payee, takes the legal title unaffected by any equities which the payor may have as against the payee. But it is equally well settled that the purchaser, if the paper be delivered to him without indorsement, takes, by the law merchant, only the rights which the payee has, and therefore takes subject to any defense the payor may rightfully assert as against the payee." A transfer, without indorsement, of a promissory note payable to order, assigns to the holder, under the rules of the law merchant, only an equitable right, to enforce which suit was formerly required to be maintained in the name of the payee. Our statute demands that every action, except in certain cases not involved herein, shall be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest. B. & C. Comp. § 27. In Moore v. Miller, 6 Or. 254, 25 Am. Rep. 518, it was ruled that the holder of a note, payable to order, which had been transferred without indorsement, could maintain an action at law thereon in his own name. That decision, however, is not based on the section of the statute last referred to, but upon the fact that the evidence showed that the plaintiff therein possessed the title to the note sued on, and had the sole right to receive the money due thereon. As illustrating the right of a holder of a negotiable promissory note, transferred without indorsement, to maintain an action thereon in his own name, see the very able opinion of Circuit Judge Gilbert in First Nat. Bank v. Moore, 137 Fed. 505, 70 C. C. A.

89. This legal principle is here adverted to for the purpose of showing that Moody's testimony was excluded, not on the ground of establishing a right in the plaintiff to maintain an action in its corporate name, but to prove that the bank was an indorsee, in due course, though not named in the evidence of the transfer, nor was any fiscal designation appended to the name of the indorsee from which it could be inferred that the plaintiff was the party intended by the writing. The note sued on having been delivered by Nixon, without indorsement, to the plaintiff, the bank was authorized to maintain an action thereon in its own name; but it took and held the paper subject to all equities existing in favor of the makers, and this being so, no error was committed in giving the instruction under consideration.

It is contended that the court erred in refusing to set aside the verdict and to grant a new trial, on the ground that no contract had been consummated between Furnish and the defendant whereby the notes in question were to be canceled. The rule is settled in this state that the action of a court in granting or denying a motion for a new trial is not a final order from which an appeal lies. This principle has so often been announced that it is unnecessary to cite the cases which uphold the doctrine.

It is argued that as all the testimony given at the trial has been sent up a perusal thereof will conclusively show that no contract was ever entered into between the makers and the payee of the notes whereby they were to have been canceled, and hence the judgment should be reversed, and a new trial ordered. An appellate court is created to review errors alleged to have been committed by lower courts in the trial of law actions, to which rulings exceptions have been duly reserved. No determination of a trial court can be reviewed on appeal, unless the question has been distinctly presented to that tribunal for its action. In the case at bar the court was not requested to give any instruction that involved a consideration of all the testimony, and this being so, that exhibit attached to the bill of exceptions will not be examined.

Other alleged errors are assigned, but, believing them unimportant, the judgment is affirmed.

SENCERBOX v. FIRST NAT. BANK OF IDAHO.

(Supreme Court of Idaho. Jan. 15, 1908.)

1. HUSBAND AND WIFE—SEPARATE PROPERTY OF WIFE—CONTROL BY HUSBAND.

Under the provisions of section 2498, Rev. St. 1887, as they existed before amendment in 1903 (Sess. Laws 1903, p. 345), the husband had the management and control of the separate property of the wife during the continuance of the marriage, but could not sell or alienate any part of such property, nor incur the same unless by an instrument in writing, signed by the husband and wife, and acknowledged as provided by law.

2. PROPERTY—MONEY.

Under the provisions of subdivision 3, § 16, Rev. St. 1887, money is declared to be personal property.

3. HUSBAND AND WIFE—APPOINTMENT OF TRUSTEE.

Under the provisions of section 2490, Rev. St. 1887, if the wife has just cause to apprehend that her husband has mismanaged or wasted, or will mismanage or waste, her separate property, she, or some other person in her behalf, may apply to the district court for the appointment of a trustee to take charge of and manage her separate property.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 26, Husband and Wife, §§ 512-523.]

4. SAME.

And until the wife avails herself of the provisions of said section 2490, Rev. St. 1887, the husband has the management and control of his wife's separate property.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 26, Husband and Wife, §§ 512-523.]

5. SAME—MANAGEMENT AND CONTROL.

The words "management and control," as used in said section, have a well-defined meaning, and under the provisions of section 15, Rev. St. 1887, must be construed according to the context and approved usage of the language.

6. SAME—"MANAGE"—"CONTROL."

The power to manage implies the power to control. To manage money is to employ or invest it. The word "control" means to have authority over a particular matter or thing, and the phrase, "management and control," implies the possession of the thing managed or controlled, or the right to the possession thereof.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 2, pp. 1549-1552; vol. 5, pp. 4316-4317; vol. 8, pp. 7714, 7717.]

7. SAME.

The rights of married women as to the management and control of their separate property, and their power over it, in this state, depend mainly upon the Constitution and statutes of the state.

8. SAME—HUSBAND AS AGENT.

Under the provision of said section 2490, Rev. St. 1887, prior to amendment, the husband was made the statutory agent to manage and control the wife's separate property, and required no authority from her to constitute him such agent.

9. SAME.

Under the provisions of said section 2490, Rev. St. 1887, money which is the separate property of the wife is placed in the same category as other personal property, and the husband is made the statutory agent for the management and control thereof, and he has the right to its possession, and, under the provisions of said section, the husband was authorized to receive the separate estate of the wife for the purpose of its management and control, whether it consisted of money or other property.

10. SAME—RECEIPT OF HUSBAND.

The husband's receipt to a third party for the wife's separate property is a discharge to the person to whom it is given.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 26, Husband and Wife, § 530.]

11. SAME—FUNDS IN BANK.

As to her money, the power of management and control gives him the right to its possession, to draw it out of the bank where it is deposited, to keep it safely or invest it, or redeposit it in another bank, and to check it out.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 26, Husband and Wife, §§ 512-515.]

12. SAME—PAYMENT OF HUSBAND'S CHECK.

The husband, being the statutory agent of the wife, would have as much power over money deposited in the bank in her name as any other trustee would have over a like deposit of trust funds, and the bank would be under the same liability to pay out the money upon his check.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 26, Husband and Wife, §§ 524-529.]

13. SAME.

The plaintiff, by entering into the marriage relation with her husband under the law, made him her statutory agent for the management and control of her separate estate.

14. SAME.

The husband's management and control of the separate property of the wife is not limited to the property out of her possession, but to all her separate property, whether in or out of her possession at the time the agency begins.

Ailshie, C. J., dissenting.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from District Court, Ada County; George H. Stewart, Judge.

Action by Anna D. Sencerbox against the First National Bank of Idaho. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Hawley, Puckett & Hawley, for appellant. W. E. Borah, for respondent.

SULLIVAN, J. This is an action to recover from the respondent the sum of $2,001.25. The plaintiff alleges that she deposited with the defendant bank at different times, from the 3d day of January, 1898, to the 26th day of May, 1902, the sum of $4,430.76; that she checked against the same until the deposit was reduced to the sum of $2,001.25; and that, upon presentation of a check for that amount, payment was refused. The defense is that the entire amount so deposited was checked out either by plaintiff herself or her husband, he issuing checks bearing the name of the plaintiff and signed by himself. However, there were two checks signed by the husband alone. It is admitted that, during the times mentioned in the complaint, the plaintiff and one E. J. Sencerbox were husband and wife. The record clearly shows that the entire amount deposited was at different times paid out upon checks signed as above stated. The cause was tried by the court without a jury, and judgment was entered in favor of the defendant. This appeal is from the judgment.

Several of the errors assigned may be considered together, as they raise but one question, and that is the authority of the husband, under the statute as it existed at the time this transaction took place, to control and manage the separate property of the wife. It appears from the record that the plaintiff was absent from the city much of the time during which said money was drawn out of the bank, and that her husband had charge of her property, and made some sales thereof, and deposited a large part of said sum of $4,430.76 with the defendant bank in the plaintiff's name, and that he thereafter drew checks against said money so deposited in his own favor or in favor of the plaintiff, and signed them either in the name of the plaintiff by himself, or by himself alone. For some of the checks so drawn the defendant bank drew drafts in favor of the plaintiff, which were transmitted to her by her husband. It is admitted that she received $940 in that way. The question presented for determination is whether, under the provisions of section 2498, Rev. St. 1887, and other sections of our statutes bearing upon the rights of husband and wife, the husband had the authority to check against said bank account as he did. That section is as follows: "The husband has the management and control of the separate property of the wife, during the continuance of the marriage, but no sale or other alienation of any part of such property can be made, nor any lien or incumbrance created thereon, unless by an instrument in writing, signed by the husband and wife, and acknowledged by her upon an examination, separate and apart from the husband, as upon a conveyance of real estate." The provisions of that section were in force at the time this transaction occurred, but were repealed in 1903. See Sess. Laws 1903, p. 345.

As said section of the statute stood before it was amended in 1903, there was no exception as to the classes of the wife's separate property that were placed under the management and control of the husband by the provisions of said section. The statute reads: "The husband has the management and control of the separate property of the wife during the continuance of the marriage," etc.; and under the provisions of section 2499, Rev. St. 1837, if the wife had just cause to apprehend that her husband had mismanaged or wasted, or would mismanage or waste, her separate property, she, or any other person in her behalf, might apply to the district court for the appointment of a trustee to take charge of and manage her separate property or estate. She was not authorized to take charge of and manage her separate property under any conditions or facts; but, if a just cause existed, she could deprive her husband of his statutory right thereto. If that was done, it passed into the hands of a trustee. So, until the wife availed herself of the provisions of said section 2499, the husband had the management and control of the separate property of his wife during the continuance of the marriage; but no sale or alienation of such property can be made, nor any lien or incumbrance created thereon, unless by an instrument in writing signed by the husband and wife and acknowledged as provided by law. The words "management and control," as used in said section, are words of well-defined meaning. Those words have not acquired a peculiar and appropriate meaning or definition in and under the provisions of section 15, Rev. St. 1887. They must be construed according to the context and the approved usage of the language. Those words are of broad significance and meaning. The Century Dictionary defines the word "management" as "the act of managing by direction or regulation; conduct; administration; governing; direction; guidance; care; charge; superintendence." It defines the word "control" as meaning, "subject to authority; direct; regulate; govern; dominate; to have superior force and authority over." The Standard Dictionary defines "management" as "carrying on; directing; conducting; superintendence; having the general management, conduct or direction of something; acting as responsible or executive head"; and defines "control" as "to exercise a directing, restraining or governing influence over; regulate; regulating power; restraining or directing influence." In Sinking Fund v. Walker, 6 How. (Miss.) 186, 33 Am. Dec. 433, in defining the word "management," the court said: "The power to manage implies the power to control. It allows the exercise of discretion. It could not be managed without the power to do so, and, by requiring the one, the other was conferred. To manage money is to employ or invest it. It requires no other management." In Anderson v. Stockdale, 62 Tex. 61, in defining the word "control," the court said: "To have authority over a particular matter; to check, to restrain, to govern with reference thereto." The words "management and control" are used quite often in our statutes, as where the corporate business of a company is under the control of a board of directors, and an estate is under the management of an administrator, and in all such instances it appears that those words were intended to mean to govern, direct, and manage, in the full sense of those terms. In Bank of Monroe v. Gifford, 79 Iowa, 300, 44 N. W. 558, it is held that the control of paper securities implies the possession thereof. See, also, 2 Words and Phrases Judicially Defined, under the word "Control"; also 5 Words and Phrases Judicially Defined, under the words "Management and Control."

It must be understood that the rights of married women as to the management and control of their separate property, and their power over it, in the state of Idaho, does not depend alone on the principles of the common law, or upon the doctrines of the courts of equity, but mainly upon the Constitution and statutes of the state. See Maclay v. Love, 25 Cal. 368, 85 Am. Dec. 133. Under the provisions of section 2498, Rev. St. 1887, the husband is made the statutory agent to manage and control the wife's separate property. Now, if money is the separate property of the wife under the statute, unless that is excepted from the management and control of the husband, he certainly has the right to reduce it to his possession, and manage and control it. In the case at bar, the wife had deposited $794.95 in the defendant bank before her marriage. At the time of her marriage some of her money was deposited in said bank. The husband thereafter made certain collections for her, sold some property, and deposited the proceeds, amounting to $3,635.95, in said bank in her name, and thereafter drew out of said bank, by checks and sight draft, $2,001.25 of the money so deposited, and it is that sum that is involved in this action. The question arises whether the husband, under the statute giving him the management and control of his wife's separate property, had the authority to check or draw said money out of the defendant bank. The question naturally arises whether the money, which is the separate property of the wife, is classed in the same category as other personal property belonging to the wife, and placed, by the provisions of said section 2498, under the management and control of the husband. If it is, to what extent may he go in reducing such cash to his possession? Certainly, under the provisions of said statute the husband might reduce to his possession live stock and other personal property; for, if he is made the statutory agent of the wife to manage and control it, he certainly has the right to its possession. In 25 Ency. of Law, p. 427, it is stated: "The statutes in some jurisdictions expressly provide that the husband shall have the right to manage and control the wife's separate property. This management includes the power to make collection of her debts, and to invest the money of her separate estate coming into his hands, in such manner as he may deem best." In Evans v. English, 61 Ala. 422, under a statute giving the management and control of the wife's property to the husband, it is held that: "The power and duty of the husband is to receive the separate estate of the wife, whether it consist of money, choses in action, or other property, real or personal, and his receipt is a good discharge in law or equity to the persons surrendering it to him. This power he exercises solely, and not jointly or concurrently with the wife. The property thus received vests in him as trustee, and he has the right to manage and control the same. It is apparent that the title does not vest in the husband. That remains in the wife," etc.

The question arises under the law whether the wife can defeat the management and control of her separate property by the husband simply by placing her property in the possession of some third person. I think not, as the law provides but one way for her to prevent her husband from managing and controlling her separate estate, and that is by following the provisions of said section 2499—by having a trustee appointed.

In Evans v. English, supra, it is there held that it is not only the power, but the duty, of the husband to receive the separate estate of the wife, whether it consists of money or other property; and how can the husband have the management and control of personal property without the right to its possession? And in that case it is held that "the possession vests in the husband while the title remains in the wife."

In Marks v. Cowles, 53 Ala. 506, it is held: "The power of the husband is to receive the property of the wife—a power he is not required to exercise concurrently with the wife. His receipt, therefore, is a full discharge, in law and in equity, to the person to whom it is given. His duty is to manage and control the property," etc.

In Coleman v. Bank, 94 Tex. 605, 63 S. W. 867, 86 Am. St. Rep. 871, which is a case very much like the one at bar, after stating that that court was unable to find but little authority upon the question of the management of the wife's separate property by the husband, and that it was largely a matter of statutory regulation, and referring to the statutes, the court said: "But it [the statute] does imply that he may put it to its appropriate use so that it shall produce an income. As to her money, the power of management gives him the right to its possession to keep it safely, and hence to deposit it in the bank and to draw it out. Such being the authority of the husband under the law, he being the statutory agent for the management of her separate property and funds, he would have at least as much power over money deposited in the bank, even in her name, as any other trustee would have over a like deposit of trust funds, and the bank would be under the same liability to pay out the money upon his check." The court then refers to trustees and trust funds, as follows: "If such be the rule as to ordinary agents and trustees, it certainly is the rule in this state as to the husband relative to the wife's separate funds, of which, under our law, he has the sole management. If the money had been deposited by the wife before her marriage, and the fund had remained in the custody of the bank after that event, it would seem that he as sole manager of her separate estate, and he alone, would have the right to withdraw it. * * * The plaintiff, by entering into the marriage relation with her husband, made him the sole agent for the management of her separate estate." That case was decided by the Supreme Court of Texas, January 26, 1901. In that case the Court of Civil Appeals of Texas stated: "It was not contended by the bank that it paid out the money on the checks of Coleman, on the ground that Coleman stated to its officers, at the time he deposited the same, that it was understood that it was to be checked out by him. The husband had the right to check out money." 64 S. W. 933. In the same case (Coleman v. Bank, 17 Tex. Civ. App. 132, 43 S. W. 938), on the original hearing of the case, the matter was fully discussed, and the court said, among other things: "She alleges that she was accessible to the bank, and seems to have assumed that it was the duty of the agent of the bank to hunt her up and keep her informed as to the condition of her account. In this she was mistaken." Under the laws of banking, a general deposit of money in a bank creates the relation of debtor and creditor. The bank is the debtor and the depositor is the creditor. In the case at bar the wife was the creditor and the bank was her debtor.

Under the provisions of said section 2498, the husband is made the statutory agent of the wife, and has the management and control of her separate estate during the continuance of the marriage, unless he is deposed or deprived of his agency, as provided by the provisions of section 2499; then her separate property passes into the hands of a trustee appointed by the court, but not into her management and control. Until his agency is thus terminated, the husband has full authority to collect debts due his wife, and to give full and sufficient receipts or acquittances therefor, and the debtor is as fully protected by such acquittances as if given by the wife herself. The bank debtor stands on the same footing as other debtors. No rational distinction can be drawn between them. Under the following headnote, to wit, "Upon Whose Checks the Bank shall Pay," it is stated at section 432, in 2 Morse on Banks & Banking, as follows: "The indebtedness of the bank upon a deposit is discharged pro tanto by its payments made upon any order, check, or draft signed by any person who would have the power to demand and receive the deposit, regarded as a simple debt, and to give full and sufficient acquittance for it." That, I think, is the correct rule; and if a feme sole had made a loan to an individual, payable on demand, or had deposited money with a person subject to her order, and, before she demands payment, she marries, the husband would, under the provisions of said section 2498, have full authority to demand and collect such deposit or loan, and give a full acquittance therefor. A bank being the debtor, in no manner changes the rule. As stated in the last authority cited, the bank is discharged pro tanto upon payment of a deposit, on the check of any person who had the right to demand and receive the money so deposited, regarded as a simple debt. The money becomes no more sacred from its deposit in a bank, and therefore excluded from the possession of a statutory agent, than money deposited with a friend or with a shopkeeper.

If the Legislature had intended to except the management and control of the wife's money, which was her separate property, from the provisions of section 2498, Rev. St. 1887, appropriate language would have been used for that purpose, but we find no exception whatever. If the husband had the management and control of the wife's separate money, the wife could not control it by putting it in the bank or by delivering it to a friend to be kept for her. The statute does not provide that the management and control of the separate property of the wife shall belong to both the husband and wife, but it declares that it belongs to the husband alone. However unwise we may think the provisions of said section, the court ought not to repeal or set them aside by construction, by holding that the provisions of said section apply to all of the wife's property except her money.

It appears from the record that at least $940 of the money so drawn on check out of the bank was sent to the plaintiff by the husband. If he had the right to draw it, as we hold he did, the bank is not required to inquire into the purpose to which he applied said money. 1 Morse on Banks & Banking, § 317. Of course, a bank would not be justified in receiving trust money from a trustee in payment of a personal debt of the trustee due the bank.

From the foregoing, we conclude that the judgment must be affirmed, and it is so ordered. Costs are awarded to the respondent.

STEWART, J., concurs.

AILSHIE, C. J. (dissenting). I dissent from the views expressed by the majority of the court and the conclusion reached thereon. It seems to me that the error into which my associates have fallen arises out of a misconstruction and application of the words "management and control." It is difficult for me to understand how, in the reasonable and ordinary use of those terms, any such meaning can be gathered as given to them in the majority opinion. It is a common maxim that things which cannot be lawfully done directly cannot be lawfully done by indirection and circumvention. The statute gives a married woman a separate property, and, while it confers upon the husband the right of management and control thereof, it does not allow him to alienate or convert the same.

In this case the wife preferred to have a deposit and credit at the bank to having the money itself. When the bank allowed the husband to exhaust that credit without her consent, and to convert the property right she had in such general deposit into another form, class, and character of property, it was clearly acting without any sanction of law or right, and contrary to every principle of banking. The assumption that the husband has a right to convert any article, class, or character of the wife's separate property into some other character or kind of property is directly contrary to section 2498, Rev. St. 1887, prior to its repeal. On the contrary, that section expressly prohibited the husband from making any "sale or other alienation of any part of such property" without the wife's assent and concurrence. "Management and control," as used in the statute, is not synonymous with "convert and dispose of," as the majority opinion seems to indicate. If a wife owned a sewing machine or a cow, the husband was entitled to "manage and control" the same, but he never has in this state had authority to convert the machine or cow into a horse or buggy, or any other class of property, or any other article or piece of the same kind of property, because to "manage and control property" does not have any such meaning or significance. It is clear to me that the majority opinion contains a construction contrary to the statute and legislative intent. It is scarcely in keeping with the statute to apply the law of agency to a case of this kind. The husband is in no instance or respect authorized to act in the name of the wife or sign her name for any purpose or in any transaction. Since sections 2498 and 2499 have been repealed and supplemented by the act of March 9, 1903 (Sess. Laws 1903, p. 345; Bank of Commerce v. Baldwin, 12 Idaho, 202, 85 Pac. 497), this question is not likely to again arise in this state, and for that reason I refrain from any further expression thereon.

LATER et al. v. HAYWOOD.

(Supreme Court of Idaho. Jan. 7, 1908.)

1. APPEAL—REVIEW—FINDINGS—SPECIFICATIONS OF ERROR—MATERIAL ISSUES.

Where an appeal is taken from a judgment within 60 days from the rendition thereof, to authorize this court to examine the evidence for the purpose of determining whether the evidence supports the findings and judgment, it is necessary that the plaintiff specify the particulars in which it is alleged the evidence fails to support the findings and judgment, and such specification of error must be embodied in and be a part of the bill of exceptions.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, § 3017.]

2. SAME.

Where the appellant specifies in his brief that the evidence does not support the findings and judgment, and fails to specify such error in the bill of exceptions, this court will not examine the evidence for the purpose of determining whether or not it supports the findings and judgment.

3. SAME—INSUFFICIENT FINDINGS.

Where the trial court fails to find on all the material issues, the judgment will be reversed, unless a finding thereon either for or against the successful party would not affect the judgment entered.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, § 4239.]

4. TRIAL—FINDINGS OF FACT.

The finding of ultimate facts includes the finding of all probative facts necessary to sustain the findings of the ultimate facts.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 46, Trial, §§ 931, 950-961.]

5. SAME.

Where probative facts are found, and the court can declare that the ultimate facts necessarily result from the facts which are found, the finding is sufficient.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 46, Trial, §§ 927-931.]

6. SAME.

Where the court fails to find on the material issues in the case, and if a finding had been made thereon the judgment might have been different, it is reversible error.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 46, Trial, §§ 940-945; vol. 3, Appeal and Error, § 4239.]

7. SAME.

Where the findings made are not conclusive against the plaintiff's right to recover, findings upon other issues necessary to support the judgment must be made.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 46, Trial, §§ 908-915.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from District Court, Fremont County; J. M. Stevens, Judge.

Action by Peter Later and others against Martha Haywood. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

See 85 Pac. 494.

Caleb Jones, for appellants. Holden, Holden, Holden & Holden, for respondent.

STEWART, J. This case was before this court on a former appeal from a judgment of nonsuit, entered after the plaintiffs had concluded their evidence, and is reported in 12 Idaho, 78, 85 Pac. 404. Upon reversal of the judgment of nonsuit the cause was retried in the district court, and findings of fact, conclusions of law, and a decree entered in said cause, in favor of the defendant. From this judgment the plaintiffs appeal.

The appellants assign 56 errors, 55 of which are errors of law, alleged to have occurred during the trial of said cause. Specification 56 is as follows: "The findings of fact in this case are wholly insufficient to support the judgment, in that they do not respond to the issues in this case, that they are not definite nor certain, that they are contradictory, that they are not supported by the evidence, that they are contrary to the evidence, and that no findings have been made of the most material issues in the case, as presented by the pleading."

A large part of appellants' brief is devoted to a discussion of the question as to whether each finding is supported by the evidence, and as to whether the evidence supports the judgment of the court. Rev. St. 1887, § 4807, provides that "an exception to the decision or verdict, on the ground that it is not supported by the evidence, cannot be reviewed on appeal from the judgment, unless the appeal is taken within sixty days after the rendition of the judgment." The judgment in this case was made and filed on the 19th day of December, 1906, and the appeal was taken within 60 days thereafter. Section 4428, Rev. St. 1887, provides: "No particular form of exception is required. But when the exception is to the verdict or decision upon the grounds of the insufficiency of the evidence to sustain it, the objection must specify the particulars in which such evidence is alleged to be insufficient. The objection must be stated, with so much of the evidence or other matter as is necessary to explain it, and no more. Only the substance of the reporter's notes of the evidence shall be stated. Documents on file in the action or proceeding may be copied, or the substance thereof stated, or reference thereto, sufficient to identify them, may be made." These two sections must be read together, and while the former provides that a decision of the court may be reviewed on appeal, when the appeal is taken within 60 days from the rendition of the judgment, the latter section provides that, where the exception is to the decision of the court, upon the ground of insufficiency of the evidence to support the judgment and findings, the bill of exceptions must contain the specifications of the particulars in which the evidence is alleged to be insufficient to sustain the findings or judgment, or it will be disregarded. Hole v. Van Duzer, 11 Idaho, 79, 81 Pac. 109; Coglan v. Beard, 67 Cal. 303, 7 Pac. 738; Commercial Bank v. Redfield, 122 Cal. 405, 55 Pac. 160. The bill of exceptions in this case contains no specifications of error whatever. The specification of error set forth above is found in the brief of the appellant. This is insufficient under the statute. Before this court can consider the sufficiency of the evidence to support the findings and judgment, the appellant must specify the particulars in which it is alleged the evidence is insufficient, and such specification must be embodied in the bill of exceptions. This is only fair to the trial court, for the reason that, if the losing party points out to the trial court the particulars in which he claims the evidence is insufficient to support the findings and judgment, an opportunity is thereby given the trial court to alter his decision or modify it to conform to the facts as they are alleged and proven. In this case, therefore, the court cannot consider the question as to whether or not the evidence is sufficient to support the findings and judgment of the court. In the specification above set forth the appellant alleges that the findings are insufficient to support the judgment, in that they do not respond to the issues, and that no findings have been made of the most material issues in the case as presented by the pleadings.

It is alleged in the complaint: That the plaintiffs were partners under the firm name and style of Later Bros. That on the 15th day of July, 1902, the plaintiffs entered into a contract with one George E. Hill, Sr., which was afterwards performed by the respective parties, by which the plaintiffs were to perform services for Hill and to receive as a part of the consideration the property in controversy in this case, being lots 5 and 6 in block 2 of the town of Rigby, valued at $675, and were also to receive from said Hill under said contract $5 worth of water stock in one company, and $7.50 worth of water stock in another company. That thereafter, on the 20th day of July, before any transfer of said property had been made, the plaintiffs made a sale of the property to one Frederick R. Hays for the sum of $675, and that Hays, in order to secure a part of the purchase price, was compelled to make a loan of $400, and, in order to secure the payment of said sum of money, asked the plaintiffs for their consent to use the premises as security. The plaintiffs gave their consent, with the understanding that the amount borrowed should be turned over to them. That an agreement was then made between Hays and the defendant, which was acquiesced in by the plaintiffs, by which the defendant was to and did loan to said Hays the sum of $400, in consideration that the defendant was to be given a deed of the property as security. The deed was given, and it was agreed verbally and has always been understood and agreed between the plaintiffs and defendant and said Hays, that the deed, although absolute in form, was to be considered as a mortgage and as security for the payment of the money borrowed, and that in order to avoid the cost and inconvenience of conveyances from Hill to the plaintiffs, and from the plaintiffs to Hays, and from Hays to the defendant, it was agreed by all the parties, and directed by the plaintiffs, that George E. Hill, Sr., make a deed direct to the defendant; whereupon she advanced Hays the sum of $400, and executed and delivered an agreement to convey the property mentioned to said Hays on payment of the sum of $100 and interest. Paragraph 4 of the complaint reads as follows: "The said deed from the said Hill to the said defendant, and the said agreement between said defendant and said Hays, and the verbal understanding and agreement between the said plaintiffs and defendant and the said Hays, were all parts of one and the same transaction, i. e., the conveying or mortgaging of said premises to the said defendant as security for the payment of the said sum of $400, and interest thereon." The complaint further alleges that thereafter Hays transferred all his right, title, and interest to said property to these plaintiffs by a quitclaim deed; that on the 3d day of January, 1905, the plaintiffs tendered in lawful money of the United States $400, the amount due said defendant on said loan, and demanded of the defendant that she execute and deliver to them a certificate of discharge of said mortgage and satisfy the same on the records of said county, or convey the property to said Hays; and that the defendant neglected and refused to do so, and still neglects, although the plaintiff is now and at all times has been ready and willing to pay the defendant the sum of $400, the amount due her. In the prayer the plaintiffs ask that the deed referred to from Hill to the defendant be adjudged a mortgage, and that the plaintiffs be adjudged the legal owners in fee of said premises; that an order be made directing the said defendant to convey the said property to these plaintiffs; that the plaintiffs be given a money judgment against the said defendant for the sum of $100 for failing to comply with section 3364 of the Revised Statutes of Idaho of 1887, and for costs.

The defendant answered, and for want of information as to the partnership of the plaintiffs denies the same; for want of information she also denies that plaintiffs entered into the contract with George E. Hill, Sr., as alleged in the complaint, and denies that the plaintiffs were to receive from Hill the real property described in the complaint; and for want of belief denies that the plaintiffs made a sale of said property to Hays in order that he might secure a part of the purchase price by a loan, denies that it was done with the understanding that the amount borrowed should be turned over to the plaintiffs, and denies that Hays procured a loan of $400 from the defendant, or at all. The defendant further denies that an agreement was made at all between Hays and this defendant, by which the defendant was to or did loan to Hays the sum of $400, or any other sum, and denies that the deed was given or that it was agreed, verbally or otherwise, that the deed, though absolute, was to be or was considered as a mortgage or as security for such loan, and denies that Hill made a deed to the defendant as security for said $400, or that said deed was intended to be a mortgage; denies that Hays has any interest in the property or ever did have, and, in answer to paragraph 4, the defendant denies the same as follows: "Denies that said or any deed from said Hill to this defendant, and the said agreement between this defendant and the said Hays, and the alleged verbal understanding and agreement between said plaintiffs and this defendant and the said Hays, were all parts of one or the same transaction, that is to say, the conveying or alleged mortgaging of said premises to this defendant as alleged security for the payment of said sum of $400, or any other sum or amount or at all, or interest thereon." The defendant then sets up affirmatively that she purchased the property in controversy in this case from George E. Hill, Sr., and wife, and paid therefor $400, and that they made her an absolute, unconditional warranty deed for the same, and that afterwards she agreed to sell the property to Frederick R. Hays for $400, with interest thereon at the rate of 12 per centum per annum, and that she has always understood that she purchased the property absolutely and did not receive the same as security for any loan.

This, in substance, is the issue presented by the pleadings in the case. It will thus be seen that the main point of controversy is as to whether or not the conveyance made to the defendant and her agreement to resell the property to Frederick R. Hays and the verbal understandings and agreements altogether constitute one and the same transaction; that is, the conveying or mortgaging of said premises to secure a loan of $400, and interest.

The court finds, first, the partnership of the plaintiffs as alleged; second, that the plaintiffs did not sell the property to Hays for the sum of $675, or any other sum or amount; third, that Hays did not at any time procure a loan of $400, or any other sum or amount, from the defendant, and did not borrow from the defendant the sum of $400 or any sum; fourth, that George E. Hill, Sr., did not at any time sell the property to the plaintiff; that no sale of said property was ever made to the plaintiffs, and that the defendant did not understand or agree, nor was it agreed by and between all the parties mentioned, that George E. Hill, Sr., was to make a deed direct to the defendant in order to avoid the cost or inconvenience of conveyances from Hill to the plaintiffs, and from plaintiffs to Hays, and from Hays to the defendant; that the property was not mortgaged by Hays to the defendant as security for the payment of the sum of $400, or for the security of any sum whatever; fifth, that on the 19th day of January, 1903, the defendant unconditionally purchased of George E. Hill, Sr., and wife, for the sum of $400, the property described in the complaint, and in consideration of the payment of said $400 said Hill and wife conveyed said property to the defendant by warranty deed; sixth, that on the 20th day of January, 1903, the defendant agreed conditionally to sell said property to Hays for $400, and that Hays agreed to buy the same; seventh, that at the time the deed was executed and delivered by Hill and wife to the defendant she understood and always has understood that she purchased the property unconditionally, and that Hill and wife absolutely conveyed the property to the defendant, and that the deed was made, executed, and delivered to the defendant as an absolute conveyance; eighth, that the written agreement made between Hays and the defendant constitutes a conditional sale of the property; ninth, that at the time said written agreement was made the defendant understood that she agreed to sell and convey conditionally such property to Hays according to the terms of the agreement for the sum of $400; tenth, as conclusions of law, from the facts found, the defendant absolutely and unconditionally owns the property mentioned, and is vested with title in fee therein. Upon these findings the court enters a decree adjudging the defendant to be the owner absolutely and unconditionally of the property described in the complaint and findings.

This court has decided in a number of cases that, when the trial court fails to find on all the material issues, the judgment will be reversed, unless a finding thereon, either for or against the successful party, would not affect the judgment entered. Tage v. Alberts, 2 Hasb. (Idaho) 271, 13 Pac. 19; Carson v. Thews, 2 Hasb. (Idaho) 176, 9 Pac. 605; Bowman v. Ayers, 2 Hasb. (Idaho) 305, 13 Pac. 346; Wilson v. Wilson, 6 Idaho, 597, 57 Pac. 708; Standley v. Flint, 10 Idaho, 629, 79 Pac. 615; Wood v. Broderson, 12 Idaho, 190, 85 Pac. 490. It is equally well settled that the finding of ultimate facts includes the finding of all probative facts necessary to sustain the findings of the ultimate facts. Adams v. Crawford, 116 Cal. 495, 48 Pac. 488. And "where probative facts are found, and the court can declare that the ultimate facts necessarily result from the facts which are found, the finding is sufficient." Alhambra Add. Water Co. v. Richardson, 72 Cal. 604, 14 Pac. 379. Examining the findings in this case in the view of these legal principles, it is apparent at first glance that the findings in this case are not responsive to the issues, and that the court has failed to find on the material issue in the case. While the court finds that George E. Hill, Sr., conveyed the property in controversy, absolutely and unconditionally, to the defendant, and that Frederick R. Hays never procured a loan from the defendant, and that the defendant agreed conditionally to sell said property to said Frederick R. Hays, yet more was required in the findings. The findings should have answered the question raised by the pleadings, and that is, whether or not the deed from Hill to the defendant and the agreement between the defendant and Hays and the verbal understanding and agreement between the plaintiffs and the defendant and Hays were all parts of one and the same transaction, and, when taken as such, constitute the conveyance by Hill to the defendant as a mortgage to secure the loan of $400. It may have been true, and, in fact, it was true, so far as the instrument on its face is concerned, that Hill made an absolute and unconditional conveyance to the defendant. It is also true, so far as the instrument on its face is concerned, that the defendant made a conditional bargain to sell the property to Hays, and it may also have been true that the defendant did not loan Hays the $400, for the reason that under the peculiar circumstances of the transaction the money paid is alleged to have been paid to Later Bros. These principal probative facts may have all been true, when separately stated, yet if taken as a whole, and each modified, limited, and explained by the other as one transaction, it still might have been true that all these matters constituted one and the same transaction, and that the deed from Hill to the defendant was in fact and in truth a mortgage. The plaintiffs were entitled to a finding upon this issue. It is the "bone of contention" under the pleadings, and it is the center about which, and to support which, all the evidence would certainly have to be directed under the pleadings. A finding upon this question would certainly affect and control the judgment to be entered. If the finding upon this material issue was in favor of the plaintiff, it is apparent that the judgment must follow the finding, and also be in favor of the plaintiff. A failure to find upon this material issue made by the pleadings would affect and control the judgment to be entered by the court; and, it being determined that the findings made by the court are not conclusive against the plaintiffs' right to recover, the failure to find upon other material issues is reversible error. Gregory v. Gregory, 102 Cal. 50, 36 Pac. 364; Dyer v. Brogan, 70 Cal. 136, 11

Pac. 589. We are therefore clearly of the opinion that the court failed in this case to find upon the material issues in the case, and that the judgment must be reversed.

The appellant has assigned 55 alleged errors of the trial court in admitting evidence, and in refusing to admit evidence, and in overruling motions to strike out evidence, etc. We have carefully examined each of these questions, and while in some instances the court may have erred in admitting evidence, the errors under the issues of this case were harmless, and could not in any way have prejudiced the plaintiffs. Some of the objections to the admission of evidence were general, such as, "I object." This is not sufficient to secure a review of the ruling of the trial court by this court. If counsel desired to urge in this court that the trial court erred in admitting evidence, or in refusing to strike out evidence, or in refusing to admit evidence, the objection must point out the reason for the objection, and thereby give the trial court an opportunity to pass upon the question presented to this court. It may occur that the trial court, after counsel have given the reason why an objection to the introduction of evidence is made, will readily see the correctness of the position of counsel, and can correct the alleged error before it is too late; so, if counsel desired to present to this court an objection to the admission or rejection of evidence, he should specifically point out the particulars on which the objection is founded.

The judgment, therefore, in this case is reversed, and the lower court is directed to make new findings of fact covering all the material issues in this case, and enter judgment accordingly. Costs awarded to the appellant.

HOUGHTON v. LOMA PRIETA LUMBER CO. (S. F. 4,241.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 30, 1907.
Rehearing Denied Jan. 27, 1908.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT—INDEPENDENT CONTRACTOR—EMPLOYER'S LIABILITY.

A company, calling for bids for the construction of a road, accepted a bid, and a contract, fixing a price for the work and providing for payment of employes by the company's check, was executed. The contractor had formerly been the company's foreman on other roads, and a third person, as foreman of the company, visited the road while the work was being done, and made suggestions, without attempting to control any of the contractor's employes. Held, that the contractor was as a matter of law an independent contractor and the company was not liable for any negligence of which he might be guilty in the course of his employment.

2. APPEAL—VERDICT—CONCLUSIVENESS.

The rule that a verdict on conflicting evidence will not be disturbed applies only where there is a real conflict, and a verdict against the preponderance of the evidence can be maintained only where the conflict arises on evidence so materially contradicting the testimony on the other side as to leave room in a reasonable mind to find the fact either way.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, §§ 3935-3937.]

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Cruz County; Lucas F. Smith, Judge.

Action by Harriet E. Houghton against the Loma Prieta Lumber Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Bishop, Wheeler & Hoefler (William Rix and Alfred J. Harwood, of counsel), for appellant. Sullivan & Sullivan, Theo. J. Roche, and Chas. M. Cassin, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This action was brought by plaintiff against defendant to recover damages for personal injuries, alleged to have been sustained by her through negligence of defendant in exploding a blast. The verdict and judgment were for plaintiff, and from the judgment and from an order denying its motion for a new trial, defendant appeals.

Plaintiff, at the time she received the injuries complained of, was walking with her husband, Herbert E. Houghton, since deceased, along the course of an unfinished wagon road, which was being constructed, and when they had reached a certain point a blast nearby, which was intended to remove a stump on the course of the road, was exploded, and from the consequences of the explosion the plaintiff sustained personal injuries for which this action is brought. At the same time, from the same explosion, her husband received injuries which caused his death. An action was brought by this present plaintiff, and certain minor heirs of said Herbert E. Houghton, to recover damages for his death. In that action there was a verdict and judgment for the plaintiffs therein; but on appeal by defendant from the judgment, and from an order denying a new trial, the judgment and order appealed from were by this court reversed. The decision reversing the judgment and order was filed December 6, 1907, and is published in 93 Pac. 82. There were two transcripts on that appeal, one numbered S. F. No. 3,920, which presented the appeal from the judgment, and the other, S. F. 3,837, which presented the appeal from the order denying the motion for a new trial. For brevity we will refer only to S. F. 3,920. The evidence in that case was substantially the same as that in the case at bar. It was contended there, as in the present case, among other things, that the work of constructing the road was being done by A. W. Wyman as an independent contractor with appellant; and the case was reversed because the court erroneously gave certain instructions to the jury to the effect that, although Wyman was an independent contractor, still the jury might find a verdict against appellant upon the theory that the work of building the road was so intrinsically and necessarily dangerous as to be per se a nuisance, and that, therefore, the rule of respondent superior might apply to appellant, notwithstanding the independent contract. The opinion of this court shows the facts to be that the road was being built in a wild, uninhabited, and almost untraveled mountain region, where there was very little danger or chance of injury from the blasting of a stump on the line of the road, and that the work was not intrinsically and necessarily dangerous, and held that, if the work was being done under an independent contract, the appellant was not liable. The evidence as to the condition of the country where the road was being built was the same in the case at bar as in S. F. No. 3,920, and we adopt the statement as to that matter in the opinion in the latter case, without repeating it here, and we hold, as was there held, that, if the work was being done by an independent contractor, the appellant was not liable.

The instructions upon which the case was reversed in S. F. No. 3,920 do not appear in the case at bar; but, if it appears in this case at bar that the work was done by Wyman as an independent contractor, then appellant was not liable, and the judgment and order should be reversed. And it appears to us quite clearly that the work was being done by Wyman as an independent contractor. Appellant called for bids for the construction of the road by contract, and several different persons, among them Wyman, submitted bids in response to the call. The bid of Wyman was accepted, and the transcript shows a written contract between appellant and Wyman for the construction of the road for a certain specified price. The direct evidence was all to the point that the work was done by Wyman under and in accordance with this contract, he employed the hands who did the work, and had full control over it. There is no direct evidence to the contrary; and we see nothing in the record which substantially conflicts with appellant's evidence on the point, under the rule as to "conflict" of evidence. Respondent relies on certain circumstances, which she contends should induce this court to hold that there was such a conflict as to warrant the jury in finding that the work was not done under an independent contract; but this contention is not maintainable. The circumstance mostly relied on is that while the work was progressing Wyman's employes were paid by checks of appellant. But the manner in which the contract price was paid is a matter of no consequence. Indeed, this manner of payment was provided for in the contract itself. A similar contention was made in Smith v. Belshaw, 89 Cal. 427, 26 Pac. 834, where the question was whether certain work was done by an independent contractor, but the court said: "The principle of law is so well settled that, where one carries on an independent employment in pursuance of a contract by which he has entire control of the work and the manner of its performance, his employer is not liable for any negligence of which he may be guilty in the course of his employment, the citation of authorities is unnecessary labor. Indeed respondent's counsel concedes the law but insists that the evidence is sufficient to sustain the verdict. As already stated, we are unable to find it in the record. The fact that the miners were paid their wages at defendant Belshaw's store, where they had been paid prior to the contract with Dickenson, and the further fact that some of the miners thought they were working for Belshaw, are circumstances too slight to defeat the express and uncontradicted testimony as to the terms of the contract, and the labor performed under it." Another circumstance relied on is that Wyman was formerly in the employ of appellant as its foreman, and as such foreman did work for appellant on other roads; but surely that fact could in no way affect the contractual relations between said parties as to the building of the road in question. Another circumstance is that the foreman of the appellant occasionally visited the road while the work was being done and made some suggestions as to certain features of the work; but he did not attempt to control any of Wyman's employes, and did nothing more than he had a right to do in seeing that the work was being done according to the contract. There were also a few other trifling circumstances of less importance than those above referred to. These circumstances are, in our opinion, clearly insufficient to raise such a conflict of evidence on the point as would justify a jury in finding against the independent contract.

The rule that the finding of a jury on an issue of fact will not be disturbed where there is a conflict of evidence as to such fact applies only to cases where there is a real and not a mere pretense of conflict—where, as bearing on the issue, there is some body and substance to the asserted conflicting evidence. A finding against the great weight and preponderance of the evidence can be maintained on the doctrine of "conflict" only where the alleged conflict rests upon evidence, either direct or circumstantial, which so materially contradicts the testimony on the other side, or is so radically inconsistent with it, as to leave room in a fair and reasonable mind to find the fact either way. This feature of the rule upon the "conflict" of evidence has been heretofore declared by this court. In Smith v. Belshaw, supra, the court said: "While we will not disturb the verdict of a jury where the evidence is conflicting upon substantial matters, yet in all cases the verdict must have some meritorious support from the evidence, or be set aside and disregarded." In Hedge v. Wil- liams, 131 Cal. 459, 63 Pac. 721, 64 Pac. 106, 82 Am. St. Rep. 366, the court say: "Upon the part of respondent it is insisted that the verdict of the jury is conclusive as to the capacity in which Fontain was acting in repairing the tank. This contention can only be sound if there was a substantial conflict of the evidence." The italics are ours. In Driscoll v. Cable Ry. Co., 97 Cal. 553, 82 Pac. 591, 33 Am. St. Rep. 203, it is said: "The rule is well established that this court will not disturb a verdict where there is a conflict of evidence on material points, and when there is evidence to support the verdict; but such conflict and such evidence must be real and substantial." There are other cases to the same effect. And within the rule so declared there was in the case at bar no evidence which was in substantial conflict with the evidence introduced by appellant which clearly established the fact that the road was built by Wyman as an independent contractor.

For the reasons above stated, the judgment and order appealed from are reversed.

PEOPLE v. EBEL. (Cr. 1,444.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 14, 1908.)

1. JUDGES—DISQUALIFICATION—ACTS. WITHIN DISQUALIFICATION STATUTE.

Code Civ. Proc. § 170, subd. 2, disqualifies a judge for relationship with an attorney for either party. Subdivision 4 provides that the judge shall forthwith secure the services of another judge to preside at the trial, but that that section shall not apply to the arrangement of the calendar, nor to the regulation of the order of business. Const. art. 6, § 8, provides that the judge of any superior court may hold the superior court in any county at the request of the judge thereof, and that, on request of the Governor, it shall be his duty to do so; and Code Civ. Proc. § 71, adds that in either case the judge holding the court shall have the same power as a judge thereof. Held, that the disqualification declared prevented a judge from presiding at an arraignment, the hearing of a plea, or other preliminary steps, beyond those necessary to regulate the order of business and arrange the calendar.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 29, Judges, §§ 235-245.]

2. SAME—CALLING OTHER JUDGE.

Under Const. art. 6, § 8, providing that a judge of any superior court may hold the superior court in any county at the request of the judge thereof, and that, on request of the Governor, it shall be his duty to do so, a disqualified judge on a criminal trial may request, notwithstanding his disqualification, another judge to preside, and a request to so preside is not limited to a request by the Governor.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; Z. B. West, Judge.

Edward J. Ebel was convicted of burglary, and he appeals. Reversed and remanded.

The following is the opinion of the Court of Appeal, Second District, by TAGGART, J., concurred in by ALLEN, P. J., and SHAW, J.:

Defendant appeals from a judgment of the superior court of the county of Riverside, after a conviction upon a charge of burglary, alleged to have been committed in that county. He was arraigned before the superior judge for Riverside county, Hon. F. E. Densmore, and upon his refusal to plead to the information the clerk was ordered to enter a plea of "not guilty" for him. The judge of said court then ordered said cause to be set for trial, and a jury to be drawn to try the issues raised therein, and said judge presided during said drawing. All of these acts and rulings of the court in relation thereto were objected to by defendant on the ground that said judge was related to the attorney for the defendant by consanguinity within the third degree, and therefore disqualified to act in said cause. This was made to appear by affidavit of the attorney for defendant that he and the judge were half-brothers, born of the same mother. On the day set for the trial of said cause Hon. Z. B. West, the superior judge for Orange county, attended upon the court in Riverside county at the request of Judge Densmore, and against the objection of defendant presided at the trial of said cause, which resulted in defendant's conviction. Defendant objected to Judge West sitting at said trial because he did so at the request of Judge Densmore, who, it is claimed, was disqualified to select a judge to try said cause.

These acts of Judge Densmore are the only matters presented in the transcript on appeal as errors of law justifying a reversal of the judgment. The preliminary steps taken are not especially urged, the appeal being rested upon the one question of the power of a judge who is disqualified by relation to counsel for one of the parties to a criminal action to request the judge of another county to sit at the trial of said action. The disqualification relied upon is that created by section 170 of the Code of Civil Procedure, to wit: "No justice, judge, or justice of the peace shall sit or act as such in any action or proceeding: (1) * * * (2) Where he is related to either party, * * * or to an attorney, counsel or agent of either party, by consanguinity, or affinity, within the third degree, computed according to the rules of law." Subdivision 4 of the section provides that when bias or prejudice of the judge is shown he shall forthwith secure the services of another judge to preside "at the trial of the action or proceeding. * * * But the provisions of this section shall not apply to the arrangement of the calendar, or to the regulation of the order of business, nor the power of transferring the action or proceeding to some other court, or the hearing upon [such] affidavits and counter affidavits [upon the showing made upon an application for such transfer]." The Penal Code contains no provision relating especially to disqualification of judges to sit or act in criminal cases, and the only ground for the removal of a criminal action from the court in which it is pending appears to be "that a fair and impartial trial cannot be had in the county," and this removal can only be had upon the application of the defendant. Pen. Code, § 1033. Section 7 of the Bill of Rights in the state Constitution of 1879 provides that "the right of trial by jury shall be secured to all, and remain inviolate." This means the right as it existed at common law, and includes the right to be tried in the county where the crime is charged to have been committed, as well as to having a jury of the vicinage. People v. Powell, 87 Cal. 348, 25 Pac. 481, 11 L. R. A. 75. The provisions of part I of the Code of Civil Procedure (sections 33 to 304) relate to courts of justice and their organization and jurisdiction generally, civil and criminal, but section 397 et seq., as well as the other sections found in the chapter headed "Of the Place of Trial of Civil Actions" (Code Civ. Proc. pt. 2, tit. 4), cannot be applied to criminal causes and affect civil actions and proceedings only. People v. McGarvey, 56 Cal. 327. Section 71 of the Code of Civil Procedure re-enacts a portion of section 8 of article 6 of the Constitution of 1879, which reads as follows: "A judge of any superior court may hold the superior court in any county, at the request of the judge (or judges) of the superior court thereof, and upon request of the Governor it shall be his duty to do so." To this constitutional provision section 71 adds, "and in either case, the judge holding the court shall have the same power as a judge thereof."

The disqualification declared by section 170 (Code Civ. Proc.) being shown, we must look to the above constitutional provision for authority for the action of the disqualified judge in procuring a substitute to act in his place. There is but one remedy provided, the calling in of another superior judge. For the selection of this judge two methods are provided—a direct request made to such other judge by the one disqualified, and a request to some other judge by the Governor upon notice of the disqualification. No distinction is made as to the circumstances under which the one or the other shall act. The rule of construction that excludes one branch of the government from interference with another makes for a limitation upon the action of the Governor in a matter pertaining entirely to the judiciary. And so considered, the constitutional provision would be operative as to him, if action upon his part were limited to cases of death, physical disability, or mental incompetency of the judge in whose court the cause was pending; but we are not satisfied that this is or should be the controlling rule in such cases as the one at bar. In civil cases, in addition to the above-quoted constitutional and statutory provisions being applicable, section 397 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that the place of trial of an action may, on motion, be changed,

"(4) when from any cause the judge is disqualified from acting." In the determination of a number of civil cases the rule of disqualification provided in section 170 is said to be based upon an ancient maxim, founded in the most obvious principles of natural right, that no man ought to be a judge in his own cause. Mining Co. v. Keyser, 58 Cal. 315, 322. For the purpose here being considered the law treats counsel and client as one. Remy v. Olds (Cal.) 42 Pac. 239. If the judge is disqualified for interest, consanguinity, or other cause in a civil cause, either party may move for a change of venue, and the motion must be granted without hesitation or delay (Krumdick v. Crump, 98 Cal. 117, 32 Pac. 800; Anaheim, etc., v. Jurupa, etc., 128 Cal. 508, 61 Pac. 80). He can neither try his own case nor select his judge. Santa Cruz Bank v. Taylor, 125 Cal. 249, 57 Pac. 987; Oakland v. Hart, 129 Cal. 105, 61 Pac. 779.

A sound policy seems to demand that, independent of the rights of the parties to the action, the judicial tribunals appointed by law to administer justice should be preserved from discredit by a broad and liberal construction of the statute to the end of securing a judgment untainted with bias or interest. Courts should be slow to discover subtle and refined distinctions for indulging a doubtful jurisdiction where the liberty of a citizen is at stake. If the law be not satisfied in a civil case, involving the rights of property only, with the calling in of another judge by the disqualified one, where the right to a transfer is claimed under section 308, of the Code of Civil Procedure, it is difficult to see upon what principle the disqualified judge in a criminal action can be permitted to select the judge to try the cause when both the statute and Constitution furnish a method not open to criticism. Had the suggestion that the Governor be requested to act been made at the time, no doubt the honorable superior judge of Riverside county would have acted upon it, and it is quite probable that the same learned judge from Orange county would have been selected to preside at the trial of the cause. Recognizing that both of the learned judges were actuated by the sincerest desire to keep within the law, and to serve the substantial convenience of both counsel and client, we are still of the opinion that under such circumstances the proper method was to notify the Governor of the disqualification of Judge Densmore, and let him make the request.

While the matter of arraignment and hearing of the plea by Judge Densmore have not been expressly urged by the appellant, we are not prepared to say that these are included within the exceptions covered by the last clause of section 170—"arrangement of the calendar," "regulation of the order of business," "power of transferring," or "the hearing upon affidavits and counter affidavits." The section provides that the disqualified judge shall not "sit or act as such." Section 71 of the Code of Civil Procedure and section 8 of article 6 of the Constitution do not limit the request that may be made to a superior judge to the trial of the cause, but provide that, when requested, he "may hold the superior court in any county." The arraignment must be made and the plea entered in open court, and the time that may be allowed for either rests in the legal discretion of the court, that is, the judge. In the case at bar there was a qualified refusal to enter the plea, and the disqualified judge passed upon the question whether or not the circumstances set forth in the record justified the defendant in his refusal to plead. In all these matters the judge clearly "acted as such," and no reasonable construction can include the acts complained of within the terms, "arrangement of the calendar," or "regulation of the order of business." In our opinion, Judge Densmore was not only disqualified to select the judge to try the cause, but should not have presided at the arraignment, the hearing of the plea, or other preliminary steps of the prosecution of the case, beyond those necessary to regulate the order of business and arrange the calendar.

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded for further proceedings in accordance with the foregoing opinion.

Lafayette Gill, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and George Beebe, Dep. Atty. Gen., for the People.

PER CURIAM. The application for a hearing in this court, after decision by the district court of appeal for the second district, is denied. In denying the application we desire to say that we do not give our assent to the view of the learned district court of appeal that the judgment should be reversed because the judge who tried the case was the judge of the superior court of another county requested to preside in the superior court of the county in which the case was pending by the judge thereof, who was himself disqualified to try the case. Under the plain and unambiguous language of our constitutional provision (section 8, art. 6), a judge of any superior court may preside in the superior court of any county at the request of the judge of the superior court thereof, and, while so presiding, may act in any matter in which he is not disqualified. But it appears that the disqualified judge presided at the arraignment of defendant, and ordered the entry of a plea therein. We agree with the district court of appeal that he was disqualified to act in this matter, and the portion of the opinion that relates thereto is approved. It follows that the judgment of that court is correct and that there is no necessity for a further hearing in this court.

PEOPLE v. HORTON. (Cr. 67.)(Court of Appeal, Second District, California.
Nov. 21, 1907.)1. LARCENY—INSTRUCTIONS—POSSESSION OF PROPERTY STOLEN.

In a prosecution for larceny, an instruction that the unexplained possession of stolen property, however soon after the taking, is not sufficient to justify a conviction; that it is a circumstance which, with other testimony, is to determine the question of guilt; yet if defendant was found in possession of the property, this was a circumstance tending to show guilt, but not sufficient, standing alone, to warrant a conviction; that there must be in addition, proof of corroborating circumstances tending of themselves to establish guilt—was proper.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 32, Larceny, §§ 199-204.]

2. CRIMINAL LAW—APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR.

In a trial for larceny, it appeared that a claim of ownership of the stolen property was made by defendant when in actual possession, or shortly after a sale of the property by him. The court instructed that unexplained possession of stolen property was not sufficient to justify a conviction without corroborating testimony; but that, if defendant was found in possession, claiming ownership, it tended to show guilt. Held that, while the language employed was too broad, and there are conditions under which a mere claim of ownership should not in any degree tend to establish guilt, yet under the rule that convictions will be reversed for alleged errors in instructions only when, from the testimony, it appears that the jury may have been misled, to defendant's prejudice, there was no ground for reversing a conviction.

3. LARCENY—POSSESSION OF STOLEN PROPERTY—EVIDENCE.

The rule that, in order to be a circumstance tending to show the guilt of one accused of larceny, the possession of property after the taking must be personal and exclusive, is satisfied, if the possession be exclusive as to all not participants criminis. As to the latter class, the possession of one is the possession of all.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 32, Larceny, §§ 170-178.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Curtis D. Wilbur, Judge.

Gerdine Horton was convicted of larceny, and appeals. Affirmed.

H. H. Appel, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and George Beebe, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

ALLEN, P. J. Appeal by defendant from a judgment and an order denying a new trial upon a conviction of grand larceny.

That the verdict was warranted is most apparent. The evidence in the record is convincing as establishing that defendant and his nephew took the horse in question from the ranch where it was being pastured, brought it to the city of Los Angeles, and sold it for $115; that the negotiations leading up to the sale were carried on by both uncle and nephew, they claiming to be partners, and when the same were concluded the nephew went into an office and signed a bill of sale, using a fictitious name; that the money was paid to the nephew, who went back to the buggy in which defendant was seated, and drove off with him; that shortly afterward the defendant, who had before that time been without money, was seen with gold coin in his possession, and told an acquaintance that the horse in question belonged to him, and that he had sold it for $115. Defendant had, during an earlier hour of the day, sought to sell the horse to others, and represented to a witness that the horse was one of the large band owned by him and his nephew.

Upon the trial the court charged the jury by instruction 6: "You are instructed that the mere possession of stolen property, unexplained by the defendant, however soon after the taking, is not sufficient to justify a conviction. It is a circumstance, which, taken in connection with other testimony, is to determine the question of guilt. Yet, if you believe from the evidence, that the defendant was found in the possession of the property described in the information, or claiming to be the owner thereof, after the alleged taking, this is a circumstance tending in some degree to show guilt, but not sufficient, standing alone and unsupported by other evidence, to warrant you in finding him guilty. There must be, in addition to proof of possession of stolen property, proof of corroborating circumstances tending of themselves to establish guilt. These corroborating circumstances may consist of acts or conduct or declarations of the defendant, or any other circumstances tending to show the guilt of the accused. If the jury believe the property was stolen, and was seen in the possession of defendant shortly after being stolen, the failure of the defendant to account for such possession, or to show that such possession was honestly obtained, is a circumstance tending to show his guilt, and the accused is bound to explain the possession in order to remove the effect of the possession as a circumstance to be considered in connection with other suspicious facts, if the evidence discloses any such." By instruction 4: "Before you can convict the defendant of larceny you must believe beyond a reasonable doubt that he is guilty of or in complicity with the original fraudulent taking, and any subsequent connection after the taking would not be larceny." By instruction 7: "The possession must be personal, involving a distinct and conscious assertion of possession by the accused."

The contention of counsel for appellant is that instruction 6 is erroneous. This instruction, omitting therefrom the words, "or claiming to be the owner thereof after the alleged taking," has so often been approved by our Supreme Court that it may be said to have become settled law in this state (People v. Fagan, 66 Cal. 534, 6 Pac. 394; People v. Etting, 99 Cal. 577, 34 Pac. 237; People v. Abbott, 101 Cal. 646, 36 Pac. 129), and such instruction, as given with these words included, is approved in People v. Velarde, 59 Cal. 463. We think it unnecessary to a decision of this case to support the same by the authority last cited. The rule is well settled "that judgments will be reversed for alleged errors in instructions only when, looking at the testimony, we can see that the jury may have been misled by them to the prejudice of the defendant." People v. Strong, 46 Cal. 304. Applying this rule, we find that the claim of ownership was made by defendant when in actual possession, or shortly after the sale in which he participated. While it may be true, as insisted by appellant, that the language employed is too broad, and that there are conditions and circumstances under which a mere claim of ownership should not in any degree tend to establish guilt, yet we are confronted with nothing in this case which would bring defendant under such an exception.

It is urged further that the possession of property after the taking, that it may be a circumstance tending in some degree to show guilt, must be personal and exclusive possession. The jury was instructed that the possession must be personal, but it does not follow that such personal possession must be exclusive in a strict sense. The rule is satisfied, if it be exclusive as to all not particeps criminis. As to the latter class, the possession of one is the possession of each and all.

We find no prejudicial error in the record, and the judgment and order are affirmed.

We concur: SHAW, J.; TAGGART, J.

SCARBOROUGH v. WOODILL. (Civ. 386.)

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California.
Nov. 22, 1907.)

1. ADJOINING LANDOWNERS—"LINE TREES"—OWNERSHIP.

Under the express provisions of Civ. Code, § 834, "line trees" are those whose trunks stand partly on the land of two or more coterminous owners, and belong to them in common.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 5, p. 4171; vol. 8, p. 7703.]

2. SAME—RIGHT TO CUT.

Where adjoining owners were co-tenants of certain line trees, neither was at liberty to cut the trees without the consent of the other, if he thereby injured the common property in the trees.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 1, Adjoining Landowners, § 46.]

3. SAME—PARTITION.

Where a row of cypress trees was growing on the line between adjoining owners, each being a tenant in common of the trees, neither was entitled to make his own partition of the trees by cutting every alternate two trees, and if he did so, he was subject to an action for waste under Code Civ. Proc. § 732, authorizing the maintenance of such action by one tenant in common against another.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 1, Adjoining Landowners, § 46.]

4. EVIDENCE—JUDICIAL NOTICE.

The Court of Appeal will take judicial notice of the flora and climatic conditions of the country, and from these determine whether certain line trees between coterminous owners were natural timber growing on the land, or trees of an ornamental nature, planted for a special purpose.

5. ADJOINING LANDOWNERS — WASTE — CUTTING LINE TREES—INJUNCTION.

Where plaintiff and defendant owned adjoining orange orchards in Southern California, separated by a row of cypress trees growing on the boundary line, the cutting of every alternate two trees in the entire row for firewood was not a legitimate enjoyment of defendant's estate in common with complainant in the trees, and hence complainant was entitled to an injunction restraining further cutting of the trees.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 1, Adjoining Landowners, § 46.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; F. E. Densmore, Judge.

Action by E. J. Scarborough against A. L. Woodill. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Collier & Carnahan, for appellant. Purington & Adair, for respondent.

TAGGART, J. Appeal from judgment and order denying motion for a new trial. Plaintiff and defendant own adjoining orange orchards in the county of Riverside, which are separated by a row of cypress trees growing on the boundary line between them. The trees vary in diameter from 13 to 23 inches, and in height from 70 to 75 feet, and the trunks thereof stand partly on one side and partly on the other side of said line. Defendant cut down eight of these trees (every alternate two), and threatened to continue to cut every alternate two trees until he had cut one-half of the entire row. The eight were taken to defendant's home, and used for firewood. The trial court rendered judgment in favor of plaintiff for $1 damages, and perpetually enjoining defendant from cutting down, injuring, or destroying any of the remaining trees growing on said line.

Line trees are "trees whose trunks stand partly on the land of two or more coterminous owners," and "belong to them in common." Civ. Code, § 834; 28 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law (2d Ed.) p. 538. While at common law there appears to have existed two views as to the character of the estate created in the adjacent owners of real property by reason of the roots of trees growing near the boundary line extending into and deriving nourishment from the other property, the rule as to trees growing in a hedge that divided the lands of two proprietors was the same as that of our Civil Code. The ownership of the soil was several, in the proprietors of the two estates, while the tree, standing and growing partly on the soil of each, not capable as an entire thing of several ownership by the two, was the property of the two in common, and as tenants in common. Dubois v. Beaver, 25 N. Y. 123, 82 Am. Dec. 329. If the tree stand so nearly upon the dividing line between the lands that portions of its body extend into each, the same is the property, in common, of the land-owners. And neither of them is at liberty to cut the tree without the consent of the other, nor to cut away the part which extends into his land, if he thereby injures the common property in the tree. Washburn on Real Property (3d Ed.) § 7a. The tenancy in common in a "line tree" appears to be of a peculiar nature, and may be stated to be "that each of the landowners upon whose land any part of a trunk of a tree stands has an interest in that tree, a property in it, equal, in the first instance, to, or perhaps rather identical with, the part which is upon his land; and, in the next place, embracing the right to demand that the owner of the other portion shall so use his part as not unreasonably to injure or destroy the whole." Robinson v. Clapp, 65 Conn. 365, 32 Atl. 942, 29 L. R. A. 582.

Defendant's estate in the row of cypress trees must be considered merely as that of a tenant in common in the trees themselves, as described by the Connecticut court, with an easement upon plaintiff's lands for the sustenance of such trees. Whatever the character of his holding, it cannot be contended that he is empowered to make his own partition of the trees in his own way. The Code of Civil Procedure expressly provides for an action for waste against a tenant in common. Section 732. Waste is not defined by the Code, so we must look to the common law for this. McCord v. Oakland, etc., Co., 64 Cal. 140, 27 Pac. 863, 49 Am. Rep. 686.

This leads to a consideration of the propriety of the equitable remedy which was awarded by the trial court. Defendant contends that as the parties were tenants in common of the trees no injunction will issue against one at the suit of the other. In neither of the cases relied upon by the appellant was the court dealing with similar facts to those before us upon this appeal. In Hihn v. Peck, 18 Cal. 644, it was held that an injunction was not proper pending an action in partition of a large tract of timber land, where neither the insolvency of the tenant in common cutting the timber, "nor any other facts entitling him to an injunction," were averred in the bill. The general rule as to restraint for waste against one tenant in common at the suit of another at common law is stated in McCord v. Oakland, Q. M. Co., 64 Cal. 143, 27 Pac. 863, 49 Am. Rep. 686. But, says the court, he "might be restrained in equity from felling ornamental trees, or from doing other things amounting to wanton and destructive waste, which were called 'equitable waste,' because allowable at law." In the McCord Case an injunction was refused because the court would not restrict a tenant in common from the legitimate enjoyment of the estate, and to interfere with the legitimate exercise of that right would be to deny an essential quality of the title, that is, an undivided occupation. In the same opinion a New York case is referred to, in which an injunction was granted pending the hearing of a bill for partition, because the cutting of the timber in that case was not within the usual and legitimate exercise of the enjoyment of defendant's estate. Hawley v. Clowes, 2 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 122. As to the issuance of an injunction, Chancellor Kent saying: "The remedy is peculiarly appropriate and proper."

In other jurisdictions the use of the injunction in a proper case seems to be generally approved, and the text writers usually state the rule that a tenant in common will not be granted an injunction against his co-tenant, with an exception. In special cases one tenant in common may, on the application of the other, be enjoined from committing waste (cutting timber), but the injunction is sparingly exercised. Obert v. Obert, 5 N. J. Eq. 397. Injunctions are but rarely granted to restrain a co-tenant from exercising control over the joint property. To authorize an injunction, it must appear either that the defendant is insolvent, or that the act sought to be enjoined will effect a partial or entire destruction of the estate. Freeman on Co-Tenancy and Partition, § 323; Leatherbury v. McInnis, 85 Miss. 160, 37 South. 1018, 107 Am. St. Rep. 274. An injunction will be granted to restrain one of the owners of adjoining tracts of land (tenants in common) from cutting down trees growing on the boundary line, where they serve to shelter and protect the buildings of the other, even though their presence be a damage to his land, and notwithstanding the complainant has himself cut down some of the trees. Musch v. Burkhart, 88 Iowa, 301, 48 N. W. 1025, 12 L. R. A. 484, 32 Am. St. Rep. 305; Harndon v. Stultz, 124 Iowa, 440, 100 N. W. 329; Robinson v. Clapp, 65 Conn. 365, 32 Atl. 939, 29 L. R. A. 582.

It is argued by appellant in the case at bar that neither the complaint nor the findings show any peculiar conditions or circumstances justifying the issuance of an injunction under the authorities cited. This court will take judicial notice of the flora and climatic conditions of the country. It may from these and the character of the trees in question determine whether they are natural timber growing upon the land, or trees of an ornamental nature, planted for a special purpose. From these premises it will be presumed that the cutting of cypress trees for firewood on the boundary line of an orange orchard in Southern California was not a "legitimate enjoyment of the estate" in such trees. We do not think any more specific allegation or finding is necessary to sustain the judgment.

Judgment and order affirmed.

PEOPLE v. MONREAL (Cr. 64.)(Court of Appeal, Second District, California.
Nov. 21, 1907.)1. CRIMINAL LAW — HARMLESS ERROR — INSTRUCTIONS.

Where, in a prosecution for perjury, certain statements contained in the information were material under the issues in the action in which the perjury was alleged to have been committed, and the court charged that, unless the jury found such statements were testified to by defendant and were false, it should acquit, a subsequent charge that if it found all the statements in the information false it should convict was not prejudicial to defendant, though some of them may have been immaterial, since a finding that the immaterial matters were false could not convict defendant, unless the falsity of the material statements was also established.

2. SAME.

In a prosecution for perjury, the admission of evidence to prove the falsity of an immaterial statement contained in the information is not prejudicial error.

3. WITNESSES — IMPEACHMENT — EVIDENCE — RELEVANCY UNDER STATUTE.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 2051, prohibiting the impeachment of a witness by evidence of particular wrongful acts, except a conviction for a felony, evidence that a witness shortly prior to the giving of her testimony had been guilty of adultery, and that her husband had punished a man found in her room, introduced to impeach the witness, was properly rejected.

Leo Monreal was convicted of perjury, and he appeals. Affirmed.

F. W. Allender and A. A. Sturges, for appellants. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and George Beebe, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

ALLEN, P. J. The defendant, convicted of the crime of perjury, appeals from the judgment and an order denying a new trial.

The perjury charge was false testimony in a certain divorce proceeding. This testimony, which is claimed to be false, is set out at great length in the information, and its falsity in every particular was averred and clearly established. Certain statements appearing in the information were material under the issues presented by the pleadings. The court charged the jury that, unless it found such statements were testified to by defendant, and that they were false, that it should acquit. The effect of such charge could only be in the nature of an instruction that such statements only were material. The other charge, that if it found all of the statements contained in the information to have been false it should convict, could not prejudice the defendant, even were some of them immaterial; for, if the material matters were false, the charge is established, and the finding by the jury that other matters not material were also false could work no injury. For the same reason the action of the court in admitting evidence of the brand of beer used, and the price paid therefor, was not prejudicial error, even were it not admissible as tending to discredit the evidence of the defendant in other material matters, which we are not prepared to affirm.

The court refused to admit testimony tending to show that a witness had been guilty of adultery shortly before offering herself as a witness, and, further, that her husband administered punishment to a man found in her room. There was no error in this (section 2051, Code Civ. Proc.; Estate of James, 124 Cal. 656, 57 Pac. 578, 1008), the acts not bearing upon the matter in issue (Barkly v. Cope-land, 86 Cal. 487, 25 Pac. 1).

The trial court refused a charge requested by defendant in relation to the credibility of the defendant as a witness. We find no error in refusing such instruction. People v. Winters, 125 Cal. 329, 57 Pac. 1067; People v. Ross, 134 Cal. 256, 66 Pac. 229.

The judgment and order should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

CLEMENTS v. WATSON et al. (Civ. 416.)(Court of Appeal, Second District, California.
Nov. 23, 1907.)1. ATTORNEY AND CLIENT—ATTORNEY'S COMPENSATION.

In estimating the value of an attorney's services, it is proper to include in the consideration a reasonable retaining fee.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 5, Attorney and Client, § 294.]

2. SAME—ACTION FOR SERVICES—ISSUES.

Where, in an action for services rendered by an attorney, a bill of particulars contained the item "retainer, seven months at $100 per month," and no demand was made for a further bill, it was proper to permit plaintiff to prove certain services rendered which were included in such item.

3. TRIAL—REMARKS OF COUNSEL.

In an action for an attorney's services, there was no prejudicial error in plaintiff's counsel's statement to the jury that it had been called at defendant's request and in his expression of his opinion as to the propriety of a jury passing on the value of an attorney's fee and questioning their ability to do so.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 46, Trial, §§ 303-307.]

4. SAME.

Misstatements or improper ones made by counsel to the jury are not grounds for reversal, unless they relate to material matters of fact as distinguished from mere opinion, and are such as to have prejudiced the adverse party.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Chas. Monroe, Judge.

Action by James I. Clements against John W. Watson and others. Appeal by defendants from a judgment in favor of plaintiff, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial. Affirmed.

H. S. Rollins and J. W. McKinley, for appellants. Frank G. Finlayson, for respondent.

ALLEN, P. J. Appeal by defendants from a judgment and order denying a new trial.

The action was on account of an attorney's fee for services rendered by plaintiff's assignor to defendants. The case was tried by a jury, which rendered a verdict in plaintiff's favor. Several months before the trial defendants demanded a bill of particulars, which was furnished by plaintiff, and contained, among other items, the item: "Retainer, seven months at $100 per month, $700." No demand was made for a further bill, and upon the trial the court permitted plaintiff to prove certain services rendered defendants, which were included in said item. This is assigned as error. "In estimating the value of an attorney's services it is proper to include in the consideration a reasonable retaining fee." Roche v. Baldwin, 143 Cal. 192, 76 Pac. 956. While the performance of actual services may not be essential in order that a retaining fee may be recovered (Knight v. Russ, 77 Cal. 413, 19 Pac. 698), it certainly cannot prejudice defendant to show that upon the faith of such retainer certain specific services were rendered for which he was not otherwise paid, and for which he made no other charge. And, in addition, the value of the retainer may be shown (Knight v. Russ, supra), in which case, the bill of items not being objected to, services rendered as affecting such value would not be improper, especially in this case, where the item of retainer at so much per month would indicate that the term employed involved something more than is usually covered by the expression.

The only other error complained of in appellants' brief relates to the action of the court in permitting counsel for plaintiff to state to the jury that it had been called at defendants' request, and then, at length, to express an opinion as to the propriety of a jury passing upon the question of the value of an attorney's fee; and, further, questioning their ability so to do as intelligently as a court might be able to do under like circumstances. Applying the rule that misstatements or improper statements made to the jury during argument as affording ground for reversal must relate to matters of fact material, as distinguished from matters of mere opinion, and, in any event, "must be such as in a material matter to have prejudiced the defendant" (People v. McMahon, 124 Cal. 436, 57 Pac. 224), we are unable to see just how defendants were prejudiced by the statements complained of. If the opinion of counsel for plaintiff, as expressed to the jury, in which its ability to intelligently determine the issues was questioned, had any effect, it certainly would not operate against the defendants, who had impliedly expressed confidence in the jury when they called it to pass upon the questions of fact involved.

We find no error prejudicial or otherwise in the record, and the judgment and order are affirmed.

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California.
Nov. 23, 1907. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 20, 1908.)

EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS—ACTIONS AGAINST—VARIANCE.

There is no variance between a claim presented for services as a clerk for a certain period at $20 per week, with a credit amounting to $7 per week for such period, and proof of employment of plaintiff by deceased at $20 per week, plaintiff to draw $7 per week, and leave the balance with deceased with which to furnish a house which was to have been built for plaintiff; the money not being held under a trust, but still being owed for services.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; W. P. James, Judge.

Action by Florence H. Cheney against D. C. McGarvin, administrator of Charles H. Bush, deceased. From an order granting defendant a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

F. B. Guthrie and Louis Luckel, for appellant. J. W. McKinley and Oscar Lawler, for respondent.

TAGGART, J. Appeal from an order granting a new trial. Plaintiff presented a properly verified claim against the estate of Charles H. Bush, deceased, of which defendant is administrator, itemized and stated as follows:

To services as general clerk in jewelry store of deceased from July 1, 1903, to May 1, 1904, 43 $\frac{1}{7}$ weeks at \$20.....	\$ 860 57
To services as general clerk in jewelry store of deceased from Dec. 20, 1904, to July 23, 1905, 32 $\frac{1}{7}$ weeks at \$20.....	642 85
	<hr/> $1,503 42
By cash received at divers times between July 1, 1903, and July 23, 1905	560 42
Balance due	<hr/> $ 943 00

This claim was rejected by defendant, and action commenced thereon by plaintiff within the statutory time. The complaint states the cause of action in two counts, one of which declares on an express promise to pay by the deceased, and the other upon the reasonable value of the services rendered. The evidence introduced by plaintiff to establish the character of her employment, and amount and manner in which she was to be paid for her services, consisted of the testimony of her daughter to an oral agreement between plaintiff and the deceased. This testimony, so far as material to the question here being considered, was: "He (Bush) asked her (plaintiff) to come to work at a salary of $20 a week." "She was to come there as clerk to sell jewelry and attend to his store. She also collected rents and attended him when he was sick." "Mr. Bush said my mother was to draw $7 a week, and leave the $13 a week remaining with him that she might furnish a home." "My mother lived with me, and Mr. Bush visited us very often. The contract between Mr. Bush and my mother was often spoken about. It was that he was to build a home, and that he was to furnish a home for us." "Mr. Bush said that she was to receive $20 per week, $13 of which was retained to be devoted to the purchase of furniture for a residence which was to be constructed by him, and he was to arrange matters by his will so that at his death it should go to my mother. This money was to be held by him and devoted to the purchase of furniture for that place. That was the agreement entered into between himself and my mother." This is the entire evidence relating to the employment of plaintiff. The case was tried by a jury, and a verdict rendered for $943 in favor of plaintiff, and judgment for that amount, with costs, entered on the verdict.

Defendant moved for a new trial, and his motion was granted, on the ground, as stated in the order, "that a material variance is shown between the proof made and the claim alleged in plaintiff's complaint and as presented to the defendant administrator, and upon no other ground." The theory upon which this ruling is sustained by respondent, and presumably that upon which the court acted, is that by the terms of the agreement proven the money sued for was retained by Bush either in trust, or under some other form of obligation to repay money held in deposit, and no longer due to plaintiff on account of the original services.

The evidence supports the claim presented in respect to there being an original indebtedness of $20 per week for plaintiff's services as therein set forth. It also shows that the credit given corresponds in amount to the $7 per week, which plaintiff was to draw under the agreement to which the daughter testified. This, of course, left the $13 per week in the hands of Bush. He owed this to her as part of her wages for services rendered, if the contract testified to does not show that the character of the indebtedness was changed by agreement or the acts of the parties. The witness says that plaintiff was to leave the $13 a week with him that she might use it to purchase furniture for a home. He was going to furnish a house for the plaintiff and her daughter, and the plaintiff was to purchase the furniture for it. There was no consideration for the leaving of this money with Bush. There is no question about it belonging to plaintiff by virtue of her having earned it as wages. She might have designated some other person to hold it for her, but like most clerks and employes she chose to leave it with her employer because she had plans which would enable her to use it better after it had been accumulating for some time. We are not aware of any authority holding that because an employé arranges with his employer to pay him but a portion of his wages, assigning as a reason for not drawing the balance that he desired to leave it in the employer's hands until such time as he could buy the furniture necessary for a home, that any trust relation was thereby created, or that the employer ceased to owe the money to the employé for services rendered. That this purchase of furniture by the plaintiff is connected with the additional offer of the deceased to furnish a home does not alter the matter or change the character of the obligation.

We do not think it necessary to distinguish those cases in which the presentation of a claim based upon a trust is considered. The order granting the new trial is expressly limited as to the grounds upon which it is based, and our consideration thereof is confined to this. Ben Lomond Wine Co. v. Sladky, 141 Cal. 621, 75 Pac. 332. In our opinion, there was no variance between the claim presented and the proof adduced to justify the trial court in granting a new trial.

Order appealed from is reversed.

We concur: ALLEN, P. J.; SHAW, J.

(7 Cal. App. 27)
PEOPLE v. LONG. (Cr. 66.)

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California.
Nov. 20, 1907.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW — APPEAL — RECORD — CONCLUSIVENESS.

On appeal in a criminal case from a denial of a motion to direct the clerk to indorse on a written motion for a new trial a certificate of its filing on a certain prior date, and to make the other proper entries on the records of such filing, where the evidence was conflicting as to whether the motion was actually made or presented for filing, the implied finding of the court, necessary to sustain its ruling, that no such motion was made or tendered for filing, is binding upon appeal.

2. SAME — MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL — HOW TO BE MADE.

While under Pen. Code, § 1182, providing that an application for a new trial must be made before judgment, and the order granting or denying it must be immediately entered by the clerk in the minutes, the motion may be filed and thus relieve the mover from stating his grounds at length, and the filed paper may be referred to for the grounds of the motion in detail, the motion must nevertheless be made orally, and the court's attention called to it, and the court moved to grant it.

3. SAME — AMENDMENT OF MOTION.

A motion after judgment to direct the clerk to indorse upon a written motion for a new trial the certificate of its filing on a date prior to judgment, in so far as it attempts to add to what actually occurred is in the nature of an amendment of the motion for a new trial, and is incompetent.

4. SAME—TRIAL—EXCEPTIONS TO ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE—TIME FOR PRESENTING BILL OF EXCEPTIONS.

While exceptions to the granting or refusal of a motion for a new trial, expressly allowed by Pen. Code, § 1172, must be made before judgment, and the order granting or denying it must be immediately entered by the clerk under the express provisions of Pen. Code, § 1182, and must be prepared and presented in a bill of exceptions to the trial court within 10 days after the ruling complained of, under Pen. Code, § 1174, relating to the settlement of exceptions, exceptions to erroneous rulings in admitting or rejecting testimony may also be embodied in a bill of exceptions, which may be presented within 10 days after judgment, and may be used upon appeal therefrom.

5. SAME—OBJECTIONS TO ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE—TIME.

If a question indicates upon its face that the answer will be inadmissible, a party cannot take the chance of a favorable reply, and then, if the answer be unfavorable, object to the question, or move to strike out the answer, if the latter be responsive; but, if the question calls for an incompetent answer, it must be objected to, or the right to have it stricken out is waived, though when the question is unobjectionable, and the answer is incompetent or irrelevant, the answer may be stricken out without previous objection to the question.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 14, Criminal Law, §§ 1630, 1640.]

6. SAME—EVIDENCE—HEARSAY.

On a robbery trial, the complaining witness, in answer to the question if he had said anything to the arresting officer in the presence and hearing of accused, stated over objection that he had told the arresting officer that accused was the man who had robbed him, and that thereupon accused denied it. Held, that the answer was hearsay and incompetent, since while an accused must deny an accusation or have his silence construed as an admission of its truth, even where he is in custody, if he does deny it in whole or in part, the accusation or statement is an admission and evidence only to the extent that it is admitted to be correct by accused, the admission and not the accusation being evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 14, Criminal Law, §§ 950-983.]

7. SAME—SUFFICIENCY OF OBJECTION.

On a robbery trial, accused objected on valid grounds to a statement of the complaining witness as to what he had told the arresting officer in the presence and hearing of accused, but did not move to strike out the statement. Before the ruling was made the district attorney suggested that the foundation which he expected to lay to make the otherwise improper statement of the witness competent was a reply by accused. The objection was overruled, and the witness testified to accused's reply. Held, that the objection being addressed to a line of incompetent evidence being introduced by the district attorney upon an improper theory, and its incompetency being pointed out by accused, and the court and district attorney having considered the objection on its merits, it should have been sustained, independent of any motion to strike out.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 14, Criminal Law, §§ 1633-1640.]

8. SAME—APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR.

As accused, in the absence of a motion to strike out the witness' statement to the arresting officer, would have obtained no material benefit from a ruling in his favor, the overruling of accused's objection was not reversible error.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 15, Criminal Law, §§ 3137-3143.]

9. SAME—SUFFICIENCY OF OBJECTION.

A specific objection was made to incompetent testimony, the testimony was admitted over the objection, and subsequently, when another witness was testifying to the same matter, it was objected to as incompetent and irrelevant, but was admitted over the objection without a ruling. Held, that the error in admitting the prior testimony was not cured by the admission of the latter "without objection," since the grounds of the objection, stated on the admission of the prior testimony, should have been considered when the same evidence was again offered, where the attention of the court was called to the whole line of evidence as incompetent.

10. CONSPIRACY—NATURE AND ELEMENTS—EVIDENCE TO ESTABLISH.

Conspiracies cannot be established by suspicions, nor does mere association make a conspiracy, but there must be evidence of some participation or interest in the commission of the offense.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 10, Constitutional Law, §§ 105-107.]

11. CRIMINAL LAW—DECLARATION OF CO-CONSPIRATOR—COMPETENCY.

Just after a robbery had been committed a woman, who was not shown to have been a party to a conspiracy with accused, had crossed the street from where the robbery had occurred, and in answer to a witness who asked her "what was the matter over there" replied that she guessed "a friend of hers was scaring somebody over there." Held, that the evidence of her statement was pure hearsay, and was not admissible as an admission of an associate in the commission of the offense.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 14, Criminal Law, §§ 973-983.]

12. SAME—RES GESTÆ.

The witness' statement was not a part of the res gestæ.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 14, Criminal Law, §§ 815, 821.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; B. N. Smith, Judge.

Irving Long was convicted of robbery, and appeals. Reversed and remanded.

F. H. Thompson, Clarence Melly, and Goldberg & Melly, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and George Beebe, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

TAGGART, J. Appellant was informed against jointly with two other defendants upon a charge of robbery. He was given a separate trial, and convicted, and on May 8, 1905, the day set for pronouncing judgment, placed on a conditional probation for the term of two years. Imposition of sentence was suspended, as provided by subdivision 1 of section 1203 of the Penal Code, in accordance with the terms of the order admitting him to probation. On August 25, 1906, he was accused of violating his parole, brought before the court, and, after a hearing, adjudged to have violated the conditions of his probation and engaged in criminal practices, and his probation was thereupon revoked and terminated, and he was arraigned for sentence, and judgment of imprisonment in the state prison pronounced. Notice of appeal from this judgment was given August 29, 1906. On June 18, 1907, pursuant to notice, appellant moved the court for an order directing the clerk to indorse upon a written motion for a new trial presented a certificate of its filing on the 8th day of May, 1906, and to make appropriate entries upon the register of criminal actions and other records of said court showing that said motion for a new trial had been filed as of the date named. The motion was made upon the records in the case, and affidavits filed. The district attorney filed counter affidavits at the hearing of the motion, and on said 18th day of June, 1907, the motion was denied, and on June 24, 1907, defendant appealed from the order of the court denying his motion.

Two bills of exception appear in the record, as filed July 9, 1907, one relating to the ruling of the court upon the motion last mentioned and settled July 9, 1907, and the other embodying exceptions to the admission of evidence upon the trial of said cause, which bill is dated August 29, 1906.

Disposing first of the appeal from the ruling on appellant's motion, we find that the counter affidavit of the deputy district attorney states that at the time the motion for a new trial is claimed to have been presented for filing, according to the affidavits of counsel for defendant, the attorney for defendant "did not present his motion for a new trial to the court, and did not state the grounds of said motion or any of them." All he did was to state that he desired to present such a motion, but upon the court's stating that he intended to put the defendant on probation, no further action was taken by defendant or his counsel in this connection. This, then, became a question of fact as to which the evidence was conflicting, and the implied finding of the court, necessary to sustain its ruling that no motion for a new trial was made or tendered for filing, is binding upon this court. If the showing made by appellant had not been contradicted, and his motion granted, it would have availed him nothing. The application for a new trial must be made before judgment, and the order granting or denying the same must be immediately entered by the clerk in the minutes. Section 1182, Pen. Code. While the motion may be filed, and thus relieve the mover from stating his grounds at length and the filed paper referred to for the grounds of the motion in detail, the motion must nevertheless be made orally. The attention of the court must be called to it, and the court moved to grant it. Williams v. Hawley, 144 Cal. 100, 77 Pac. 762; Spencer v. Branham, 109 Cal. 340, 41 Pac. 1095; People v. Ah Sam, 41 Cal. 650. To the extent that it attempted to add to what had been actually done, it would have been in the nature of an amendment of the motion for a new trial, and this was incompetent. People v. Wessel, 98 Cal. 352, 33 Pac. 216.

For the purpose of considering the assignments of error relating to the admission or rejection of testimony, it is of no practical consequence that a motion for a new trial was not made and ruled upon in this case. While exceptions to the granting or refusal of a motion for a new trial (sections 1172, 1182) must be prepared and presented in a bill to the trial court within 10 days after the ruling complained of is made (section 1174), exceptions to erroneous rulings of the court in admitting or rejecting testimony may also be embodied in a bill which may be presented within 10 days after judgment. This bill of exceptions may be used upon an appeal from the judgment. People v. Craig (Cal.) 91 Pac. 997; People v. Walker, 142 Cal. 92, 75 Pac. 658; Walker v. Superior Court, 135 Cal. 372, 67 Pac. 336; People v. Keyser, 53 Cal. 184.

The Attorney General objects to the consideration of the first error assigned, which relates to the admission of testimony, on the ground that the objection of defendant to the testimony came too late. He contends that the objection being to the answer, as distinguished from the question, should have been presented in form of a motion to strike out. The rules relied upon by the Attorney General have often been declared by the courts, and are said to be so simple and well settled that no difficulty should arise in their application and no departure from them should be tolerated. As declared by the authorities cited, they cover in substance the following: If a question indicates upon its face that the response to it will be inadmissible, a party cannot take the chance of a favorable reply, and then, if the answer be unfavorable, object to the question, or move to strike out the answer, if the latter be responsive. If the question calls for an incompetent answer, it must be objected to, or the right to have the answer stricken out is waived. But when the question is unobjectionable, and the answer is incompetent or irrelevant, the answer may be stricken out without previous objection to the question. People v. Williams, 127 Cal. 216, 59 Pac. 581; People v. Lawrence, 143 Cal. 155, 76 Pac. 893; People v. Scalamiero, 143 Cal. 346, 76 Pac. 1008; Johnston v. Beadle (Cal. App.) 91 Pac. 1012; People v. Smith (Cal.) 91 Pac. 513. The objection here under consideration was not to the question, and the question did not indicate on its face that the response to it would be inadmissible. It was not unseasonable, because by its very terms it was addressed to a statement contained in the answer. Instead of being made in the form of a motion to strike out, it was in the form of an objection to the answer. On the direct examination of the complaining witness he was asked: "Q. Now there in the presence of Long, this defendant here, and in hearing of Long, did you say anything to Tyler? [Tyler was the arresting officer.] A. The only thing I said to Tyler was: 'That is the man that went through my pockets'—pointing to Long." To this appellant objected: "Object to that as being hearsay. No sufficient foundation laid for the statement. Has not been shown this defendant was within hearing of that statement." The district attorney thereupon stated: "We are going to show that he replied to it." The objection was overruled, and an exception preserved. The witness then continued: "When I said, 'That is the man that went through my pockets' in the presence of Long, he said: 'No; he was not the man that done it.' He said he was not the man that took the money off of me." Thus we see it was the statement in the answer which was objected to upon the ground that the proper foundation had not been laid for its introduction. Before the ruling was made by the court the district attorney suggested to the court the foundation which he expected to lay to make the statement competent, and thereupon the objection of defendant was overruled, and the witness testified to the reply upon which the district attorney relied as establishing a foundation for the introduction of the statement which he, in effect, admitted to be improper testimony without it.

Whether we consider the objection and ruling as made after the statement of the district attorney or after the witness had testified, the evidence was hearsay and inadmissible. While the rule in this state compels a defendant to deny an accusation or have his silence construed as an admission of its truth, even where he is in the custody of the arresting officers (People v. Dole, 122 Cal. 490, 55 Pac. 581, 68 Am. St. Rep. 50), if he does so deny it, either in whole or in part, the accusation or statement is an admission and evidence only to the extent that it is admitted to be correct by the defendant. In other words, it is the admission and not the accusation which is evidence. People v. Ah Yute, 54 Cal. 91; People v. Estrado, 49 Cal. 171. The rule is clearly illustrated in the companion cases of People v. Amaya, 134 Cal. 536, 66 Pac. 794, and People v. Teshara, 134 Cal. 544, 66 Pac. 798. The objection to the admission of this line of evidence was seasonable, and should have been sustained upon the district attorney's offer, since this did not include a "reply" which would render the accusation admissible. This objection should have been followed, however, by a motion on defendant's part to strike out the accusation, as that was the prejudicial testimony which was improperly admitted. The objection was addressed to a line of incompetent evidence being introduced by the district attorney upon an improper theory, and its incompetency was pointed out by the objection of defendant. Both the court and the district attorney considered this objection on its merits, and it should have been sustained, independent of any motion to strike out. To refuse to consider it now as unseasonable because of its form would be to approve of the setting of a trap for the unwary attorney, a practice which would be scarcely less reprehensible than the practice of this kind toward the trial court, which appellate courts are sometimes called upon to rebuke. There was no element of surprise upon the part of the court involved, and the defendant is entitled to the benefit of his exception preserved to the ruling of the court. Blum v. Manhattan Ry. Co., 1 Misc. Rep. 119, 20 N. Y. S. 722; Sneed v. Marysville Gas Co., 149 Cal. 709, 87 Pac. 376. Without the motion to strike out the accusation he would have obtained little benefit from a ruling in his favor, and so considered we would not regard this error alone sufficient to justify a reversal of the judgment.

The evidence of the officer Tyler in relation to this matter is substantially the same as that of Friary. The testimony of this witness is in a narrative form, and when the matter mentioned was reached, defendant's attorney interjected: "Object to that as being incompetent and irrelevant." No ruling of the court upon this objection appears in the record. This is a repetition of the objection of defendant to the same improper line of testimony, made in the same irregular way, without even being given a consideration by the trial court. Under such conditions, we are called upon to say that this testimony so "admitted without objection" cures any error complained of in the ruling admitting the testimony of the witness Friary. We cannot agree with this contention. The grounds of the objection, stated in connection with the same matter in the testimony of Friary, should have been considered when the same testimony was sought to be introduced through another witness, the attention of the court being called to the whole line of evidence as incompetent.

The admission of the statement made by the Boland woman to the witness Fletcher was error. There was no evidence of any conspiracy between defendant and the woman. Conspiracies cannot be established by suspicions. There must be some evidence. Mere association does not make a conspiracy. There must be evidence of some participation or interest in the commission of the offense. Neither was her statement a part of the res gestæ. She had come across the street from where the trouble was going on between defendant and the complaining witness, and in response to a question from a stranger as to "what was the matter over there" replied that she guessed "a friend of hers was scaring somebody over there." This was pure hearsay. It is difficult to see how it could have been given much weight by the jury; but when it is treated as the admission of an associate in the commission of the offense, the theory upon which it was admitted as expressed in the ruling of the court, we are not prepared to say it was not prejudicial.

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded for new trial.

KING v. SAMUEL et al. (Civ. 381.)

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California.
Nov. 22, 1907. On Rehearing,
Dec. 23, 1907.)

1. DEEDS — CONSTRUCTION — REPUGNANT CLAUSES.

A deed described land as "all the swamp and overflowed land in survey No. 593 embraced in sections 27 and 28, township 15 south, range 23 east M. D. B. & M., and more particularly described as follows" (setting out the land by metes and bounds), and closed with the words: "This conveyance intends to convey all the S. and O. land in sections 27 and 28 lying west of the K. river." The description by metes and bounds covered swamp and overflowed lands on both sides of the K. river, but the acreage stated in the deed was much less than that included within the boundaries given. Held, that the description and the closing clause are not so repugnant as to justify the rejection of the closing clause under Civ. Code, § 1070, providing that, "if several parts of a grant are irregular, the former part prevails.

2. SAME—EVIDENCE OF AID—CONSTRUCTION.

Where the description in a deed is uncertain, extrinsic evidence may be introduced to prove the intention of the parties.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 16, Deeds, § 343.]

3. SAME—PROPERTY CONVEYED—EVIDENCE.

In an action to quiet title, where defendants' deed described the lands as "all the swamp and overflowed land in survey No. 593 embraced in sections 27 and 28, township 15 south, range 23 east M. D. B. & M., and more particularly described as follows" (setting out the land by metes and bounds), and closes with the words, "this conveyance intends to convey all the S. and O. land in sections 27 and 28 lying west of the river," evidence held to show that defendant did not take by the deed the land on the east side of the river.

4. TAXATION—REDEMPTION FROM TAX SALE—NOTICE TO REDEEM.

Pol. Code, § 3735, as amended by St. 1891, p. 133, c. 121, provides that the purchaser of property sold for delinquent taxes, or his assigns, must, 30 days previous to the expiration of the time for redemption, or 30 days before he applies for a deed, serve the owner of the property purchased, or the occupant of such property, a written notice that the property has been sold, the amount thereof, and the time when the right of redemption will expire, or when the purchaser will apply for a deed. Held that, where property was sold for taxes June 30, 1893, a conveyance to the purchaser, without such notice being given, is void.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 45, Taxation, §§ 1407-1409.]

5. APPEAL—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR—EVIDENCE.

Conceding that evidence offered by plaintiff to rebut recitals in a tax deed introduced by defendant was inadmissible, the error was harmless, where the deed itself was void for want of notice to the owner of the expiration of the time for redemption.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 20, Evidence, §§ 605-637.]

6. EVIDENCE—SECONDARY EVIDENCE — PROOF OF LOSS OF AND SEARCH FOR PRIMARY EVIDENCE.

Under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1855, 1937, providing that if a written instrument is lost, its contents may be proved by other evidence, an instrument will be regarded as lost for all practical purposes of the trial when it cannot be found after diligent search, and reasonable diligence in making the search does not require the exploration of all possible places where the instrument might be.

7. SAME.

Evidence held sufficient to show the loss of a deed justifying admission of secondary evidence of its contents.

On Rehearing.8. DEEDS — CONSTRUCTION — REPUGNANT CLAUSES.

Civ. Code, § 1069, providing that a grant between private parties is to be interpreted in favor of the grantee, must be read in connection with Civ. Code, § 1654, providing that, where there is uncertainty, the language of the instrument must be interpreted most strongly against the party who caused the uncertainty to exist, and hence, where the grantee draws a deed describing land as "all the swamp and overflowed land in survey No. 593 embraced in sections 27 and 28, township 15 south, range 23 east M. D. B. & M., and more particularly described as follows" (setting out the land by metes and bounds, which covers land on both sides of the river, though the acreage stated is much less than would be included by those bounds), and closes with the words "this conveyance intends to convey all the S. and O. land in sections 27 and 28 lying west of the K. river," the latter clause cannot be ignored.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; H. Z. Austin, Judge.

Action by W. R. King against Moses Samuel and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, Moses Samuel appeals. Affirmed.

Stanton L. Carter, for appellant. George Cosgrove and W. D. Foot, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Action to quiet title. The controversy concerns the title to certain swamp and overflowed land in sections 27 and 28, township 15 south, range 23 east, Mt. Diablo base and meridian, situated in Fresno county. The land in question is that portion of said sections embraced in survey No. 593 lying on the east side of Kings river. The survey is particularly described in the complaint by metes and bounds, "as described in patent of the state of California to W. T. Cole, recorded May 1, 1888, in Book of Patents, at page 41, records of Fresno county." Plaintiff alleged ownership in fee on and ever since April 13, 1901. A general demurrer to the complaint was overruled, and defendant Samuel alone answered. He denied plaintiff's alleged ownership, and alleged on his own behalf upon information and belief "that he is, and long prior to the commencement of this action (complaint filed May 25, 1904) was, and ever since has been, the owner in fee of all that portion of swamp and overflowed land survey numbered 593 lying east of the center of the channel of Kings river * * * and within sections 27 and 28, * * * which said land, as defendant is informed and believes, is the land attempted to be described in plaintiff's complaint." The court made the general findings: "(1) That all the allegations of plaintiff's complaint are true, and that the denials contained in the answer of defendant, Moses Samuel, are, and each of them is, untrue;" and (2) that on April 13, 1901, plaintiff was and ever since has been and now is the owner in fee of all the land in said sections situated on the east side of Kings river, being a portion of the survey 593 as particularly described in the complaint and as set out in the finding, and that defendant Samuel's claim is without right. Judgment went accordingly, from which and from the order denying his motion for a new trial defendant Samuel appeals.

The evidence shows that survey 593 embraced parts of sections 21, 22, 27, and 28 of said township on both sides of Kings river, and was approved June 24, 1871, and recorded June 29, 1871. Patent issued to W. T. Cole April 18, 1888, and describes the land as in the survey "containing 189.20 acres, more or less." There was admitted in evidence a deed from Cole to S. M. King, C. W. King, and W. R. King (plaintiff), dated April 5, 1901, duly recorded, to that portion of sections 27 and 28, in survey 593, "which lies and is situated on the east side of Kings river," refers to the patent, and concludes: "This conveyance intends to convey, and does convey, to the grantees herein mentioned all of the swamp and overflowed land in sections 27 and 28, township 15 S., range 23 E. M. D. B. & M., which now lies, and is situated, on the east side of Kings river, in said section." A quitclaim deed from Bank of Selma to S. M., C. W., and W. R. King, dated March 20, 1901, duly recorded, was introduced in evidence, and it appeared from the judgment roll in an action by said bank against said Cole that a judgment of foreclosure was entered against him authorizing the sale of "all the right, title, and interest of said mortgagor (W. T. Cole) in and to overflowed land in said sections 27 and 28, in said township fifteen (15), (omitting north or south), of said range twenty-three (23) east of Mt. Diablo base and meridian." The judgment roll shows the decree of foreclosure and order of sale dated the 22d day of January, 1896, directing the sale of the mortgaged premises; also that a sale of said premises was made under said order to the plaintiff in the action; the said bank, and the commissioner's deed dated February 29, 1896. There was evidence also that S. M. and C. W. King, in May or June, 1894, conveyed their interest to plaintiff. At this point plaintiff rested his case, and there was a motion for a nonsuit, on the ground that the evidence does not show a conveyance of the property by Cole to the Kings, nor by S. M. and C. W. King to W. R. King, and that the conveyance from the bank under foreclosure proceedings is not sufficient to convey any title that Cole may have had, and that it does not appear that at the time he executed the mortgage to the bank, or at the time of the conveyance by Cole, he had any title to the property. This motion was overruled, and defendant Samuel excepted. The foregoing presents plaintiff's chain of title.

Defendant Samuel introduced in evidence a deed from Cole to Margaret R. Ross, executrix of the estate of Henry Ross, deceased, dated October 1, 1891, and duly recorded, by which Cole granted to said Margaret R. Ross the following land, to wit: "All the swamp and overflowed land in survey No. 593 embraced in sections 27 and 28, township 15 S., range 23 E. M. D. B. & M., and more particularly described as follows, to wit." (Then follows the description of the land by metes and bounds.) At the close of this description is the following clause: "This conveyance intends to convey all the S. and O. land in sections 27 and 28 lying west of the river." By mesne conveyances defendant derails title through the above grantee. On June 30, 1893, the property in controversy was sold to the state by the tax collector of Fresno county for delinquent state and county taxes for the year 1892. A deed was made to the state November 1, 1898, under said sale. On July 5, 1901, the state by the tax collector sold and conveyed the land to one Meyer, and defendant derails title through him. It was admitted that Margaret R. Ross intermarried with one Baird, and is the same person as Margaret R. Baird mentioned in the transcript. Two questions arise under the deed from Cole to Mrs. Ross as executrix of the will of Henry Ross, deceased: First, did it in absolute and uncertain terms convey the land in controversy? second, if not, was extrinsic evidence admissible to explain the intention of the parties? The deed first described all the land in sections 27 and 28 by metes and bounds, including by the description the land in question. The acreage is set down as 69.53, which is considerably less than the acreage in said sections embraced on both sides of the river. Following the description is this clause: "This conveyance intends to convey all the S. and O. lands in sections 27 and 28 lying west of the river."

Appellant contends: That if there is any conflict between the two parts of the description, the former must prevail, and the clause quoted must be ignored—citing section 1070 of the Civil Code. And that a general description in a deed of conveyance, which is certain, must prevail, if the particular description is uncertain—citing Martin v. Lloyd, 94 Cal. 195, 203, 29 Pac. 491, 493. The Code section cited reads as follows: "If several parts of a grant are absolutely irreconcilable, the former part prevails." There is no such repugnancy between the description given in the deed and the subsequent clause as would justify the rejection entirely of this clause. In speaking of a conflict between the granting clause of a deed and its habendum, the court said in Barnett v. Barnett, 104 Cal. 298, 300, 37 Pac. 1049, 1050: "The intention of the parties to the grant is to be gathered from the instrument itself, and determined by a proper construction of the language used therein; but for the purpose of ascertaining this intention the entire instrument, the habendum as well as the premises, is to be considered, and, if it appear from such consideration that the grantor intended by the habendum clause to restrict or limit or enlarge the estate named in the granting clause, the habendum will prevail over the granting clause."

Appellant says the intention was to make more certain that the description included the land on the west side of the river. But why introduce it at all when a complete description preceded it, including that land? It is quite as reasonable to suppose that it was introduced to make clear the intention not to embrace the land on the east side of the river. The case cited in 94 Cal. is not in point, because we cannot say that the clause in dispute is uncertain. It is as certain and definite in its meaning as any part of the deed; for it has the river as a controlling monument. It seems to us that we must either give effect to this clause, and limit the grant accordingly, or we must sustain the lower court in its ruling that there was sufficient doubt and uncertainty as to the intention of the grantor to warrant the introduction of extrinsic evidence to ascertain that intention by considering the situation of the parties, the subject-matter at the time of contracting, and the attendant and surrounding circumstances leading to the execution of the instrument. That such inquiry may be made where such doubt exists is well settled. Martin v. Lloyd, supra; Walsh v. Abbott, 145 Cal. 285, 289, 78 Pac. 715, 104 Am. St. Rep. 38, where the rule is spoken of as a familiar principle of construction.

It appeared from the evidence that on September 19, 1887, Cole sold to Henry Ross (Mrs. Ross' testator) "69.25 acres embraced by the land on the west side of Kings river in sections 27 and 28" for $1,731.25, or $25 per acre. Having lost his certificate of purchase, and having applied for a duplicate, he entered into a bond with Ross to convey the land upon obtaining a patent, agreeing to repay the money upon failure to obtain the patent. Ross was given "immediate possession of said land, and to use the same in such manner as he may see proper, and to cut and remove wood therefrom in such quantities as he may see fit." Before Ross died Cole made a deed to him, and received back his notes and bond given as security; but the deed was not satisfactory to Ross, and was not recorded, and after his death Mrs. Ross was unwilling to accept it. On October 1, 1891, after the death of Ross, Cole made the deed in question to her as executrix of her husband's will. This was at her request, and the deed was prepared by one McKenzie acting for her. In doing so McKenzie described the land on both sides of the river; but he gave the acreage as originally sold to Ross, and then inserted the clause, which has given rise to this controversy. No new consideration passed, and the purpose was to complete the sale of Cole to Ross in the latter's lifetime. Cole testified: "After I made the deed to Mrs. Ross, I told her: 'Why don't you buy the balance of this land, and have it all?' and she says: 'If William Shafer will advise me to buy this land, I will pay you your price for it and take it.' 'All right,' says I, 'you see him.' Mr. Shafer being a son-in-law of mine, I wouldn't approach him. By the balance of this land I meant the swamp land in 27 and 28 on the east side of the river. I can't remember how many acres there were. This old deed that was returned to me had been tampered with, and there was 80 acres down on that in a different handwrite altogether." He also testified: "Mrs. Baird (formerly Mrs. Ross) never did anything with the land on the east side of the river. She didn't claim it." Another witness, familiar with the land since 1884, testified: "I never knew her to do anything with the land on the east side of the river. Q. She did have possession of the land on the west side? A. Oh, yes; we all understand that she owned the land on the west side; used to go there often for picnics and the like; never knew her to have anything to do with the land there." Similar testimony was given by other witnesses. There is evidence in some degree conflicting with some of the above testimony, but the trial court alone is charged with the responsibility of reconciling the evidence adduced before it. There is evidence warranting the trial court in holding that the land originally sold by Cole to Ross did not include the land on the east side of the river, that in the subsequent transactions with Mrs. Ross she so understood it and acted upon that construction of her deed. In the light thrown upon the instrument by these extrinsic facts, which were admissible and relevant, we are clearly of the opinion that Mrs. Ross did not take by the deed in question the land on the east side of the river, and hence conveyed no title to her grantee through whom defendant claims. These extrinsic facts all relate to a time when Mrs. Ross held the title from Cole. Code Civ. Proc. § 1849; Williams v. Harter, 121 Cal. 47, 53 Pac. 405.

Respondent contends that the tax collector had no power to make the tax deed to Meyer, for the reason that there was no notice given by the purchaser, and also for the further reason that the deed contains no description of the land attempted to be conveyed. The law in force at the time was the act of March 19, 1891. St. 1891, p. 133. Section 2, which amended section 3785 of the Political Code, reads in part: "Provided, however, that the purchaser of property sold for delinquent taxes, or his assigns, must, thirty (30) days previous to the expiration of the time for the redemption, or thirty days before he applies for a deed, serve the owner of the property purchased, or upon the person occupying the property, if said property is occupied, a written notice." (Then follow certain things which must be embraced in the notice.) The act requires a duplicate of this notice to be filed with the county recorder. It also provides for posting the notice upon the property, if unoccupied, and the owner cannot be found; "and no deed of property sold at a delinquent tax sale shall be issued by the tax collector, or any officer, to the purchaser of said property, until the notice herein provided for shall have been given, and each purchaser shall have filed with such tax collector, or other officer, an affidavit showing that the notice hereinbefore required to be given has been given as required," etc. This was the law in force when the deed was made, and must govern the sale. Reed v. Lyon, 96 Cal. 501, 31 Pac. 619; Teralta v. Shaffer, 116 Cal. 518, 48 Pac. 613, 58 Am. St. Rep. 194; Walsh v. Burke, 134 Cal. 594, 66 Pac. 866; Collier v. Shaffer, 137 Cal. 319, 70 Pac. 177. In the recent case of Johnson v. Taylor (Cal.) 88 Pac. 903, 10 L. R. A. (N. S.) 818, Mr. Justice Sloss deals at some length with a case similar to this and holds that, where property was sold for delinquent taxes in 1894, a conveyance to the purchaser, without any notice of the expiration of the period of redemption having been given, is void. Referring to the statute of 1891, supra, the learned justice said: "As the law then stood, a deed could not be issued to the purchaser without the giving of the notice required by section 3785 (Hughes v. Cannedy, 92 Cal. 352, 28 Pac. 573), and one relying on a tax deed was bound to establish the giving of such notice as a part of his proof of title (Miller v. Miller, 96 Cal. 576, 31 Pac. 247, 31 Am. St. Rep. 229; Reed v. Lyon, 96 Cal. 501, 31 Pac. 619; Walsh v. Burke, 134 Cal. 594, 66 Pac. 866). The opinion then proceeds to discuss the effect of subsequent statutes, and concludes: "Under the law as it existed at the time of the sale, the plaintiff's right of redemption was not limited by any fixed time. It lasted at least one year, and would last indefinitely thereafter until 30 days after the purchaser should give the notice required by the statute." It was also held that "the requirement of giving notice applied as well to the state as to a private purchaser." In the case at bar, as in Johnson v. Taylor, there was no proof of any such notice having been given, and as the law in force when the sale was made must govern, it follows that defendant has failed to establish that any title ever passed from Cole to him. The same view is expressed by this court in Gupill v. Kelsey, 5 Cal. App. 27, 91 Pac. 409. These cases were decided since appellant's brief was filed, and would seem to answer his contention. Conceding that the evidence offered by plaintiff in rebuttal of recitals in the deed of the state to Meyer was immaterial and irrelevant, it was without prejudice.

It remains to determine whether plaintiff proved title. Plaintiff offered in evidence a deed by Cole to S. M. King, C. W. King, and W. R. King of date April 15, 1901 (and, as we have seen, Cole was then the owner), which accurately and definitely described the property in dispute. There was also admitted in evidence over defendant's objection a quitclaim deed of the Bank of Selma to the same persons, dated March 20, 1901. The bank assumed to convey by virtue of purchase at foreclosure sale under a mortgage executed to it by Cole. Plaintiff was permitted also to introduce, against the defendant's objection, parol testimony to prove that S. M. and C. W. King conveyed the land to plaintiff by deed dated March 20, 1901. The objection to the Bank of Selma deed is that it conveyed nothing, because the mortgage to the bank failed to state whether the township was north or south of the Mt. Diablo meridian. The title of plaintiff is established independently of this deed, as we think, and hence we need not consider the deed from the bank to the Kings.

S. M. King was plaintiff's father and C. W. King was plaintiff's brother. Plaintiff testified that he received a conveyance of the land in dispute, and left it in the care of his attorney, Mr. Cosgrove, and has not seen it since, but did not remember the date. Mr. Cosgrove testified that he himself prepared a deed from S. M. and C. W. King to plaintiff, that it was signed and acknowledged by C. W. King in his office, that it was sent to Selma to be executed by S. M. King, that it was returned to his office "signed by S. M. King and properly acknowledged." He testified: "Now that deed has been misplaced in my office with the original deed from Cole to King. I have evidently wrapped it up in some papers, and I have not been able to find them, although I have made diligent search at different times within the last three months. * * * I know, as a matter of fact, however, that the conveyance was actually made. It covered the swamp and overflowed land. I remember the contents of the document, and the names of the parties contained in it (naming them). There was a description of the land contained in the deed. I know what that description was (describing the land in controversy). The document contained a habendum clause. It contained the usual common clauses of printed forms of deeds. It was a grant deed (giving other particulars). * * * When it came back from Selma or somewhere S. M. King's name was appended, together with a certificate of acknowledgment by him. The certificate of acknowledgment was in due form, taken before a notary or a justice of the peace. I wouldn't be certain which. It was in due form." On cross-examination he testified that he could not state whether it came back through the mail, but thought it did; that he discovered he had lost it while he was preparing for the trial within the last three months; that he did not look among all the papers in his office, but did look among all of them that he "thought by any possibility it might become confused with"; that he would not state positively it was not in his office, but that he had not destroyed it or intentionally given it away to any one; that he knows he has searched among all the papers that he thought by any possibility it could be among; that he did not look in all his books to see if it had not been folded in some one of them, but looked where it ought to be or might be, "but not in every place where it was possible for it to be"; that he had recently made a careful search in every place where he thought it likely was.

It is claimed by appellant that no sufficient foundation was laid for the admission of testimony as to the loss of the deed or its contents; that the testimony of the alleged grantors of the deed should have been taken, or the notary's, or its absence accounted for; that Mr. Cosgrove did not exhaust the search of all places in his office where by some possibility the deed might have been discovered; that plaintiff did not testify that he had not possession of the deed, and did not then know its whereabouts. But plaintiff did testify that he left it in care of Mr. Cosgrove, his attorney, and since that time he had not seen it. He could not truthfully say that he had not seen it if he had it in his possession. It would have strengthened plaintiff's case had he shown by the grantors that they signed the deed, or by the notary that he had taken their acknowledgment of its execution, but we cannot say that such proof was indispensable. The Code provides that the original writing must be produced and proved, except where it is lost or destroyed, in which case proof of loss or destruction must be first made. If it has been lost and proof of that fact made, evidence of its contents may be taken by the recollection of witnesses. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1855, 1937. We think the term "loss" as used in the statute means something different from destruction, for in the latter case loss would necessarily follow, but not so in case of loss. The instrument may be lost for all practical purposes of the trial when it cannot be found after diligent search and yet it may exist. We do not think that reasonable diligence in making the search should require the exploration of all possible places where the instrument might be.

Whether a sufficient foundation was laid to justify secondary evidence is a question of law, and the evidence may be examined by the appellate court to determine its sufficiency. Still no arbitrary or hard and fast rule can be laid down by which to judge the evidence. The rule stated by Mr. Greenleaf is as follows: "If the instrument is lost, the party is required to give some evidence that such a paper once existed, though slight evidence is sufficient for this purpose, and that a bona fide and diligent search has been unsuccessfully made for it in the place where it is most likely to be found, if the nature of the case admits such proof; after which his own affidavit is admissible to the fact of its loss.

* * * What degree of diligence in the search is necessary, it is not easy to define, as each case depends much upon its peculiar circumstances; and the question whether the loss of the instrument is sufficiently proved to admit secondary evidence of its contents is to be determined by the court, and not by the jury. But it seems that in general the party is expected to show that he has in good faith exhausted, in a reasonable degree, all the sources of information and means of discovery which the nature of the case would naturally suggest, and which were accessible to him. It should be recollected that the subject of the proof is merely to establish a reasonable presumption of the loss of the instrument, and that this is a preliminary inquiry addressed to the discretion of the judge. If the paper was supposed to be of little value, or is ancient, a less degree of diligence will be demanded, as it will be aided by the presumption of loss which these circumstances afford." 1 Greenleaf on Evidence (16th Ed.) § 5636. The surrounding circumstances and facts are to be taken into consideration; the presence or absence of pecuniary interest or other improper motive in seeking to substitute secondary for the best evidence; the probability that the instrument was materially different from that sought to be established by the oral proof; the effect such proof would have upon the rights of the person seeking to exclude it; the character of the witnesses, and their relation to the transaction as interested parties or otherwise. These and other matters that might be suggested are fair subjects for consideration, and the weight to be given them is largely within the discretion of the trial judge.

In the case here the title to the property passed to the Kings—father and his two sons—by Cole's deed. Plaintiff has a third interest by virtue of that deed. Proof that the father and the other son conveyed to plaintiff could not affect the title of defendant, for he has none, and as they are not parties to the action a judgment resting on such proof could not affect their interest. At most it would only meet the technical rule of law that plaintiff in the action must rely upon the strength of his own title and not upon the weakness or failure of his adversary's. No motive of self-interest can be imputed to Mr. Cosgrove, nor can a reasonable belief be entertained that he would falsify the contents of the deed drawn by him, or that he could have had any possible interest in concealing it; his testimony being that its sole purpose was to pass to plaintiff the interest held by his father and brother. Besides, his testimony was that the brother in fact executed and acknowledged the deed in his office, and, while this fact does not bear directly upon the fact that the deed was afterwards lost, it is a fact not to be ignored in considering the weight to be given Mr. Cosgrove's testimony as to the loss or disappearance of the deed. Most of the cases cited by appellant were cases where the secondary evidence was vital in determining in whom the title was vested—plaintiff or defendant. But here the result must be to quiet plaintiff's title to one-third interest in the property, leaving the other two-thirds to be determined possibly in another action, but in no event to belong to defendant. In our opinion there was a sufficient foundation laid to admit the secondary evidence offered.

Most of the rulings upon the evidence complained of depend upon the view of the law taken by defendant as to which we have expressed our disagreement with him and have thus disposed of them. Some of these rulings have been noticed in the course of the opinion, and others will at once be seen to be either free from error or not prejudicial from our standpoint of the main question to which the rulings related. We have examined the other rulings to which exception was taken, and fail to discover such prejudicial error as would, under the view we have taken of the case, warrant a reversal. This view also makes it unnecessary to consider the motion for a nonsuit.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

On Rehearing.

CHIPMAN, P. J. We do not feel called upon to write opinions in all cases where rehearings are denied or granted, and where we fail to do so it is through no indifference to the views of counsel, but because our attention is invited to no question, necessary to the decision, which has not in our judgment been sufficiently noticed. Where some more or less vital question has been overlooked or insufficiently treated, it would seem but just that further consideration to it should be given. The court invites careful scrutiny of its decisions, and deems it a favor to be given an opportunity to correct errors which it may have committed. Our attention is now invited to two points which counsel urges were either overlooked or not given due consideration. It is said that we "overlooked, as did the court below, the provisions of section 1069 of the Civil Code, which provides that a grant between private parties is to be interpreted in favor of the grantee"; and it is urged that, if the several parts of a grant are absolutely irreconcilable, the former prevails. Section 1070, Civ. Code. Where the question is simply one of construction, the Code rule should be followed. But the general rule that the earlier clause prevails is not imperative where the inconsistency or irreconcilability is so great as to justify extrinsic evidence to explain it. The Code rule that a grant is to be interpreted in favor of the grantee must be read in connection with another Code rule (section 1654, Civ. Code), which provides that, where there is uncertainty, the language of the instrument must be interpreted most strongly against the party who caused the uncertainty to exist. In the present case the deed under examination was prepared by McKenzie, the attorney or agent of Mrs. Ross, and was executed at her request as thus prepared. We still think that the latter clause of the deed cannot be wholly ignored, but that extrinsic evidence was admissible to aid the court in arriving at the intention of the parties.

Upon the evidence it may be admitted that the trial court would have been justified in reaching a different conclusion as to the intention of the parties. Mrs. Ross testified that her intention in having the disputed clause inserted in the deed was to make sure that she would get the land west of the river. Her testimony is, in some respects, corroborated. On the other hand, the testimony of Cole leads to a different conclusion, certainly as to his intention in executing the deed, and what he understood to be its purpose, and the conduct of Mrs. Ross in some degree weakened her statement. The testimony and also the documentary evidence on the point are in open conflict. It was the province of the trial judge to reconcile conflicting evidence and inferences derivable therefrom. If we are correct in our view that resort to extrinsic evidence was justified, the rule that, where there is a substantial conflict, this court will not interfere with the conclusions of the trial court, leaves us without power to look farther. The manifestly firm and honest conviction of counsel for appellant that we are in error in holding that extrinsic evidence was admissible has led us to re-examine the question; but, with our present lights, we are still of the opinion that such evidence was properly taken. Indeed, this to our minds is the principal question in the case, and, fortunately for appellant, if we are wrong, he has an adequate and speedy method to correct our error.

Rehearing is denied.

KNIGHT v. COHEN et al. (Civ. 421.)

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Nov. 22, 1907. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 21, 1908.)

1. TRIAL — AGREED STATEMENT OF FACTS — FINDINGS OF FACT—NECESSITY.

Where a case is submitted on an agreed statement of facts, the only question for consideration is the law applicable thereto, and no findings of fact need be made.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 46, Trial, §§ 908-911.]

2. ADVERSE POSSESSION—HOSTILE CHARACTER—CLAIM OF RIGHT.

The occupancy of land, to constitute adverse user, must be based on a claim of right.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 1, Adverse Possession, §§ 387-389.]

3. SAME—NATURE AND GROUNDS.

Possession and user as owners usually hold and use land, without recognizing title in another, or disavowing title in himself, will, if unexplained, establish a claim of title by the occupant.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 1, Adverse Possession, §§ 394, 395.]

4. WATERS AND WATER COURSES—IRRIGATION LINES—EASEMENT IN LAND—ADVERSE POSSESSION—BURDEN OF PROOF.

Where plaintiff's grantors entered upon land under an invalid deed, and maintained a water course over a part thereof openly, continuously, and with defendant's knowledge for more than five years, the burden is on defendant, in order to establish her exclusive title thereto, to show that plaintiff's user was by permission, or otherwise explain it.

5. ADVERSE POSSESSION—HOSTILE CHARACTER—PURCHASER UNDER INVALID DEED.

Where plaintiff's grantors entered under an invalid deed upon land, which defendant subsequently purchased upon foreclosure of a deed of trust executed before such entry, they did not become tenants by sufferance of defendant upon the execution of the trust and purchase by her, and their subsequent possession, in the absence of agreement, was as owner and claimant, which might ripen into a prescriptive title.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 1, Adverse Possession, §§ 415-417.]

6. SAME—COLOR OF TITLE.

Code Civ. Proc. § 322, provides that the possession of property under exclusive claim of title under a written instrument for five years is deemed to be held adversely. Plaintiff's grantors entered upon land under a deed conveying no title, and maintained a water course thereon openly and continuously for five years, using the land as their own, and expressly claiming title thereto by virtue of the deed, and defending suits by defendant to oust them. Held, that the possession of plaintiff and his grantors was under color of title and adverse.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 1, Adverse Possession, §§ 394, 409, 415-417.]

7. SAME—EXTENT OF POSSESSION.

The extent of the right obtained by an adverse holding under an invalid deed is not determined by the terms of the grant therein, but by actual occupation and use.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 1, Adverse Possession, §§ 547-594.]

8. WATERS AND WATER COURSES—IRRIGATION LINES—RIGHTS OF WAY—ESTOPPEL TO CLAIM.

Condemnation proceedings brought by plaintiff to secure a right of way for an enlarged pipe line, and for several tunnels, would not estop him from asserting a prescriptive right to the land upon which the original line was maintained, since the proceedings were not to acquire the right then in use, but to enlarge it.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walter Bordwell, Judge.

Action by Jesse Knight, trustee, against Emily G. Cohen and William Cohen. From a judgment in plaintiff's favor, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

See 90 Pac. 145.

J. J. Scrivner, Alfred H. Cohen, and Lawler, Allen & Van Dyke, for appellants. Anderson & Anderson and Munson & Barclay, for respondent.

SHAW, J. This is an action brought to obtain an injunction against defendants restraining them from cutting or otherwise interfering with a pipe line of plaintiff's extending across the land of appellant Emily

G. Cohen, and by means whereof plaintiff conducts certain waters developed upon contiguous lands to the consumers thereof.

The case was submitted upon an agreed statement of facts, it being stipulated that the court might base its conclusions of law thereupon and render judgment accordingly. The court adopted the statement of facts as its findings, and, in addition thereto, found that all the allegations of the complaint were true, and that all of the denials of the answer to the complaint were untrue. These two findings should, if findings be necessary in such a case, dispose of the contention of appellant. It has been held, however, that, where a case is submitted upon an agreed statement of facts, no findings are necessary, the only question being as to what is the law applicable to those facts. Gregory v. Gregory, 102 Cal. 50, 36 Pac. 364; McMenomy v. White, 115 Cal. 339, 47 Pac. 100. This being true, it is necessary to call attention to such parts of this lengthy narrative as may be pertinent to a proper consideration of the question presented.

From this statement it appears that in 1893 May I. Gould, who was the owner of the land across which said pipe line extends, executed a deed of trust whereby she conveyed said lands to a trustee as security for the payment of a loan obtained from the appellant Emily G. Cohen. Default was made in the payment of this loan, and on February 20, 1899, the trust was executed by sale of the property to said Cohen, who immediately entered into possession thereof. On April 30, 1898, said Gould, the then occupant and owner of said land subject to said deed of trust, executed to one Dunham, the grantor of plaintiff, a deed whereby she granted to said Dunham a right of way across the lands in question for the construction of said pipe line, which he immediately constructed over and across said lands, since which time he and his successors in interest have continuously used said pipe line for the purposes for which it was intended. This deed to Dunham was not recorded, and defendants had no knowledge of its existence at the time Emily G. Cohen acquired title to and possession of the land. On May 25, 1899 (after Cohen had acquired title and possession of said land), Dunham joined with others in the execution of a deed whereby they conveyed said pipe line, with certain water rights and water-bearing land, to plaintiff. This deed was recorded May 31, 1899. Plaintiff and his predecessors in interest had for more than six years prior to the acts complained of maintained said pipe line across said lands of appellant Emily G. Cohen, and had been in the continuous, open, visible, and exclusive use and possession of said pipe line during all of said time under and by virtue of said grants from May I. Gould and said Dunham and others, and during all of said time had openly, visibly, notoriously, and continuously conducted waters over the said lands of said

Cohen through said pipe line without interruption in the use of said pipe line so granted to him and his predecessors by the aforesaid grants. It appears that since November 22, 1899, appellant Emily G. Cohen has been continuously engaged in litigation with plaintiff and others over the question of ownership of the waters carried through said pipe line by plaintiff and the right to the use thereof, in which litigation said defendant Emily G. Cohen has denied plaintiff's right to use or carry away any of said waters by means of said pipe line or otherwise. When said Cohen acquired title to said lands and took possession thereof on February 20, 1899, appellant learned that respondent was using said pipe line and operating the same over her land, but she had not learned that plaintiff claimed to have constructed said pipe line over said lands under and by virtue of the unrecorded deed from May I. Gould. On November 22, 1899, Emily G. Cohen commenced an action against the plaintiff, who, on February 6, 1900, in an amended answer filed therein, alleged that they (plaintiff herein and others) "admit that they conducted by means of pipes the waters of said springs and the said developed waters across certain lands described in the complaint, but allege that the same was under grant of right of way from May I. Gould of date April 30, 1898, to Edward Dunham, and under grant from William Hefferman to Edward Dunham, conveying said land to said Edward Dunham, of date April, 1898, and at date of said deeds May I. Gould was in possession of said land claiming the same, and said William Hefferman held the record legal title thereto." Hefferman held a sheriff's deed to said lands under a sale made upon execution issued upon a judgment rendered against said Gould. During all of the times in question plaintiff and his predecessors in interest maintained and operated said pipe line over and across said lands, and conducted water through the same with the knowledge of the appellant Emily G. Cohen, and without any objection or interference therewith from her, except as hereinafter stated, and without rendering any compensation for the use of said pipe line; but he never at any time informed her in words that he claimed a legal right so to do. On April 15, 1905, asserting her right so to do, defendant Emily G. Cohen broke and cut said pipe line, thereby preventing the use of the same by plaintiff, who immediately entered upon said lands along the line of said pipe line, and, after making the repairs necessary to restore it to a condition of usefulness, instituted this action, alleging in his complaint that defendants threatened to and would, unless restrained by an order of court, again destroy the pipe line and render it impossible to conduct the water through the same, all of which was admitted.

While freely admitting plaintiff's possession and use of the pipe line for a period of more than five years, and that such use and occupation was open, notorious, continuous, and uninterrupted, and with the knowledge and acquiescence of appellant Emily G. Cohen, it is nevertheless contended that these facts are insufficient to establish a prescriptive right in plaintiff, for the reason that it is not shown that such use and possession was under a claim of right, and hence the possession is lacking in one of the essential elements necessary to constitute an adverse holding, without which possession could not ripen into a prescriptive right. It is also insisted that as the sale under the deed of trust canceled all rights acquired by Dunham by virtue of the unrecorded deed from May I. Gould, such deed could not constitute color of title, and plaintiff's possession was therefore that of a tenant at will of appellant Emily G. Cohen. In Thomas v. England, 71 Cal. 460, 12 Pac. 493, it is said: "To perfect an easement by occupancy for five years, the enjoyment must be adverse, continuous, open, peaceable. It must be adverse, and under claim of a legal right so to do, and not by the consent, permission, or indulgence merely of the owner of the alleged servient estate." Adverse use is inconsistent with a license or permissive use. The occupation in order to constitute an adverse user must be based upon a claim of right. This claim may be made by acts alone quite as effectively as by the use of words either oral or written. Barnes v. Light, 116 N. Y. 34, 22 N. E. 441. Possession and user as owners are accustomed to hold and use such property without recognition of title in another, or disavowal of title in himself, will, if unexplained, raise a presumption of title in the occupant, and in the absence of evidence in rebuttal will establish the fact of a claim of title. La Frombois v. Smith, 8 Cow. 589, 18 Am. Dec. 463. "If there has been the use of an easement for 20 years unexplained, it will be presumed to be under a claim of right and adverse, and be sufficient to establish a title by prescription, and to authorize the presumption of a grant, unless contradicted or explained." Washburn on Easements and Servitudes, p. 156. In Cox v. Forrest, 60 Md. 74, it is said: "Where one, however, has used a right of way for 20 years unexplained, it is but fair to presume the user is under a claim of right, unless it appears to have been by permission."

Under the admitted facts, it devolves upon appellant to show that the user was by permission, or otherwise explain it. The only contention upon this point urged by appellant is that, respondent having entered under the deed from May I. Gould, executed subsequently to the deed of trust, under which appellant Emily G. Cohen acquired title, became a tenant of said Cohen by sufferance in subordination to the title of appellant, which relation would continue until a disavowal on his part, with notice of such disavowal brought home to appellant. In support of this position counsel cites, among other cases, Graydon v. Hurd, 55 Fed. 724, 5 C. C. A. 258. This was a sale under a decree foreclosing a mortgage, and the decree directed that persons in possession of the land should deliver possession to the purchaser "on production of the deed to the premises and a certified copy of the order confirming the report of such sale after such order has become absolute." The court held that this order was a recognition of the relation of landlord and tenant by sufferance between the purchaser and occupant of the land. In its opinion the court says: "There is some conflict in the decisions of the state courts upon the question," thus apparently recognizing the fact that the Supreme Court of this state has held contrary to the rule there laid down. In McDermott v. Burke, 16 Cal. 580, the Supreme Court, in considering the questions says: "The relation between the purchaser and tenant is that of owner and trespasser until some agreement, express or implied, is made between them with reference to the occupation." No such agreement was ever made. Plaintiff never acknowledged any one as lessor, nor recognized the title of any one as being paramount to his own. He did not enter or occupy the land by virtue of any license or permissive right, but entered, as alleged in the answer filed on February 6, 1900, in the action brought by Emily G. Cohen against the La Canada Land & Water Company, under a grant of right of way from Gould and Heferman, the latter alleged to be the holder of the legal title to the right so granted. That the legal title was vested in the trustee and the deed in fact conveyed no title is immaterial. It nevertheless constituted color of title (Wilson v. Atkinson, 77 Cal. 485, 20 Pac. 66, 11 Am. St. Rep. 299; Packard v. Moss, 68 Cal. 123, 8 Pac. 818; Cameron v. United States, 148 U. S. 308, 13 Sup. Ct. 595, 37 L. Ed. 459; Wood on Limitation of Actions, § 259); and whether sufficient or not, this allegation in the answer gave Emily G. Cohen notice (if notice were necessary) that plaintiff's occupancy was under a claim of right, and, under the provisions of section 322 of the Code of Civil Procedure, possession must be deemed to be held adversely.

The deed is of no consequence so far as defining the extent of the right; its only function being to furnish a basis for the claim, the extent of which is measured by actual occupation and use. "Where location and duration of a way are not defined, they may be fixed by use and acts of acquiescence." Washburn on Easements, § 239. The facts clearly show that the general attitude of the parties was from the first one of hostility towards each other, and that from November 22, 1899, they were continuously engaged in litigation. "The relations of the parties, their conduct, the situation of the property, and all the surrounding circumstances" (Clarke v. Clarke, 133 Cal. 667, 66 Pac. 10), evidence the fact that the use was under a claim of right, rather than by reason of a mere matter of neighborly accommodation.

We attach no weight to appellants' contention that the condemnation suit brought by plaintiff should constitute an estoppel against his plea of a prescriptive right. It clearly appears that the purpose sought was not to acquire by condemnation the right then in use, but a right of way for a pipe line of increased capacity, as well as certain tunnel rights.

The judgment is affirmed.

NELSON v. NELSON. (Civ. 448.)

(Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Nov. 25, 1907. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 23, 1908.)

1. DIVORCE—DISPOSITION OF PROPERTY—COMMUNITY PROPERTY UNDER STATUTE.

Under Civ. Code, § 146, subd. 1, providing that upon granting a divorce for extreme cruelty the court may assign the community property to the parties in such proportions as it may deem just, plaintiff, on obtaining a divorce for extreme cruelty, cannot, because of that fact alone, claim as a matter of right more than half as the community property, the apportionment resting in the discretion of the trial court.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 17, Divorce, §§ 714, 715.]

2. SAME—REVISION ON APPEAL—QUESTIONS PRESENTED BY RECORD.

Under Civ. Code, § 148, permitting revision of the trial court's disposition of community property in all cases, its award will not be disturbed where the facts and conditions upon which it was based do not appear from the record.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 17, Divorce, § 768.]

3. SAME—PRESUMPTIONS—SALE OF COMMUNITY PROPERTY—NECESSITY.

Where property is ordered sold and the proceeds divided under Civ. Code, § 147, permitting the court, whenever necessary, to order the community property sold upon divorce and the proceeds divided between the parties, it will be presumed, nothing appearing to the contrary in the record, that the court upon sufficient facts deemed the sale necessary.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; D. K. Trask, Judge.

Action for divorce by Emma Nelson against Carl I. Nelson. From that part of the judgment disposing of the community property, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Paul E. Ussher and H. A. Massey, for appellant. Munson & Barclay, for respondent.

SHAW, J. Action for divorce upon the ground of extreme cruelty. The divorce was granted plaintiff upon the ground prayed for, and the community property, consisting of a lot and residence valued at $2,500, besides household furniture, was awarded in equal shares to the parties. The court adjudged that the real estate be at once sold for the sum of $2,500 cash, and ordered a commission issued to one Lacey to sell the same for said sum and divide the proceeds between the parties. Findings were waived. Plaintiff appeals on the judgment roll from that part of the decree awarding her one-half of the community property, and also from that part of the said decree ordering the real estate to be sold for $2,500 cash.

1. Appellant insists that, under the provisions of section 146 of the Civil Code, she was entitled to more than one-half of the community property. Subdivision 1 of said section provides: "If the decree be rendered on the ground of adultery, or extreme cruelty, the community property shall be assigned to the respective parties in such proportions as the court, from all the facts of the case, and the condition of the parties, may deem just." Section 148 of the Civil Code provides that the disposition of the community property and the discretion of the trial court in respect thereto are subject to revision on appeal.

Appellant's contention is that in all cases a party granted a divorce upon the ground of extreme cruelty is, by virtue of that fact alone, entitled to an award of more than one-half of the community property. We do not so interpret subdivision 1 of section 146 of the Civil Code. A wise exercise of discretion in considering all the facts of the case and condition of the parties may justify an equal division of the community property. When such an award is made, this court, in the absence of anything in the record disclosing the facts of the case and conditions upon which the court based such award, should not interfere with an order making such division. "Where the evidence is not in the record, and this court has not all the facts of the case and the condition of the parties before it, and cannot say that the division was not just, the action of the superior court in dividing the property will not be disturbed upon appeal." Gorman v. Gorman, 134 Cal. 378, 66 Pac. 313.

2. Section 147, Civ. Code, provides that, whenever necessary, in disposing of the community property, the court "may order a partition or sale of the property and a division or other disposition of the proceeds." Reid v. Reid, 112 Cal. 274, 44 Pac. 584. We must presume, in the absence of anything to the contrary in the record, that the court upon sufficient facts before it deemed it necessary, in making a division of the community property, to order it sold and the proceeds divided. Judgment affirmed.

1. ASSIGNMENTS—ORDER.

An instrument by which the drawees were directed to pay plaintiff $220 from the proceeds of a lot of hay in the course of shipment by the drawer to the drawees was a mere order and not an equitable assignment of the fund, and was therefore revocable by the drawer before acceptance.

3. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE—JURISDICTION—PRESUMPTION.

The law presumes nothing in favor of the jurisdiction of a justice of the peace, a party asserting such jurisdiction being required to show affirmatively every fact necessary to create it.

5. BILLS AND NOTES—ORDERS—"DURESS."

Civ. Appeal from Superior Court, Solano County; L. G. Harrier, Judge.

Action by Paul C. Harlan against Gladding, McBean & Co. and another. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Paul C. Harlan, for appellant. T. T. Gregory, for respondents.

BURNETT, J. The nature of the action is shown by the following allegation of the complaint: "On January 6, 1904, * * * defendant herein, Jacob Kunzler, for a valuable consideration, duly assigned, by means of a written assignment and order to plaintiff herein, the claim of said defendant Jacob Kunzler against said defendant Gladding, McBean & Co. (a corporation) for $220 of the sum to be thereafter paid by said defendant Gladding, McBean & Co. to said defendant Jacob Kunzler for a certain lot of tule hay on said January 6, 1904, in course of shipment by said defendant Jacob Kunzler to said defendant Gladding, McBean & Co.; that said written assignment and order was, upon said January 6, 1904, and at and in the said county of Solano; executed and delivered to plaintiff herein by said defendant Jacob Kunzler; and that said written assignment and order was and is in the words and figures following, to wit: 'Suisun, Cal., Jan. 6, 1904. To Gladding, McBean & Co.: You are hereby directed to pay to Paul C. Harlan, Esq., two hundred and twenty dollars from the proceeds of the lot of tule hay now in course of shipment to your firm from this place. [Signed] Jacob Kunzler.' Judgment was for defendants, from which plaintiff brings the appeal on a bill of exceptions.

The court finds that the instrument in writing set out in the complaint was "made, executed, and delivered by said defendant Kunzler to plaintiff; that thereafter the plaintiff presented said instrument to said Gladding, McBean & Co. and demanded payment thereof; that prior thereto said Kunzler notified, directed, and ordered said Gladding, McBean & Co. not to pay said plaintiff anything upon said written instrument, if the same were presented, and that he had revoked it; that thereupon said Gladding, McBean & Co. refused to pay to plaintiff any money upon said order; that at the time of such presentment of said order said Gladding, McBean & Co. had in its possession to the credit of said Kunzler as the proceeds and price of said lot of tule hay more than sufficient money to pay said order; that there is another action pending between plaintiff's assignee and the defendants involving the same cause of action; and that said order was made "under duress, and is without consideration, void, and of no effect." All the adverse findings are challenged by appellant as not supported by the evidence.

There is also a controversy between the parties as to the effect of the said written instrument; the appellant contending that it amounted to an equitable assignment to him pro tanto of the fund in the hands of the corporation due Kunzler, while respondents maintain that it was a mere order revocable by the drawer before acceptance by the drawee, and resulting in an equitable assignment only in case of said acceptance. It will be observed that there is nothing in the form of the instrument to indicate an assignment. It is simply an order upon Gladding, McBean & Co., given to plaintiff by Kunzler for the payment of a part of the fund in the hands of said company belonging to said Kunzler. There is nothing in the evidence to indicate that the instrument was intended as other than what its language imports. There seems no difference in principle between an order like this and the case of a check or bill of exchange. In Pullen v. Placer County Bank, 138 Cal. 172, 66 Pac. 740, 71 Pac. 84, in reference to checks, it is said: "A check is only a direction to the bank to pay a certain sum of money to the person therein named. The money does not thereby become the property of the payee, nor is it placed beyond the control of the depositor. Until it is presented to the bank, the drawer may countermand its payment, or he may direct a different disposition of the moneys to his credit." In Donohoe-Kelly Banking Co. v. S. P. Co., 138 Cal. 190, 71 Pac. 96, 94 Am. St. Rep. 28, it is said: "Turning to the view of the question presented by appellants, we find the cases quite numerous holding that an order, check, or bill of exchange, drawn for a part of a fund, does not operate as an assignment of that part, or give a lien as against the drawee, unless he consent to the appropriation by an acceptance of the draft." In the last-cited opinion a large number of cases is reviewed, among them Harrison v. Wright, 100 Ind. 515, 58 Am. Rep. 805, wherein it is declared: "In the absence of evidence to the contrary, or of a showing of an intention to assign a part of a fund in the hands of a drawee, * * * It should be presumed that the payee or holder of a check takes it upon the credit of the drawer, of whom he may collect if payment be refused by the drawee."

Here the evidence shows without conflict that Kunzler notified Gladding, McBean & Co. that he had revoked said order, and said company thereupon refused and declined to accept it and notified plaintiff of the revocation. Under such circumstances an action upon said order would not lie against either of the defendants.

Again, assuming that the instrument in question constituted an assignment, the court found that it "was made under duress." In this connection respondents contend that the action of the plaintiff in securing the order constitutes "coercion of the most pronounced degree." To understand respondents' position it will be necessary to bear in mind that the justice of the peace in Suisun township, A. F. Hitchcock, was ill, and he requested plaintiff to get Justice Klahn of Green Valley township, in the same county, to sit for him in the case. Plaintiff accordingly secured Justice Klahn, and after the proper preliminary proceedings were taken he issued the writ of attachment, which was levied upon Kunzler's hay. Section 103 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides a certain course to be taken to give authority or jurisdiction to a justice of the peace to try a cause in another township. There must be a written request of the other justice, "and while so acting he shall be vested with all the powers of the justice for whom he so holds court." No such course was pursued in this case, and hence it must be held that Justice Klahn was without jurisdiction. It is well settled that the law presumes nothing in favor of the jurisdiction of justices' courts, and a party who asserts a right under the judgment of a justice must affirmatively show every fact necessary to confer such jurisdiction. Swain v. Chase, 12 Cal. 283; Jolley v. Foltz, 34 Cal. 321; Kane v. Desmond, 63 Cal. 464; Eltzroth v. Ryan, 89 Cal. 140, 26 Pac. 647. As one of the steps necessary to confer jurisdiction upon Justice Klahn was lacking, the property of Kunzler was illegally detained by virtue of the writ of attachment. Section 1567 of the Civil Code provides that "an apparent consent is not real or free when obtained through (1) duress," and section 1569 provides that "duress consists in . . . (2) unlawful detention of the property of any such person."

In Brumagim v. Tillinghast, 18 Cal. 271, 79 Am. Dec. 176, it is said by the court, through Chief Justice Field: "What shall constitute the compulsion or coercion which the law will recognize as sufficient to render payments involuntary may often be a question of difficulty. It may be said in general that there must be some actual or threatened exercise of power possessed, or supposed to be possessed, by the party exacting or receiving the payment over the person or property of the party making the payment, from which the latter has no other means of immediate relief than by advancing the money."

Quotation is made with approval from Forbes v. Appleton, 5 Cush. (Mass.) 117, wherein it is said: "In general, the cases that have been treated as exceptions are cases where the possession of the property upon which the lien was claimed was already in the party demanding the money, or cases in which the party had no other means to save himself from imprisonment or his property from sale on execution or warrant of distress but by paying the money demanded."

Among other cases is also Mays v. Cincinnati, 1 Ohio St. 268, wherein it is stated that: "This unbroken chain of authority seems to warrant the conclusion that a payment of money upon an illegal or unjust demand, when the party is advised of all the facts, can only be considered involuntary when it is made to procure the release of the person or property of the party from detention, or when the other party is armed with apparent authority to seize upon either, and the payment is made to prevent it."

Duress means a condition of mind produced by improper external pressure or influence that practically destroys the free agency of the party and causes him to do an act or make a contract not of his own volition, but under such wrongful external pressure, and it is to be determined by all the attendant facts and circumstances. Pride v. Baker (Tenn. Ch. App.) 64 S. W. 329; Collins v. Westbury, 2 Bay (S. C.) 211, 1 Am. Dec. 643. Duress of goods may exist when one is compelled to submit to an illegal exaction in order to obtain them from one who has them but refuses to surrender them unless the exaction is endured. Fuller v. Roberts, 35 Fla. 110, 17 South. 359; Loneragan v. Buford, 148 U. S. 581, 13 Sup. Ct. 684, 37 L. Ed. 569.

In the case at bar plaintiff testified: "I think I may have stated to him, 'If you give me the order for this amount, I will let the hay go.' He wanted his hay. It was then being moved from the vessel over to the train. . . . I don't remember exactly how it happened; but the understanding was that as soon as he had entered into that agreement, and we had accepted that order, we were to release that hay, because that was the only object he had in giving the order." The foregoing would seem to establish the conclusion that the detention of the hay by plaintiff was unlawful; that its release was the moving influence, the external pressure that induced Kunzler to execute the order or assignment; and that his act was therefore, in contemplation of our statute, involuntary, and was lacking in the element of consent which is required for a valid agreement. However, it does not follow that the contract was void, as section 1566 of the Civil Code provides that "a consent which is not free is nevertheless not absolutely void, but may be rescinded by the parties in the manner prescribed by the chapter on rescission."

Kunzler rescinded promptly by notifying Gladding, McBean & Co. and also plaintiff through said firm of his revocation of said instrument, and as there was nothing for him to restore he seems to have done all that is required by the statute to constitute rescission.

The finding as to revocation is not as explicit as it should be, but in view of the evidence it could not be in favor of appellant. It is at least doubtful whether the court had any jurisdiction of the cause, but at any rate the judgment for the reasons stated is correct.

The judgment is affirmed.

(Court of Appeal, Third District, California.
Nov. 16, 1907. On Rehearing, Dec. 16, 1907.
Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan.

1. ADVERSE POSSESSION—HOSTILE CHARACTER OF POSSESSION—PERMISSIVE USE.

By "permissive" use is meant a license exercised in subordination to another's claim and ownership.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 1, Adverse Possession, § 283.]

2. APPEAL—QUESTIONS OF FACT—FINDINGS OF COURT—CONCLUSIVENESS.

Whether the use of an easement of a right of way was under a claim of right or in subordination to and recognition of another's title is a question of fact for the trial court, and its finding is binding on review if it finds any substantial basis in the evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, §§ 3979-3982.]

3. EASEMENTS—PRESCRIPTION—PRESUMPTION OF GRANT.

A grant of an easement will be presumed on proof of use and enjoyment for a time corresponding with the period of limitation for quieting title.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 17, Easements, § 89.]

4. SAME—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

The presumption of a grant of an easement on proof of use and enjoyment for a time corresponding with the period of limitation for quieting title is itself evidence sufficient to support the finding that the use was under a claim of right.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 17, Easements, §§ 89, 93.]

5. SAME—ESTOPPEL.

That defendant, as president of a corporation, recognized in leases and a mortgage executed on behalf of the corporation that it owned an easement of a right of way for a spur track as appurtenant to its plant, and that he had a map made of the corporation's property, and added the spur track because it did not appear on the official map, and caused blue prints to be made and circulated for the purpose of securing purchasers for the property at a sale thereof, while probably insufficient to create an estoppel to deny that the corporation owned the easement, is a potential circumstance in the determination of the character of the use of the easement.

6. EVIDENCE—WEIGHT OF TESTIMONY—HOSTILE WITNESS.

Where a witness, from his interest in the outcome of the suit, is naturally hostile, his testimony may be viewed in the light most favorable to the adverse party.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 20, Evidence, § 2439.]

7. EASEMENTS—CREATION—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

In an action to restrain interference with the use of an easement, the evidence of defendant himself held to support a finding that the use of the easement was adverse and under a claim of right.

Appeal from Superior Court, Contra Costa County; W. S. Wells, Judge.

Action by A. Alper and others against Patrick Tormey and others. From a judgment for plaintiffs, and an order denying a new trial, Patrick Tormey appeals. Affirmed.

R. H. Latimer and L. F. Tormey, for appellant. Heller & Powers and L. H. Brownstone, for respondents.

BURNETT, J. This action was brought to restrain defendants from interfering with plaintiffs' use and enjoyment of certain railroad spur tracks. These spur tracks were connected with and constituted an important part of a large meat-packing plant owned and operated by the Union Stockyard Company, situated at Rodeo, Contra Costa county. Two tracks were built, both running—one easterly and the other westerly—from the buildings of the stockyard company to the main lines of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company. The east track, the only one in controversy here, was constructed some time prior to the other. The land upon which said buildings were located was originally bought by one Wheeler, and there is evidence justifying the inference that Tormey sold to him the right of way for the east spur track. Subsequently Wheeler conveyed all his rights to the said Union Stockyard Company, which was incorporated in 1890, and of the corporation Tormey became president. As such president, on behalf of said corporation, he executed leases and a mortgage of the corporation's property, including "all the buildings * * * and appurtenances now erected or in the process of erection upon said blocks, * * * and all and every railroad tracks and railroad superstructures which have heretofore and may hereafter be built by the party of the first part, leading from the line of the track of the Northern Railway Company now operated by the Southern Pacific Company, and used and intended to be used, in connection with the improvements and machinery in said blocks, or any or either of them." In the year 1895 the corporation was adjudged an insolvent. Tormey, who was the largest creditor, was naturally interested in getting as much as possible for the property, and for that purpose he had a map made of it, and he added the east spur track, because it did not appear on the official map. He caused blue prints of this map to be made and circulated for the purpose of securing purchasers for the property. Judgment was rendered for plaintiffs against the defendants. The defendant Tormey appealed from said judgment, and from the order denying his motion for a new trial.

It is not disputed that plaintiffs acquired whatever rights the said corporation had in and to the said east spur track. The main controversy, however, is as to the sufficiency of the evidence to support the finding "that said defendant Tormey granted to said Union Stockyard Company, plaintiffs' predecessor in title, before or at the time said spur tracks were constructed, the right of way over the said property owned by him on which said spur tracks are now situated for said spur tracks and for the uninterrupted use of the same, and plaintiffs and their predecessors in title have been in the continuous, open, and peaceable possession of said right of way and said spur tracks for more than nine years last past, and said possession has been under a claim of title and adverse to these defendants and to all the world, and defendants have had knowledge thereof." It will not be controverted that if the evidence shows a title by prescription this is sufficient to uphold the judgment regardless of whether a grant was actually proved. The elements of title by prescription are so familiar as not to require restatement. We simply refer to a few of the many cases where the subject is discussed. Barbour v. Pierce, 42 Cal. 662; Unger v. Mooney, 63 Cal. 586, 49 Am. Rep. 100; Alta Land Co. v. Hancock, 85 Cal. 226, 24 Pac. 645, 20 Am. St. Rep. 217; Franz v. Mendonca, 131 Cal. 205, 63 Pac. 361; Clarke v. Clarke, 133 Cal. 667, 66 Pac. 10; Franz v. Mendonca, 146 Cal. 640, 80 Pac. 1078; also Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, vol. 22, p. 1183, and notes. There is no question here that the use of the easement was open, notorious, peaceable, continuous for the statutory period, and with the knowledge and acquiescence of the defendants.

There is only one proposition concerning which there can be any difference of opinion, and that is whether said use was under a claim of right, or in subordination to and recognition of Tormey's title. Appellant claims that the evidence shows that the use was only "permissive" and not "adverse." There is some confusion in many of the cases in the use of the term "permissive," as an adverse possession in a sense must be by permission or acquiescence of the one against whom it is invoked. But, imputing to the term the meaning clearly intended of a license exercised in subordination to appellant's claim and ownership, still it is a question of fact to be determined by the trial court, and under the well-established rule its determination against appellant's contention is binding upon us, if it finds any substantial basis in the evidence. Appellant insists that the burden is upon plaintiffs to prove the easement citing American Co. v. Bradford, 27 Cal. 361; De Frieze v. Quint, 94 Cal. 663, 30 Pac. 1, 28 Am. St. Rep. 151; Ball v. Kehl, 95 Cal. 613, 30 Pac. 780; San Francisco & S. J. V. Ry. Co. v. Leviston, 134 Cal. 412, 66 Pac. 473. But he seems to lose sight of the fact that it is not a question here of who has the burden of proof, or whether the issue has been established by a preponderance of the evidence, but that the only consideration concerning us is whether there is any evidence to support the finding of the trial court.

In reviewing the action of the lower court the following obvious reflections must be taken into account: A grant of an easement will be presumed on proof of use and enjoyment for a time corresponding with the local period of limitation for quieting titles to land. Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, supra. This, of course, is equivalent to the presumption that the use was under a claim of right, as the grantee holds adversely to the grantor, and not in subordination to the latter's title. This presumption is itself evidence which is sufficient to support the finding. Again, the conduct of appellant is consistent only with the position that it was understood that the corporation owned the easement as appurtenant to its manufacturing plant. Appellant so recognized it in the execution of the instruments to which we have referred, and in the blue prints which he made and circulated. This is probably insufficient to create an estoppel, but it is a potential circumstance in the determination of the character of the use of the easement. Even if appellant had testified positively that there was no such grant, and that the use was only "permissive" and not under a claim of right, we cannot say that the trial court would have been bound to so find in opposition to the adverse inferences suggested by his conduct and the said presumption. Again, plaintiffs, to establish their case, relied largely, as far as the testimony of witnesses is concerned, upon that of appellant himself. The court had a right to consider the fact that from his interest in the outcome he was naturally a hostile witness, and there is justification for viewing his testimony in the light most favorable to respondents' contention. In that testimony we think there is positive support for the conclusion that the use of the easement was adverse and under a claim of right. Appellant, among other things, testified: "It was always understood by everybody that those tracks were to be used in conjunction with the slaughter house. The tracks were put down for the use of the packing houses. There wasn't any question about the spur tracks being used for the benefit of the packing houses, except a part of the spur tracks were on my land, and it was understood that the Union Stockyard Company should buy a piece of land from me and have it surveyed, and they never paid me for it, and I never gave them a deed. * * * I never heard any question as to the title of the stockyard company to any of the property that they had. It was always assessed to them. * * * The stockyard company never had any trouble with anybody about the tracks. Whenever they wanted to use it they used it without anybody's objecting. * * * I never made any opposition to them building the switch, because they asked my consent about it, and I gave them my consent. * * * I didn't inform anybody that I claimed the land east of the town free from any easement. The time I tore up the tracks and made a demand for the box shucks was the first time I ever claimed to have the right to forbid anybody using the spur tracks. That was in July, 1901. * * * Mr. Wheeler bought 700 acres down towards the powder works. He said, 'I want to buy 800 or 900 acres from you.' I said, 'Mr. Wheeler, you come down on the ground, and whatever you take off the front you take right back to the county road parallel to that line of fence and lay this track down, and, of course, this tract outside of this land was sold,' and Mr. Wheeler said then, 'When we get this thing fixed up we will pay you for that.'"

It would seem to be a fair inference from the foregoing that it was the intention of the parties that at the time of said conversation the title should pass from appellant to Wheeler. It was an attempt to sell, and not simply an agreement to sell in the future. The subsequent conduct of the parties shows that they considered the transaction a sale, at least to the extent of the easement, and even of the small strip of land over which the spur track was laid. It does not affect the case that the price was not paid. It is unfortunate that the corporation became involved, and presumably was not able to pay its debts in full; but this does not change the rule that "a parol gift or grant of the right of way or easement followed by possession, use, and enjoyment of it, with the knowledge of the grantor or donor for over five years, invests the grantee or donee with an absolute title to the right of way or easement." Ashley v. Ashley, 4 Gray, 197; Sumner v. Stevens, 6 Metc. 337; Arbuckle v. Ward, 29 Vt. 43. Of course, it is technically inaccurate under our practice to characterize the agreement of sale as a "parol grant"; but the transaction furnished Wheeler a "color of title," and afforded convincing evidence that his possession of the easement was begun and continued under claim of right.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

We concur: CHIPMAN, P. J.; HART, J.

On Petition for Rehearing.

BURNETT, J. After a careful examination of appellants' petition herein for a rehearing of the cause before this court, we see no reason for a modification of the views expressed in the main opinion rendered in said cause.

A rehearing is therefore denied.

NASH et al. v. McNAMARA et al. (No. 1,731.)
(Supreme Court of Nevada. Jan. 23, 1908.)

1. COURTS—DECISIONS OF FEDERAL COURTS AS AUTHORITY.

It is the special prerogative of the federal Supreme Court to finally construe federal statutes.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 13, Courts, § 332.]

2. MINES AND MINERALS — LOCATION OF CLAIMS—ABANDONMENT.

Under Comp. Laws, § 208, and section 209 as amended by St. 1901, p. 97, c. 93, § 2, authorizing a discoverer to locate a mining claim and requiring the sinking of a discovery shaft on a claim before the expiration of 90 days from the posting of notice of location, and Rev. St. U. S. §§ 2319, 2322, 2324 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, pp. 1424-1426], providing that locators of mining claims complying with the laws shall have the exclusive right of possession and enjoyment of all the surface included within their lines of location, and of all veins, etc., and that the location must be distinctly marked on the ground, so that its boundaries can be readily traced, and that until a patent has been issued not less than a specified amount of work shall be performed during each year, or the claim shall be open to relocation, etc., a junior location made on ground covered by a valid existing senior location will not prevail over a relocation on the same ground, made after a failure to do the work on the senior location, notwithstanding Rev. St. U. S. § 2326 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1430], under which a claimant, by failure to assert his rights acquired, may lose them.

3. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW — STATUTES—VALIDITY.

Though it is the duty of courts to construe laws, they should be careful not to encroach on the legislative department, or set aside statutes, federal or state, except where they are clearly in conflict with the Constitution.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 10, Constitutional Law, §§ 36, 46.]

4. MINES AND MINERALS — LOCATION OF CLAIMS.

Where mining claims were located on a designated date, by posting the requisite notice and by the proper marking of their boundaries within 90 days thereafter, the right to the ground covered by them related back to the time of the posting of the notice and segregated the land from the public domain, so that a subsequent location was invalid until after there had been a failure to do the work required by the statutes to be done within 90 days from the posting of the notice; but where the notices were posted, and the claims were not staked within 90 days thereafter, the locations were not completed, and they were not segregated from the public domain, though such posting carried the right to define the boundaries within 90 days.

5. SAME.

Where a senior location of mining claims was not a valid and existing location at the time of a junior location, the junior locator became entitled to hold the claims for 90 days, and by instituting his suit to recover the claims before the expiration of the 90 days he could recover judgment for possession and damages to the end of that period, and if he should fail to do the required work within 90 days the claims would become subject to relocation by others.

6. WITNESSES — CROSS-EXAMINATION — LIMIT OF RIGHT.

The rule that the cross-examination of witnesses is limited to the matters brought out on direct examination does not prevent the cross-examining party from making the witnesses his own after the adverse party has closed his case in chief, and does not prevent the court from allowing, in its discretion, a rigid examination of the witnesses where they are hostile.

Appeal from District Court, Nye County.

Action by A. D. Nash and others against Dan McNamara and others. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Reversed, and remanded for new trial.

L. A. Gibbons and Wm. Forman, for appellants. Key Pettman, Campbell, Metson & Brown, and Geo. A. Bartlett, for respondents.

TALBOT, C. J. The respondents, who were plaintiffs in the district court, brought this action to recover certain claims called the "Unions," with designated numbers, situated in the Manhattan mining district, and which had been located on the 24th and 25th days of July, 1905. It was also stated in the complaint that the defendants were breaking down and removing large quantities of ore from the premises, and the prayer was for the recovery of possession, for an injunction, and for $10,000 damages. The defendants, who are the appellants here, set up ownership and possession of the ground in themselves under the Liberty and Justice mining claims, located September 29, 1905. The contending parties alleged that the respective locations on which they relied had been made on the unappropriated mineral lands of the United States. This allegation in the complaint was denied by the answer. Upon the trial, after evidence had been introduced regarding the location of these claims, the defendants offered to prove that on July 1, 1905, 24 days prior to the location of the Unions and 91 days before the location of the Liberty and Justice, three men, Kopenhaver, Meissner, and Lawson, had made valid locations on the unappropriated mineral lands of the United States of claims called the "Portlandes," and numbered, and which covered the ground in dispute, and that these were valid, existing claims at the time the Unions, upon which respondents rely, were located. After argument and consideration the learned district judge sustained an objection to this offer, and, although he did not allow the defendants to prove that at the time the Union claims were located the ground was covered by prior and existing valid locations, he made a finding that the Unions were located upon the unappropriated public domain of the United States and entered judgment in favor of respondents. Of the 42 specifications of error, a number relate directly or indirectly to the rejection of this offer and to the making of this finding, and the controlling question involved is whether a junior location made upon ground covered by a valid existing senior location will prevail over one made after a failure to do the required work on the senior location, when the statute of limitations has not run in favor of either.

Upon the trial, and also upon the hearing in this court, respondents relied upon the case of Lavagnino v. Uhlig, 198 U. S. 443, 25 Sup. Ct. 716, 49 L. Ed. 1119, contending that the facts there are similar to those in the present case, and that the law applicable to them has been settled by the latest expression of the highest tribunal. It is admitted by counsel for appellants that the language in the decision in that case is in conflict with Belk v. Meagher, 104 U. S. 279, 26 L. Ed. 735, and other decisions of that and other courts favorable to appellants; but it is claimed that it is overruled by a later decision of that court in Brown v. Gurney, 201 U. S. 184, 26 Sup. Ct. 509, 50 L. Ed. 717. Recognizing that it is the special prerogative of the Supreme Court of the United States to finally construe federal statutes, and that its opinions relating to other matters are entitled to special consideration as coming from the highest and ablest tribunal, it becomes important to examine and analyze the conflicting decisions of that court bearing on the issue before us, and to determine which are most in consonance with reason, justice, legal principles, and the statutes relating to the location of mining claims.

Congress, in the proper exercise of its control over the public domain, by Act May 10, 1872, c. 152, § 2 (section 2319 of the Revised Statutes [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1424]), provided "that all valuable mineral deposits in lands belonging to the United States are free and open to exploration, occupation and purchase by citizens and those who have declared their intention to become such, under regulations prescribed by law." Section 2322 [page 1425] provides that "the locators of all mining claims, so long as they comply with the laws of the United States and with state and local regulations not in conflict with the laws of the United States governing their possessory title, shall have the exclusive right and enjoyment of all the surface included within their lines of location and of all veins, lodes and ledges throughout their entire depth, the top or apex of which lies inside of such surface lines extended downward vertically" within planes drawn through parallel end lines. Section 2324 [page 1426] provides that "the location must be distinctly marked on the ground so that its boundaries can be readily traced; * * * that on each claim located after the 10th day of May, 1872, and until a patent has been issued therefor, not less than one hundred dollars worth of work shall be performed or improvements made during each year; * * * and upon a failure to comply with these conditions the claim or mine upon which such failure occurred shall be open to relocation in the same manner as if no location had ever been made: Provided that the original locators, their heirs, assigns, or legal representatives have not resumed work upon the claim after failure and before such location."

Section 208 of the Compiled Laws of Nevada directs that any person, a citizen of the United States, or one who has declared his intention to become such, who discovers a vein or lode, may locate a claim by defining the boundaries thereof in the manner prescribed and by posting at the point of discovery a notice containing the name of the lode or claim, the name of the locator or locators, the date of the location, the number of linear feet claimed in length along the course of the vein, with the width on each side of the center, and the general course of the vein or lode. Section 209 as amended by St. 1901, p. 97, c. 93, § 2, requires that before the expiration of 90 days from the posting of notice of location the locator shall sink a discovery shaft upon the claim of the depth of at least 10 feet or its equivalent.

It is the contention of the appellants that the Portland locations, if made on the 1st day of July, as they offered to prove, withdrew the land from location for 90 days, during which time the respondents could initiate no rights upon it; that as the 10 feet of work required by the state statute was not done upon these claims within 90 days after they were located, upon the expiration of that period they became, similarly as upon a failure to do the annual work required by the federal statute, subject to relocation by the appellants at the time they made their locations. As the language of the opinion in the Uhlig Case stands opposed, not only to the law as established by Belk v. Meagher and as held by lawyers and miners for a quarter of a century, but to numerous decisions of the court, state and federal, in the mining states, and to others of the Supreme Court of the United States, it will be advantageous to consider the Belk Case as the leading one, representative of numerous others, and compare the two.

The facts in both are similar to the one before the court, in that the contest here is between a claim alleged to have been located upon ground covered by a prior, valid, existing location, and a relocation made upon the same ground after the expiration of the time for doing the required work on the senior claim. In regard to the periods of time between the making of the locations of the contestants, the Belk Case is more like the one before the court than Lavagnino v. Uhlig. In the Belk Case it was conceded by both parties that the original or senior claims lapsed on the 1st day of January, 1877, because of failure to perform the annual work. Belk made the location under which he claimed on the 19th day of December, 1876, and did all that was necessary to perfect his rights, if the premises were open to location at that time. His entry on the property was peaceful. On February 21, 1877, Meagher made his location, doing all that was necessary to perfect his rights, if the premises were then open to location. Here the difference in the respective dates of location of the contending claims is about 70 days, as in the Belk Case. The two Uhligs, evidently at an expense of not less than $1,600 for the annual work, had been located and maintained for 9 years previous to the location of the claims upon which Lavagnino relied. The statute of limitations applicable to such cases in Utah is 7 years. In Nevada it is 5 years for real estate and 2 years for mining claims. Comp. Laws, § 3706. This difference of time, amounting to nearly 9 years, a period longer than the one specified in the statute, and 70 days, is sufficient to distinguish the Uhlig Case from the present one, and also from the Belk Case, which is more nearly in point. State statutes of limitation relating to mining claims are recognized by section 13 of the act of Congress of July 9, 1870. Properly Uhlig was given his claims by the Supreme Court of Utah, and that judgment was affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States; but, should force be given to all the language used in that case by the highest tribunal, it conflicts with the Belk Case and other cases.

The following extracts from the unanimous opinion of the court, written by the Chief Justice, in Belk v. Meagher, are appropriate: "Mining claims are not open to relocation until the rights of a former locator have come to an end. A relocater seeks to avail himself of mineral in the public lands which another has discovered. This he cannot do until the discoverer has in law abandoned his claim and left the property open for another to take up. The right of location upon the mineral lands of the United States is a privilege granted by Congress; but it can only be exercised within the limits prescribed by the grant. A location can only be made where the law allows it to be done. Any attempt to go beyond that will be of no avail. Hence a relocation on lands actually covered at the time by another valid and subsisting location is void; and this, not only against the prior locator, but all the world, because the law allows no such thing to be done. It follows that the relocation of Belk was invalid. * * * The next inquiry is whether the attempted location in December became operative on the 1st of January, so as to give Belk the exclusive right to the possession and enjoyment of the claim after that. We think it did not. The right to possession comes only from a valid location. * * * A location is not made by taking possession alone, but by working on the ground, recording, and doing whatever else is required for that purpose by the acts of Congress and the local laws and regulations. As in this case all these things were done when the law did not allow it, they are as if they had never been done. On the 19th of December the right to the possession of this property was just as much withdrawn from the public domain as the fee is by a valid grant from the United States under the authority of law, or the possession by a valid and subsisting homestead or pre-emption entry. As the United States could not at the time give Belk the right to take possession of the property for the purpose of making his location, because there was an existing outstanding grant of the exclusive right of possession and enjoyment, it would seem necessarily to follow that any tortious entry he might make must be unavailing for the purposes of a valid location of a claim under the act of Congress. A location, to be effectual, must be good at the time it is made. When perfected, it has the effect of a grant by the United States of the right of present and exclusive possession. * * * Here Congress has said in unmistakable language that what has been once located under the law shall not be relocated until the first location has expired."

In the Uhlig Case, which was by a divided court, no intention of overruling any conflicting decision is expressed; but, in referring to certain text-books, it was said: "Statements are found which seemingly indicate that in the opinion of the writers, on the forfeiture of a senior mining location, quoad a junior and conflicting location, the area of conflict becomes in an unqualified sense unoccupied mineral lands of the United States without inuring in any way to the benefit of the junior location. But in the treatises referred to no account is taken of the effect of the express provisions of Rev. St. § 2326 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1430]. Moreover, when the cases to which the text-writers referred as sustaining the statements made are examined, it will be seen that they were decided either before the passage of the adverse claim statutes of 1872, or concerned controversies between the senior and junior locators, or depended upon the provisions of state statutes." As Belk v. Meagher does not come within any of these classes, it may be inferred that by inadvertence the writer of the opinion did not have that case in mind and that the court did not intentionally overrule the principles laid down in that and followed in other cases.

This inference finds further support in the language of that tribunal in Mining Co. v. Tunnel Co., 196 U. S. 342-3, 25 Sup. Ct. 266, 49 L. Ed. 501, submitted at the same term, in Brown v. Gurney, 201 U. S. 191, 26 Sup. Ct. 509, 50 L. Ed. 717, determined a year later, and in Clipper Mining Co. v. Elh Mining Co., 194 U. S. 226, 24 Sup. Ct. 634, 48 L. Ed. 944, decided one year previously, in which the court said: "It will be seen that section 2322, Rev. St. [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1425], gives to the owner of a valid lode location the exclusive right of possession and enjoyment of all the surface included within the lines of the location. That exclusive right of possession forbids any trespass. No one without his consent, or at least his acquiescence, can rightfully enter upon the premises or disturb its surface by sinking shafts or otherwise. It was the judgment of Congress that, in order to secure the fullest working of the mines and the complete development of the mineral property, the owner thereof should have the undisturbed possession of not less than a specified amount of surface. That exclusive right of possession is as much the property of the locator as the vein or lode by him discovered and located. In Belk v. Meagher, 104 U. S. 279, 283, 26 L. Ed. 735, it was said by Chief Justice Waite that 'a mining claim perfected under the law is property in the highest sense of that term'; and in a later case (Gwillim v. Donnellan, 115 U. S. 45, 49, 5 Sup. Ct. 1112, 29 L. Ed. 348) he adds: 'A valid and subsisting location of mineral lands, made and kept up in accordance with the provisions of the statutes of the United States, has the effect of a grant by the United States of the right of present and exclusive possession of the lands located. If, when one enters on land to make a location, there is another location in full force which entitles its owner to the exclusive possession of the land, the first location operates as a bar to the second.'

"In St. Louis Mining Co. v. Montana Mining Co., 171 U. S. 650, 655, 19 Sup. Ct. 63, 43 L. Ed. 320, the present Chief Justice declared that, 'Where there is a valid location of a mining claim, the area becomes segregated from the public domain and the property of the locator.' Nor is this 'exclusive right of possession and enjoyment' limited to the surface, nor even to the single vein whose discovery antedates and is the basis of the location. It extends (so reads the section) to 'all veins, lodes and ledges throughout their entire depth, the top or apex of which lies inside of such surface lines extended downward vertically.' In other words, the entire body of ground, together with all veins and lodes whose apexes are within that body of ground, become subject to an exclusive right of possession and enjoyment by the locator. And this exclusive right of possession and enjoyment continues during the entire life of the location, or, in the words of Chief Justice Waite, just quoted, while there is a 'valid and subsisting location of mineral lands, made and kept up in accordance with the provisions of the statutes of the United States.' There is no provision for, no suggestion of, a prior termination thereof. * * * And, if the surface is open to the entry of whoever seeks to explore for veins, his possession can be entirely destroyed. In this connection it may be well to notice the last sentence in section 2322, * * * which is a limitation on such right, and reads: 'And nothing in this section shall authorize the locator or possessor of a vein or lode which extends in its downward course beyond the vertical lines of his claim to enter upon the surface of a claim owned or possessed by another.' * * * The difficulty with the case presented by the plaintiff in error is that under the findings of fact we must take it that the entries of the locators of these several lode claims upon the placer grounds were trespassers, and as a general rule no one can initiate a right by means of a trespass. Atherton v. Fowler, 96 U. S. 513, 24 L. Ed. 732; Trenouth v. San Francisco, 100 U. S. 251, 25 L. Ed. 626; Haws v. Victoria Copper Mining Company, 160 U. S. 303, 16 Sup. Ct. 282, 40 L. Ed. 436. See, also, Cosmos Exploration Company v. Gray Eagle Company, 112 Fed. 4, 17, 50 C. C. A. 79, 93, 61 L. R. A. 230, in which the court said: 'No right can be initiated on government land which is in the actual possession of another by a forcible, fraudulent, or clandestine entry thereon. Cowell v. Lammers (C. C.) 21 Fed. 200, 202; Nevada Sierra Oil Co. v. Home Oil Co. (C. C.) 98 Fed. 674, 680; Hosmer v. Wallace, 97 U. S. 575, 579, 24 L. Ed. 1130; Trenouth v. San Francisco, 100 U. S. 251, 25 L. Ed. 626; Mewer v. Fletcher 116 U. S. 380, 385, 386, 6 Sup. Ct. 409, 29 L. Ed. 503; Haws v. Mining Company, 160 U. S. 303, 317, 16 Sup. Ct. 282, 40 L. Ed. 436; Nickals v. Winn, 17 Nev. 188, 193, 30 Pac. 435; McBrown v. Morris, 59 Cal. 64, 72; Goodwin v. McCabe, 75 Cal. 584, 588, 17 Pac. 705; Rourke v. McNally, 98 Cal. 291, 33 Pac. 62.'"

Cases supporting this legal principle, including Brown v. Killabrew, 21 Nev. 438, 33 Pac. 865, are cited in the decision of the district court of Nye county rendered last year in Ford v. Brown.

The opinion in the Uhlh Case quotes at length and relies upon section 2326 of the Revised Statutes, Act Cong. May 10, 1872, c. 152, § 7, 17 Stat. 93 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1430]. This section relates to the procedure where an adverse claim is filed upon an application being made for patent. There is nothing in its language as to whether a second location, made before, may prevail over a third location, made after, failure to do the required work, and nothing is stated in regard to the time when claims become subject to relocation, and it does not in any way designate how or when the rights of parties by location or relocation may be acquired, and consequently has no bearing upon the question which was before the court, and lends no support to the conclusion reached. The part of this section upon which the opinion seems to be based enacts that "it shall be the duty of the adverse claimant within thirty days after filing his claim to commence proceedings in a court of competent jurisdiction to determine the question of right of possession and prosecute the same with reasonable diligence to final judgment and a failure to so do shall be a waiver of his adverse claim." This simply provides that by failure to assert them a claimant may lose any rights which he has in the same way that a defendant in any action may lose his by default and failure to answer, and neither litigant in that case had made any such default or failure. It relates to how rights already obtained may be defended, determined, preserved, and forfeited, but not as to how those rights may be acquired by location or otherwise. This was not passed later than the other sections of the Revised Statutes mentioned, but at the same time as a part of the same act of May 10, 1872. As there is nothing in its language relating to the time or method of locating claims, we are unable to perceive how it can in any way amend, modify, repeal, or affect the language in section 2322, providing "that the locators of all mining locations, so long as they comply with the laws of the United States and with state, territorial and local regulations not in conflict with the laws of the United States governing their possessory title * * * shall have the exclusive right of possession and enjoyment of all the surface included within the lines of their locations and of all veins, lodes and ledges throughout their entire depth, the top or apex of which lies inside their surface lines extended downward vertically" and within planes running through parallel end lines, or the language in section 2324 that "the location must be distinctly marked on the ground so that its boundaries can be readily traced; that on each claim located after the 10th day of May, 1872, and until a patent has been issued therefor, not less than one hundred dollars worth of labor shall be performed or improvements made during each year; * * * and that upon the failure to comply with these conditions the claim or mine upon which such failure occurred shall be open to relocation in the same manner as if no location of the same had ever been made."

For the purpose of making the time uniform for doing the annual work, and for the relocation of claims on which such work is not performed, section 2324 was amended eight years later by Act Jan. 22, 1880, c. 9, § 2, 21 Stat. 61 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1426], so as to provide that the period within which the work is required to be done annually on all unpatented mining claims shall commence on the 1st day of January succeeding the date of location. In the Uhlig opinion the court said: "It cannot be denied that under section 2326, if before abandonment or forfeiture of the Levi P. claim, the owners of the Uhlig locations had applied for a patent, and the owners of the Levi P. had not adverse the application, upon an establishment of a prima facie right in the owners of the Uhlig claims, an indisputable presumption would have arisen that no conflict claims existed to the premises described in the location notice. Gwillim v. Donnellan, 115 U. S. 45, 51, 5 Sup. Ct. 1110, 29 L. Ed. 348. And the same result would have arisen had the owner of the Levi P. adverse the application for a patent based upon the Uhlig locations and failed to prosecute and waived such adverse claim. In both of the supposed instances the necessary consequence would have been to conclusively determine in favor of the applicant, so far as the rights of third persons were concerned, that the land was not unoccupied public land of the United States, but, on the contrary, as to such persons, from the time of the location by the applicant for the patent, was land embraced within such location and not subject to be acquired by another person. And this result, flowing from the failure of the owner of a subsisting senior location to adverse an application for patent by the owner of an opposing location, or his waiver if an adverse claim is made, must, as the greater includes the lesser, also arise from the forfeiture of the claim of the senior locator before an application for patent is made by the conflicting locator, and the consequent impossibility of the senior locator to successfully adverse after the forfeiture is complete. Of course, the effect of the construction which we have thus given to section 2326 of the Revised Statutes [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1430] is to cause the provisions of that section to qualify sections 2319 and 2324 [pages 1424, 1430], thereby preventing mineral lands of the United States, which have been the subject of conflicting locations, from becoming, quoad the claims of third parties, unoccupied mineral lands by the mere forfeiture of one of such locations."

By this language it is correctly stated at the beginning that where there are two claimants, and one applies for patent, the other may lose his rights under section 2326 by failing to adverse. Under the peculiar and unusual circumstances, the result in the Uhlig Case was correct, and could have been justified on another ground; but we are unable to perceive the force and correctness of the conclusion, on which the opinion was based, that because a claimant may waive his rights in proceedings for patent under section 2326, and because a senior locator may forfeit his, that therefore a mining claim is subject to relocation, or, what is the same thing, a junior or second location may be initiated on the ground as soon as the first location has been made, instead of upon the failure of the first locator to perform the required work as enacted by the statute. By a literal construction what is called a modification, we think, in effect would be a judicial repeal of a plain enactment, supported only by reference to another section which has no application. The language used is equivalent to saying that because a claimant may waive his right under section 2326 by failing to adverse, and a senior locator may forfeit his, therefore mining locations do not become subject to relocation upon the failure to do the required work as provided by section 2324, but that they may be relocated and rights initiated at any prior time.

The sections relating to proceedings upon application for patent are for the purpose of enabling claimants to obtain a final grant of the legal title from the government for ground previously acquired and to avoid any necessity of doing the annual work. So long as $100 is expended each year upon the claim, as required by the act of Congress, the owner's right to exclusive possession and to extract and exhaust the ore is as complete as if he held a patent, for which he may never apply unless he desires. Not infrequently ore worth millions of dollars is taken from mines which are finally abandoned as worthless and no application to patent them is ever made. The right to obtain patent depends upon the making of a location or upon having held possession during the period of the statute of limitations; but the making of the location and the time for making it do not depend upon the section regulating the proceedings upon application for patent which the claimant may never institute.

Surely it will not be contended that Congress has not the power to regulate the disposition of the unappropriated public mineral lands. The statute having clearly provided that these are open to location by citizens of the United States and those who have declared their intention to become such, and that the locators of mining claims, upon complying with the laws, shall have the exclusive right of possession and enjoyment of the surface included within the lines of their locations, and that claims shall be subject to relocation upon the failure to do the required work, these provisions ought not to be nullified or repealed by the courts because there is another section providing that a claimant may waive his right by a failure to adverse when application has been made for a patent, or because a senior locator or others who are not parties to the litigation may forfeit their rights by failing to do the required work. It is the duty of courts to construe and interpret the laws; but they should be careful not to encroach upon the legislative department, or set aside statutes, federal or state, except when they are clearly in conflict with the Constitution. As the Uhlig Case was one on adverse proceedings against an application for patent, the decision being based on the statute regulating these, anything the court said regarding the rights or forfeiture of an applicant in such proceedings may be considered as dictum in the present case, which is not on such proceedings. To enforce all the statements in that opinion in cases generally, like the one at bar, would necessitate the setting aside of the provisions in other sections of the act of May 10, 1872, to which reference has been made, and which were plainly followed and enforced by the Belk Case and other cases. The senior locator in the Uhlig Case waived his interests by failing to appear, and was not in court or trying to assert them, and anything said regarding the forfeiture of his rights was incidental.

If the plain provisions of the statute are to be overthrown, after having been enforced by numerous courts and universally accepted for a generation, not only will vested rights be endangered, but, as said in that case: "To hold that, before the former location has expired, an entry may be made and the several acts done necessary to perfect a relocation, will be to encourage unseemly contests about the possession of the public mineral-bearing lands, which would almost necessarily be followed by breaches of the peace." Then, instead of claims becoming subject to relocation upon the 1st day of January and after failure to do the annual assessment, the ground might be relocated before there was any such failure, and a day, a month, or a year previously. If the junior locator may acquire rights by entering the ground before there is any failure to do the required work, and while the statute gives the exclusive possession to the senior locator, any number of locations may be made and rights initiated at any time prior to the one at which the statute states that the claim shall be subject to relocation, and the person who follows the statute and makes the relocation on the 1st day of January will be too late, and may find that the right to locate after failure to do the work has been acquired by one of several others in the order of their locations previously made and before the work was required to be done by the original locator. The one who located 6 or 11 months before the time in which the work was required to be done had expired would have a better right than the one who had located 1 or 5 months in advance of such time; but, if the former failed to do the required work on his part, the right would become initiated in the latter, which would prevail over any one who relocated the ground on the 1st day of January, the time in which it is made relocatable by statute if the annual work is not done. Fraud would be encouraged, and the door opened for the evasion of the annual work, the purpose of which is to require the owner to develop the claim at least to that extent, or render his right subject to forfeiture and the claim to relocation. If others could initiate relocations on valid and existing claims, the question would arise whether the owner could relocate before they had lapsed, and if he could not, as an exception to the rule that others could, he would be tempted to have some one relocate for him in order to avoid doing the work. For the reasons stated, and as the Uhlig opinion does not mention Belk v. Meagher, and does not express an intention to overrule the principle therein announced, and affirmed in other decisions rendered about the same time, we do not think a result so revolutionary was intended to apply in cases generally, and that the Uhlig decision is applicable only to its own particular circumstances. It has already been so held, or that at most it is not controlling further than in actions in connection with proceedings for obtaining patents, by a number of courts and text-writers, and, so far as we are aware, by all who have determined that question.

In Montagne v. Labay, 2 Alaska, 575, the Uhlig Case was examined, and it was held that it applies only in adverse proceedings, and only within its own limited sphere of exceptional facts, and Belk v. Meagher was followed, and held not to be overruled. In Hoban v. Boyer, 37 Colo. 185, 85 Pac. 837, decided more than a year after the Uhlig Case, the Supreme Court of Colorado continued to adhere to the rule in Belk v. Meagher. In Lockhart v. Farrell (Utah) 86 Pac. 1081, the Supreme Court of Utah, the one by which Lavagnino v. Uhlig had been determined, said regarding the decision by the Supreme Court of the United States in that case: "Giving the Lavagnino Case the construction contended for by the respondent is, in effect, to make it overrule Belk v. Meagher and Gwillim v. Donnellan, and to render it in conflict with the decisions of both federal and state courts on the question. We do not believe any such result was intended by that decision. Likewise, to give it the meaning contended for renders it in conflict with the more recent decision of Brown v. Gurney." In a note in 68 L. R. A. 842-845, the Belk, Uhlig, and other cases are considered, and at page 837 appears the statement that "it is difficult to reconcile the decisions holding that one who relocates the claim after the original locator is in default in his assessment work will prevail over one who attempted to relocate the claim before the time for the performance of the assessment work had expired with the principle of the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the recent case of Lavagnino v. Uhlig, although it is not probable that the doctrine of these cases will be disturbed in consequence of that decision." Numerous decisions in the state and federal courts in the mining states and territories from the Mexican border to the Canadian line, apparently without exception, support Belk v. Meagher and Clipper Mining Co. v. Eli Mining Company, supra, and Gwillim v. Donnellan, 115 U. S. 49, 5 Sup. Ct. 1112, 29 L. Ed. 348, in which it was said: "If, when one enters on land to make a location, there is another location in full force, which entitles its owner to the exclusive possession of the land, the first location operates as a bar to the second." Quoting with approval from the opinion in the Belk Case, Justice Hawley, speaking for this court, in Rose v. Richmond, 17 Nev. 57, 27 Pac. 1105, 1110, said: "A relocation on lands actually covered at the time by another valid and subsisting location is void; and this, not only against the prior locator, but all the world, because the law allows no such thing to be done." In one end of the balance we have only the Uhlig Case, based on a section of the Revised Statutes which has no bearing on the question involved; and against this we have the numerous decisions, cited and uncited, supporting Belk v. Meagher, including our own in Rose v. Richmond Mining Co., and the statutes which are clearly and directly applicable, and which would have to be overruled in order to maintain the judgment.

After the court had sustained an objection to the offer of appellants to prove that the notices of location were posted on the Portlands, and that they were valid, existing claims, covering the ground at the time the Unions were located, they asked the court to admit the evidence subject to objection and to a motion to strike it out, so that its admissibility could be considered more carefully later; but the court refused to receive it, and consequently there is nothing in the record to show what acts were performed toward locating the Portlands. If they were located by posting the requisite notices on July 1, 1905, and by the proper marking of their boundaries within 90 days thereafter, the right to the ground covered by them would relate back to the time of the posting of the notices, and would in effect have been a segregation of the land from the public domain, so that the Unions could not have been validly located or initiated upon it on the 24th and 25th days of July, nor until after there was a failure to do the work required by the state statute to be done within 90 days from the posting of the notices. But if the Portland notices were so posted, and the claims were not staked or monumented within 90 days thereafter, then we think the locations were not completed under the act of Congress and the state statute, and, the land not having been marked within that period, so that its boundaries could be traced, it was not segregated from the public domain, although such posting carried the right to define the boundaries within 90 days. The period for this purpose has since been shortened by an act of the Legislature to 20 days. St. 1907, p. 419, c. 194.

Erhardt v. Boaro, 113 U. S. 530, 5 Sup. Ct. 561, 28 L. Ed. 1113, cited by appellants, is distinguishable; for it was said in the statement of facts there that "the evidence tended to show that, within 90 days from the discovery of the lode by Carroll, one French, on behalf of the plaintiff and Carroll, secretly caused the boundaries of the claim to be marked." It was correctly held there that the forcible eviction of the discoverer and locator from the vein or lode before the sinking of the shaft required by the Colorado statute and the prevention of his re-entry by threats of violence excuse him, as against the party keeping him out of possession, so long as he is kept out of it, from sinking the shaft required. There is no doubt that, if the locator discovered a vein and filed proper notices on the Portlands on the unappropriated public domain, he was entitled to go on the ground and mark the boundaries, and in doing so float the locations and do the required work; but, if he never did anything but post the notices, it would seem that no piece of ground was ever defined for segregation from the public domain, so as to notify or warn off others, or prevent the initiation of locations which would be good against a later one.

We find no errors in the record, except those resulting in different ways from the conclusion of the district court to adhere to the opinion in Lavagnino v. Uhlig. Upon the trial objection was sustained to evidence regarding the sinking of a shaft 10 feet deep, or its equivalent, on the Unions, and the filing of certificates of location was objected to and withdrawn, because the work was not done and the certificates were not filed before this action was begun; and it is contended that proof of this work and the filing of those certificates was essential to plaintiffs' recovery. There was no supplemental complaint or pleading alleging that the work was done or completed or that the certificates were filed after the commencement of the suit to warrant its admission. We have recently held in the case of Ford v. Campbell, 29 Nev. —, 92 Pac. 206, that the filing of a certificate of location is not essential to the validity of the claim but relates to matters of proof. If the Portlands were not valid and existing locations at the time the Unions were located, and the Unions were located on the unappropriated public domain by posting notices and marking their boundaries in accordance with law, respondents would have become entitled to hold them for the 90 days allowed for doing the work, and by instituting this suit prior to that time could recover a judgment for possession and damages to the end of that period. If, under these circumstances, respondents failed to do the required work within 90 days, the claims would become subject to relocation by the appellants or others.

The court sustained objections to a series of questions by which it may be surmised that defendants sought to prove, upon the cross-examination of plaintiffs' witnesses, that the Portland notices were posted on the ground at the time the Unions were located. The court properly limited the cross-examination to the matters brought out in the direct examination. This did not prevent defendants from making the witnesses their own after plaintiffs had closed their case in chief nor the court from then allowing, in its discretion, a rigid examination if they were hostile.

The judgment is set aside, and the cause is remanded for a new trial, upon which defendants will be allowed to introduce evidence to show that at the time the Unions were located the ground was covered by the Portlands as valid and existing locations made by posting the requisite notices and by the defining of their boundaries within 90 days thereafter, and that by failure to do the work required by the state statutes the Portlands had lapsed at the time the Liberty and Justice claims were located.

NORCROSS, J. I concur in the opinion of the Chief Justice, and express the following additional views, based upon my conception of the statutes and the decisions of the highest courts:

The right of respondents to offer proof that the Portland claims were valid and subsisting locations at the time the Union locations were made does not depend, as contended, upon any relations of privity between the locators of the Portland claims and themselves. They have the right to offer such proof, in order to establish the fact, if they can, that they have complied with the federal and state law as relocators of a prior existing claim which had become, under the law, subject to relocation. Both the state and federal statutes have provided for the relocation of claims which have become subject to such relocation by reason of the failure to do the location work or annual assessment work provided for by law. A distinction is thus recognized, both by the federal and state laws, between a location and a relocation. If persons are claiming rights to the public domain as relocators, necessarily their rights depend upon the fact that a prior existing claim had become subject to forfeiture, and that by entering upon the ground and relocating it they had effected such forfeiture of the rights of the prior locators and established rights in themselves. They can only establish their rights as relocators by proving the prior location, that it had become subject to forfeiture, and that they had made such forfeiture effectual by complying with acts necessary to make a valid relocation. Where the right to make a location is initiated by the making of a discovery and the posting of a proper notice, but no further act is done to perfect the location, and thus segregate the same from the public domain, the ground is not subject strictly to relocation, for no prior valid location had been perfected. In such a case the land does not cease to be a part of the public domain, never having been segregated therefrom, and thus it remains open to location. It frequently happens that a person upon making a discovery posts a location notice, and in common parlance this is called a "location"; but legally it is not a location, and may never become such. The first discoverer, who posts a valid notice, initiates a right which he is protected in and which he can follow up by doing the other acts necessary to perfect a valid location; but until he has done those other acts he has not acquired the right of exclusive possession given him by the statute upon a perfected location, which will have the effect of cutting off any inchoate right in another initiated in the meantime.

BALDWIN v. BROWN.

(Supreme Court of Washington. Jan. 17, 1908.)

1. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE — SHORTAGE IN LAND—ENFORCING PARTIAL PERFORMANCE.

Defendant contracted to convey to plaintiff a government subdivision of land, by special warranty deed, on certain payment. Prior to the time for conveyance defendant's title to five acres of the land was devested by a judgment quieting title thereto in a third party. Held, that the fact that a special warranty deed only warrants against defects of title caused by the acts of the grantor, and that the title to the five acres was lost because of matters prior to defendant's obtaining title, did not entitle defendant to refuse to convey the remaining land on tender of the contract price less a proportionate reduction for the land lost, since the question was not as to the effect of a special warranty deed, but whether he could "convey" the five acres by any form of deed.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 44, Specific Performance, §§ 23, 31.]

2. VENDOR AND PURCHASER—TITLE OF VENDOR—ABATEMENT FOR DEFICIENCY.

In an action to compel a conveyance of land, where title failed as to part of the tract, the amount deducted would be such proportion of the whole purchase price as the value of said portion bears to the value of the whole tract at the time of purchase.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 48, Vendor and Purchaser, §§ 333-340.]

3. APPEAL—REVERSAL—TRIVIAL ERRORS—AMOUNT OF JUDGMENT.

Reversal will not be ordered because of an error of a few dollars in the computation of the judgment, since it can be credited in adjusting the costs.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, §§ 4546-4554.]

Crow and Dunbar, JJ., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, King County; Arthur E. Griffin, Judge.

Bill by M. L. Baldwin against J. W. Brown. From a decree for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Steele & Brown, for appellant. Buck & Boddy, for respondent.

ROOT, J. This is an action in equity by respondent to compel appellant to make a conveyance of certain land. From a decree in plaintiff's favor, defendant appeals.

Appellant and one David Farmer on the 18th of May, 1904, entered into a written agreement of which the following is the material portion: "That in consideration of eleven hundred dollars ($1100.00) paid, and to be paid, by said David Farmer, his heirs and assigns, to J. W. Brown, his heirs and assigns, as hereinafter stated, the said J. W. Brown agrees to convey to the said David Farmer the north half (½) of the northeast quarter (¼) of section one (1), township twenty-two (22), range two (2) east, King county, Washington, by special warranty deed at the time the same is fully paid for as per this agreement. That one hundred dollars ($100.00) of said sum is in hand paid and one hundred sixty dollars ($160.00) of the same is due and payable November 1, 1904, and the balance, eight hundred and forty ($840.00) dollars, is due and payable November 1, 1905, as per the two promissory notes of even date herewith, bearing seven (7) per cent. interest from date. The said David Farmer is to keep all taxes assessed against said real estate paid before the same become delinquent. That the said J. W. Brown reserves the right and title to said land until the same is paid for in full." The property described in said contract had been obtained by King county in 1902 by general foreclosure for taxes for 1895 and prior years. The appellant received a deed to the same from the county July 15, 1903. Some time after making the contract above referred to, David Farmer died, and his interests therein became vested in this respondent, who is his mother. Before the final payment became due one William Cross brought an action in equity to quiet title to five acres of the land described in said contract, and made this appellant and respondent parties. Said action was prosecuted to final judgment, resulting in a decree to the effect that this appellant had no right, title, or interest in or to said five acres of land, but that the same was the property of said William Cross. When the time for making final payment under the terms of the above contract arrived, respondent requested a reduction in the amount of the purchase price on account of not getting said five acres. Appellant declined to make such reduction, but insisted upon respondent paying the full amount called for by the contract. Thereupon this action was instituted to compel appellant to convey the balance of the land without respondent paying the proportion of the purchase price represented by said five acres.

Appellant contends, first, that the trial court was wrong in the construction placed upon the contract; and, second, that the amount of reduction directed to be allowed, if any was allowable, was too great. As to the first point, appellant urges that, as a special warranty deed warrants only against defects of title occasioned by the act of the grantor himself, and as Cross recovered this property, not by reason of anything done or omitted by appellant, but by reason of matters occurring before he obtained the property from the county, he (appellant) was entitled to receive from respondent the full amount of the purchase price as called for by the contract for the entire tract. As the controversy is not as to the effect of a special warranty deed, but as to a contract to "convey" by special warranty deed, and as the contract contains the expression "that the said J. W. Brown reserves the right and title to said land until the same is paid for in full," the respondent claims, and apparently the trial court was of the opinion, that appellant by said contract purported to have "right and title" to said land, and agreed to "convey" the same, and that the contract contemplated this, and that, as a court of competent jurisdiction prior to the final payment on this contract had decided that appellant had no right or title whatever to said five acres, he was therefore unable to "convey" by a special warranty deed, or by any other form of conveyance. The court, therefore, held that the appellant was not in a position to require respondent to pay for that which the former had agreed to, but could not, convey. We think this position must be maintained. In Ankeny v. Clark, 1 Wash. St. 549, 20 Pac. 583, the territorial Supreme Court, speaking through Chief Justice Burke, said: "No form of deed is sufficient to convey a title where the grantor has none." It is not a question here of the effect of a special warranty deed heretofore delivered, but it is a question of whether or not a party is able to carry out the terms of a contract to be performed by him. As to the second point, it appears that the five acres to which the title failed was of greater value per acre than the remaining portion of the tract. The court found the value of this five-acre tract was $250, and directed that an allowance of that amount should be made to respondent. Appellant claims that this is excessive and disproportionate. Where one is unable to convey an aliquot part of the land agreed to be conveyed, the rule seems to be that such a proportion of the total purchase price shall be deducted as the value of such portion bore to the value of the entire tract at the time of the purchase. Appellant urges that this was not done in this case; but in this we think he is in error, at least, it does not appear that any other rule of ascertainment was adopted.

It is urged that an error to the extent of a few dollars was made in the computation. If so, it can be credited in adjusting the costs. Certain other errors are assigned, but become immaterial under our view of the two questions hereinbefore considered.

The judgment of the trial court is affirmed.

HADLEY, C. J., and FULLERTON and MOUNT, JJ., concur.

CROW, J. (dissenting). The substantial effect of the majority opinion is to compel appellant to perform his contract in the identical manner which would have been required of him had he agreed to warrant a title previously acquired, and convey the same by a general warranty deed. He made no such agreement. His contract calls for a special warranty deed only. Both he and respondent's predecessor knew that his sole title, which appellant was selling, rested on a tax foreclosure. Appellant acquired such title without warranty, and his evident purpose, known to respondent's predecessor, was to convey the same as it came to him; that is, to sell whatever had come to him by the tax title, and to enter into no covenant to hold him liable beyond that. He has fully performed his agreement, but the majority opinion now makes a new contract for him and orders its specific performance.

The judgment should be reversed, and I therefore dissent.

DUNBAR, J. I concur in what is said by Judge CROW.

STATE v. McFADDEN.

(Supreme Court of Washington. Jan. 15, 1908.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW — PARTIES TO OFFENSES — PRINCIPALS.

Under Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St. § 6782, abolishing distinctions between an accessory before the fact and a principal, and providing that all persons concerned in an offense shall be tried as principals, one advising a mother to withhold food from her child may, on the resulting death of the child from starvation, be prosecuted as a principal for the death of the child.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 14, Criminal Law, §§ 71-75.]

2. HOMICIDE—MANSLAUGHTER—INFORMATION.

Under Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St. § 6840, providing that an information shall contain a statement of the acts constituting the offense so as to enable a person of common understanding to know what is intended, an information charging that accused, representing himself as a physician, advised a mother employing him to give the child no food except water and the juices of fruit, and such other nourishment as he might direct, and that acting under such instruction the mother withheld all food and nourishment, except as directed by accused, and that the child died as a result of starvation, does not charge manslaughter, defined by section 7042 punishing one who shall kill another without malice in the commission of some unlawful act, because it fails to show a connected chain of facts showing starvation as the necessary result of the directions.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 26, Homicide, §§ 213-228.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Asotin County; Chester F. Miller, Judge.

Charles McFadden was convicted of manslaughter, and he appeals. Reversed and remanded.

S. G. & H. G. Cosgrove and Sturdevant & Bailey, for appellant. Geo. H. Rummens, for the State.

HADLEY, C. J. The defendant was charged with the crime of manslaughter. The information is very long and circumstantial in its allegations; but in substance it charges that the defendant represented to one Ida Robison that he was a physician; that the representations were made for the purpose of inducing her to believe that he was a skillful and qualified physician; that, believing said representations and relying thereon, she employed him to treat her minor child, a daughter, of the age of about nine months; that she placed the child under the direction and supervision of the defendant to be treated by him as such physician; that he at once assumed the relation of physician toward the child, and that while so acting he prescribed and directed that the child should be given no food or nourishment save water and the juices of fruit, and such other nourishment as he might direct; that acting under such instruction she thereafter withheld from the child all food and nourishment, except as directed by the defendant, for a number of days; that the food which was given under the defendant's direction was insufficient to sustain the life of the child, and she thereupon became weak and emaciated; that the mother became convinced that said treatment was not proper for the child, and she thereupon gave the child a small quantity of wholesome food, which was beneficial and not detrimental to her health; that she informed the defendant she had so given the food, and he thereupon remonstrated with her, and assured her and led her to believe that the treatment he directed was necessary for the cure and relief of the child; that thereupon the mother again kept all food from the child, except as directed by the defendant, for a great number of days, and during all of said times she faithfully complied with all requests and instructions of the defendant in relation to the treatment of the child, but by reason of such treatment, so directed by the defendant, the child became weak, emaciated, and starved; that the defendant was at all times grossly ignorant and unlearned in the proper and necessary treatment of diseases, and the treatment which he prescribed and directed for the child was grossly improper and dangerous to its life; that the child was during all said times under the care and direction of the defendant as aforesaid; and that on account of the treatment so administered and the withholding of food, as alleged, the child died. A demurrer to the information was overruled, after which the defendant pleaded not guilty, and he was tried and convicted. He has appealed.

It is assigned that the court erred in overruling the demurrer to the information. It is urged that the facts alleged against appellant do not amount to a charge of manslaughter, for the reason that it was not appellant but the mother who withheld the food from the child. It is contended that the information shows that appellant did not assume to administer the food, but that the mother at all times did so, and that the real physical act which it is alleged caused death was that of the mother, the appellant being at the time not personally present, but having advised the mother to do the act. It is argued that such facts can in no event amount to other than a charge that appellant was an accessory before the fact, whereas the authorities hold that there cannot be such an accessory to the crime of manslaughter. This court so held in State v. Robinson, 12 Wash. 349, 41 Pac. 51, 902. Our statute (section 6782, Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St.), however, abolishes all distinctions between an accessory before the fact and a principal, and provides that "all persons concerned in the commission of an offense, whether they directly counsel the act constituting the offense, or counsel, aid and abet in its commission though not present, shall hereafter be indicted, tried and punished as principals." Under the said statute appellant may be and is charged here as a principal and not as an accessory. Manslaughter is defined by our statute (section 7042, Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St.) as follows: "Every person who shall unlawfully kill any human being without malice, express or implied, either voluntarily upon a sudden heat, or involuntarily, but in the commission of some unlawful act, shall be deemed guilty of manslaughter." The charge does not amount to that of killing "voluntarily upon a sudden heat," and if manslaughter is charged it is that of involuntarily causing death "in the commission of some unlawful act." The unlawful act charged is that of withholding food, not by his personal, physical act, but by counseling the mother to do it. His share in the offense was therefore that of counseling and advising the mother what to do. It then becomes vitally important in order to put him upon trial for a felony that just what he did advise must be charged. It is charged that he advised the giving of no food save water and the juices of fruit, "and such other nourishment as he, the said Charles McFadden, might direct." There is no allegation as to what other nourishment he directed given, although it must be reasonably understood from the language that he did give other directions. It is alleged that the mother followed his directions, and that the food given was insufficient to sustain life. But under such peculiar circumstances that is the statement of a single, extreme fact in the nature of a mere conclusion. In so important a matter where he is charged with involuntarily causing the death of a human being, he is entitled to a full and specific statement of what the state claims were all of his directions as to the giving or withholding of food from time to time, including a statement as to every kind of nourishment directed, the quantity thereof, and when it was to be given. In short, such a connected chain of facts should be alleged as show starvation as the necessary and certain result of appellant's directions. Under the terms of section 6840, Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St., he is entitled to "a statement of the acts constituting the offense, in ordinary and concise language, without repetition, and in such manner as to enable a person of common understanding to know what is intended."

From the terms of the information it cannot be determined what food appellant ordered given, or withheld, or in what quantities. The information epitomized says that the child was starved by the withholding of food through appellant's advice, not all food, but merely some kinds of food, without specifying what kinds or what quantities were directed or given. Such a statement of facts is not sufficient to show that appellant's directions caused the death of the child. We, therefore, think the demurrer to the information should have been sustained, and, in as much as the judgment must be reversed for that error, it is unnecessary to discuss other questions mentioned in the briefs.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded, with instructions to sustain the demurrer to the information.

RIDPATH v. SPOKANE STAMP WORKS.
(Supreme Court of Washington. Jan. 17, 1908.)
LANDLORD AND TENANT — NUISANCE — QUESTION FOR JURY.

Whether the operation of machinery by a lessee on the ground floor of a building, the other floors of which were used as a hotel, constituted a nuisance, held for the jury.

Appeal from Superior Court, Spokane County; John B. Yakey, Judge.

Action by William M. Ridpath against the Spokane Stamp Works. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed, with directions.

Henley & Kellam, for appellant. John C. Kleber, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The appellant is, and was at the time of the making of the lease hereinafter mentioned, the owner of a four-story brick block in the city of Spokane. The lower or ground floor rooms were designed and used for storerooms, and the other floors were designed for and used as a hotel. It is conceded that the hotel is elegantly and expensively furnished, and has at all times been conducted as a first-class hotel. On the 1st day of July, 1906, appellant leased to the respondent one of the storerooms on the first floor of the hotel, and respondent went into possession thereunder. The lease is not introduced in evidence, but it is admitted that it was executed, and its terms are undisputed. The complaint alleged that the lease contained no express restrictions or provisions as to noise, confusion, shaking, or jarring of the building, and that at the time of and prior to the making of the lease it was represented by respondent to appellant that the storeroom was to be used only as a display and salesroom for its manufactured products, and that there would be created no noise, nor would there be anything about the conduct of its business to disturb in any manner the guests or patrons of said hotel. This allegation was denied by the answer, and it was claimed that the appellant knew that the respondent intended to operate a stampmill in said building, and consented to its operation. On this question the appellant, Ridpath, testified that it was stipulated and agreed that there should be no machinery placed in the room that would in any manner be offensive or create a noisy disturbance. It was shown that shortly after the execution of the lease the respondent did install in the leased room a system of machinery propelled by electric power, and that the operation of such machinery created excessive noise, and the jarring, shaking, and vibration of said building. The appellant, after complaining to respondent of the discomfort and injury the operation of said machinery was causing him, gave respondent the notice required by law, and brought this action under the unlawful detainer statute. On the conclusion of the plaintiff's testimony, the court sustained defendant's motion for a nonsuit, holding that there was not sufficient testimony to go to the jury upon the question of nuisance. Judgment was rendered against plaintiff, dismissing the action, and from this judgment plaintiff appeals.

Many assignments of error are made in relation to the ruling of the court in sustaining objection to the testimony offered by the appellant. But without entering upon a discussion of these alleged errors, and saying merely in passing that the court seemed to have adopted a very strict rule in relation to the proof offered by the appellant to sustain the allegations of the complaint, we think on the merits of the case that the court erred in taking the case from the jury and granting the nonsuit, and that there was sufficient testimony to have been submitted to the jury on the question of whether or not the operations of the respondent constituted a nuisance within the meaning of the law. For the purposes of this case it must be conceded that there was no permission given to the lessee to operate the machinery in the manner in which it was operated, there being no testimony offered by the respondent on that subject. There was testimony by about a dozen witnesses, some of the guests in the hotel, others employés therein, by tradesmen in the neighborhood, and by the owner of the hotel, that the machinery created such a noise and quivering in the rooms of the hotel, including the parlor, that it was very annoying to the guests and occupants. Mr. Herman Cominsky testified that the stamp when dropping created a very heavy noise—as he described it, like a large hammer dropping on a piece of iron—and that the vibrations were very strong, so much so that they shook the building. Mr. Lockheart's description of the noise made by the machinery was as follows: "It makes quite a buzzing and roaring noise. Reminds one to some extent of being on the street cars when air brakes are running." He also testified that the noise of the hammer dropping was like the hammer dropping on metal; that the hotel outside of this was a very quiet hotel, and desirable for roomers; and that the machinery made a buzzing and disagreeable noise for guests to endure. Mr. Bernheart, who lived in the hotel, also testified that the machinery made a great racket and noise and disturbed the guests. He was a clerk in the office of the hotel, and testified: That it disturbed him in the office in the performance of his work. That the rumbling of the noise and vibration and the hammer was very loud, and he could not do his work as effectively in the office while the machinery was in operation as when it was not. That it could be heard all over the house and in all the rooms in the house. That he had had complaints from all the guests, and on several occasions had to move people out of certain rooms where the noise was so loud that it could not be endured; and that they had lost the leasing of the rooms on that account. That it was worse on the second floor and in the parlor, but that the vibrations reached throughout the hotel; the witness saying: "It does vibrate the building. In fact, you cannot stay in the rooms on the second floor where this is without getting the jars, not only from the beds and chairs, but all over the rooms, and even standing on the floor." That he could not use the parlor while the machinery was going on. People could not sit there, and that it was not fit for use at all, and that he had had to let people go out of it on account of this noise. One witness testified that the vibration was of such force that it affected everything in the room, and that as you stood on the floors you could feel it go through you. The testimony of the appellant, Ridpath, was in part as follows: "Q. State what occurred after these people took possession of this room in your building. A. Some time—I think it was in August—I went around to the hotel office, and I heard a terrible noise in the building, and I went to see what it was, and discovered it was machinery running under the floor of the parlor. Mr. Bernheart was with me at the time and we rushed down to the street, and went into the store, and Mr. Bernard was there, and I said: 'You must stop that. It will not do at all, and it will drive everybody out of the hotel.' And he said he would take it down, and I went out." He also testified that on Sprague street he had heard the falling of the hammer distinctly, and described the noise as being like that made by a separator of a threshing machine; testified that it shook the glassware on the chandeliers, that you could feel the vibrations of it on your body anywhere in the hotel, that it created an unnatural and unpleasant condition, that it sometimes ran for several hours in the day and sometimes for a few minutes, and that it jarred the building and was so severe that the floors quivered so that no one would want to stand on them. Mrs. Green, a roomer in the hotel, stated that the noise produced by the machinery was loud enough to annoy any one, and she was annoyed to such an extent that she had complained about it to the clerk in the building. She stated that it was severe enough to annoy one "dreadfully," and that it annoyed her to such an extent that several times she had dressed and gone out of her room to get rid of it; also stated that she was a woman in good health and not nervous. When asked to describe the noise, she said that it reminded her very much of the first shock of the earthquake in San Francisco; that people were not able to engage in conversation in the parlor, nor carry on conversation during the time the machinery was running; that it would be impossible to do so; and, without specially reviewing the testimony, there is testimony of several other witnesses to the same effect. If this testimony is true, and it stands now uncontradicted, not being shaken in any way by the cross-examination, the operation of the machinery unquestionably under all authority constituted a nuisance which the owner of the building would have a right to have abated.

The judgment of the lower court is therefore reversed, with instructions to overrule the motion for a nonsuit, and to proceed with the trial of the cause.

FORD v. HEFFERNAN ENGINE WORKS et al.

(Supreme Court of Washington. Jan. 17, 1908.)
MASTER AND SERVANT—MASTER'S LIABILITY FOR INJURIES TO SERVANT—ACTIONS—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

In an action by plaintiff to recover damages suffered through the death of her husband while in the employ of defendant, caused by stepping in a hole in the floor, evidence examined, and held to show that decedent knew of the conditions at the place where he was working, and of the danger, precluding recovery.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 34, Master and Servant, § 989.]

Appeal from Superior Court, King County; Mitchell Gilliam, Judge.

Action by Mary Ford, individually, and as guardian ad litem of Martin and Reuben Ford against the Heffernan Engine Works and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed, with instructions to dismiss the action.

Ira Bronson, D. B. Trefethen, R. S. Eskridge, and Philip Tindall, for appellants. Walter S. Fulton, for respondent.

DUNBAR, J. This action was brought by the respondent to recover from the appellants damages alleged to have been suffered by the respondent through the death of her husband while in the employment of appellant, the Heffernan Engine Works, on the 16th day of June, 1906. Said appellant was engaged in operating machine shops. The deceased at the time of the accident had been

In the employment of the appellant as a helper for about three weeks. Most of this time he had been employed in outside work, and had been at the shops of the appellant but a few days previous to his injuries. The shops maintained by the appellant were two in number, an inner and an outer one, and the deceased's duties had kept him most of the time in the outer shop. On the 16th day of June one, John Curry, a machinist and an employé of the appellant, was at work upon a drill press situated in the rear of the inner shop. He made application to the foreman for a helper, and was directed by the foreman to obtain as such helper the deceased. Curry called the deceased from his work in the outer shop, and asked him to assist him in putting a wheel upon parallel bars maintained in connection with the drill press. At the south side of the drill press was a pit or hole about 3 feet square and 10 feet deep. All the guard there was to this hole, after the door which covered it had been taken off for the purpose of doing the work then in progress, was a plank 3 inches by 12 and about 4 feet long, so that it will be seen that the entire hole was not covered by the plank. While assisting Curry to carry the wheel, weighing between 50 and 60 pounds, to the parallel bars projecting from the south side of the drill press, the deceased stepped upon the plank, and in some manner missed his footing, stepped forward, presumably into the hole, and was precipitated upon one of the parallel bars, receiving an injury from which he died in a few days. The acts of negligence relied on by the respondent were the maintenance by appellants without notice to the deceased of the hole heretofore described, and requiring the work in the immediate vicinity of this hole without notice or warning of its existence, and the failure to guard or protect the said hole. Upon the trial a verdict in favor of the respondent was returned in the sum of $10,448. Appellants moved for judgment non obstante verdicto upon two grounds, (1) the insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict, (2) that the special finding of the jury establishes freedom of appellants from liability. This motion was denied, and judgment entered upon the verdict. From this judgment, the appeal was taken.

We think all the circumstances surrounding this case show conclusively that the deceased, if he was an ordinarily prudent man, knew or ought to have known of the existence of this hole, and if that be true, respondent cannot recover, for if it was a dangerous place the danger was apparent to deceased. Respondent relies largely upon the case of Bailey v. Mukilteo Lumber Company, 87 Pac. 819, where it was said by this court that the servant, when directed by the master to work in a certain place, has a right to assume that he will not be exposed to unnecessary perils, or, in other words, that such a direction or order implies an assurance of reasonable safety. This has been the uniform announcement of this court, and we have no desire to retreat from that position now. But it has been just as well established by this and all other courts that, where the danger which beset the servant was apparent, it was equivalent to notice from the master of the existing danger. Respondent also relies upon the case of Johnson v. Tacoma Mill Company, 22 Wash. 88, 60 Pac. 53, where a carpenter who was making repairs on a mill was injured by stepping backward into a barrel of hot water, the barrel being used to receive the water and steam from an exhaust pipe from an engine in the mill; the presence of the barrel being unnoticeable, by reason of the water in the barrel having pieces of bark floating on it, and by reason of no steam arising from the barrel at the time. It was said by this court that it was not the duty of the respondent to look for the barrel of water, notwithstanding he could have seen it if he had looked, for the reason that he naturally would not look for it, not knowing of its existence, and for the further reason that it did not appear that it was a necessary or common attachment to the mill, or, if it was, that it was the custom to leave it uncovered. In that case it was said that the barrel was not an incident to the business of putting up a pipe, and under the testimony was not so conspicuous as to challenge attention. Distinguishing that case from that which it seems to us is the case at bar, the court said: "The plaintiff was not injured by anything he was working with or upon." While in this case the cause of the injury was the hole which was connected with the machinery upon which the deceased was working, and he would therefore be required to take notice of the condition of things surrounding the place where he was working.

There is very little testimony which is material to the issues in this case. The only eyewitness to the accident was Curry, who was the agent of the company in the performance of this business. He testified that he asked deceased to help him carry this spur wheel, which is a metal wheel about 20 inches in diameter and 3 inches thick, and place it upon these parallel bars; that he took hold of one side of the wheel and deceased the other; and that they moved along until they reached the platform. When they stepped upon the plank, which we have before described, and while attempting to adjust or place the wheel upon the parallels, the deceased in some manner fell and fell astride of the parallel bar. In his direct examination Curry testified that deceased stepped off into the hole, but upon his cross-examination he admitted that he did not see deceased step, could not see him because the wheel intercepted his vision, and finally admitted that the facts which he had rehearsed in relation to his stepping off were not facts at all which he had observed, but were only inferences which he had drawn from the fact that the deceased was upon the plank and that he had fallen off. So that the cause of his falling off is somewhat problematical. But, conceding that he actually did step off, and conceding also that he had not had any verbal notice from Curry or any one else as to the existence of this hole, the testimony shows that, notwithstanding it was a somewhat cloudy day, as shown by the minutes of the weather bureau, it was one of the longest days of the year, and near the middle of the day, that the front of the shop was made of glass, and that there was sufficient light in the shop to do ordinary work. We think it shows conclusively that there was sufficient light to have enabled the decedent to observe the hole. This must have been true, for Curry testifies that it was light enough for him, after the decedent was hurt, to finish the work alone, and light enough for him to see the small hole in the spur wheel to put the spindle in and turn it around so the key would fit in the key slot. It must have been light enough to do this with comfort and safety, and light enough to easily observe everything around the work, or Curry would have resorted to the lights which hung in reach of him and which were placed there to be turned on when the light was not sufficient. In addition to this, it appears from Curry's testimony that they passed near by this hole when deceased came into the shop with him, and that before they brought the wheel they brought a shaft and laid it down within a few feet of the hole. This shaft was to be placed in the hole, and it is but reasonable to suppose that, when the deceased helped to bring this shaft, placing it near the hole, leaving it there and going off to get the wheel in which the shaft was to be adjusted, he must have taken notice of the conditions existing at the place at which he was called upon to work. He must also have noticed when he stepped upon the board—the board being about 3 inches thick—which raised him up to a plane about 8 inches below the top of the parallel bars.

Considering alone the testimony of the respondent in the case, we are forced to the conviction that the decedent knew of the conditions at the place where he was hurt, and that his death occurred through one of those unfortunate accidents for which no one can be held responsible.

The judgment is reversed, with instructions to dismiss the action.

WALTERS v. SEATTLE, R. & S. RY. CO.
(Supreme Court of Washington. Jan. 15, 1908.)

1. CARRIERS — INJURY TO PASSENGERS — OBSTRUCTION ON TRACK—LIABILITY.

A railway company may not escape liability for injury to a passenger in a collision, caused by an obstruction on the track, merely because the obstruction was caused by an agency over which it had no control. In addition it must show that it could not, by the highest degree of care and diligence, consistent with the practical operation of the road, have discovered and removed the obstruction prior to the collision.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 9, Carriers, § 1211.]

2. SAME—RES IPSA LOQUITUR—SPECIFIC ALLEGATIONS—EFFECT.

In an action against an electric railway company for injury to passenger in a collision, caused by an obstruction on a track, she did not waive her right to rely upon a presumption of negligence arising from the fact of the injury by particularly alleging the cause of the accident.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 9, Carriers, § 1283.]

3. WITNESS — CROSS-EXAMINATION — QUESTIONS TENDING TO DEGRADE WITNESS.

In an action for personal injury received in a street car accident, a former motorman, who testified as to the proper method of stopping a car on a grade such as where the accident happened, and on cross-examination stated that since ceasing to be a motorman he had been discharged as a policeman because of charges preferred against him, could not be compelled to state what the charges were, since the matter could not affect his credibility as a witness to the particular fact under consideration, and in such circumstances a witness may decline to answer questions whose only purpose is to degrade him or expose him to disgrace or infamy.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 50, Witnesses, §§ 1021-1025.]

Appeal from Superior Court, King County; Mitchell Gilliam, Judge.

Personal injury action by Inez Walters, by Leona Walters, her guardian ad litem, against the Seattle, Renton & Southern Railway Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Sachs & Hale, for appellant. Geo. P. Rossman and Jackson Silbaugh, for respondent.

FULLERTON, J. The appellant owns and operates an electric railway extending from the city of Seattle to the town of Renton, in King county. On August 13, 1906, the respondent was a passenger on one of the appellant's cars, and was injured by a collision which occurred between the car on which she was riding and a car coming from the opposite direction. This action was brought to recover damages for the injuries received. At the trial the jury returned a verdict in favor of respondent for the sum of $5,000. The trial judge deemed the recovery excessive, and reduced it to $3,000, offering the respondent the alternative of accepting it, as reduced, or submitting to a new trial. The respondent accepted the modified verdict, and the judgment from which this appeal is taken was entered thereon.

The appellant requested an instruction to the effect that if the car which collided with the car on which the respondent was riding came in contact with some clay which had been deposited upon the track "by some agency not under the control of the defendant," and that when the car wheels struck such clay the car by reason of coming in contact therewith shot forward, and that the motorman thereon did all in his power to stop the car before it came into collision with the car on which the appellant was a passenger, but could not with the highest degree of care have prevented the collision, and the motorman on the other car was guilty of no negligence, then the appellant would not be liable for the collision, or liable in damages to the respondent for her injuries. This instruction the court properly refused. It does not correctly measure the appellant's duties. For a railway company carrying passengers to show merely that a collision was caused by some obstruction of the track, caused by an agency over which it had no control, is not enough to excuse it from responsibility for a collision. It must go further, and show that it could not, by the highest degree of care and diligence consistent with the practical operation of its railway, have discovered and removed the obstruction prior to the time it operated its cars over the track. The instruction requested omitted this qualification, and was therefore incorrect as a statement of the law.

The court charged the jury, in substance, that the happening of the collision raised a presumption of negligence on the part of the railway company, and that the respondent was entitled to recover thereon, unless they were convinced that the evidence on the part of the railway company overcame this presumption. The appellant admits the correctness of the rule as applied in this jurisdiction, but contends that there was here no room for its application, as the respondent did not content herself with alleging generally that she was a passenger on the car, that a collision occurred, and that she was injured thereby, but went farther and alleged particularly the cause of the accident, and that since she alleged the cause of the accident she must prove it, as alleged, or subject herself to a nonsuit. This contention is not tenable. The plaintiff was not deprived of the case proved by a failure to prove all that was alleged. She was only obligated to prove the substance of the issue, and by the substance of the issue is meant the facts essential to a recovery. "The rule is, that whatever cannot be stricken out without getting rid of a part essential to a cause of action must be retained, and, of course, proved even if it be described with unnecessary particularity." In this case all that pertained to the particular cause of the accident could have been stricken out and still enough remain to warrant a recovery. The particular cause of the accident was not therefore of the substance of the issue, and it was not necessary for the appellant to prove it in order to recover, even though it was alleged. Doubtless in many cases it is desirable to plead and prove the exact cause of an accident in order that the question of the defendant's negligence may be put beyond the peradventure of a doubt, and thus insure a recovery, where otherwise recovery might be doubtful if the presumption alone were relied upon. Such was perhaps the purpose of the plaintiff in this instance. But the plaintiff is not to be deprived of the case her pleadings and proofs made merely because she alleged a stronger case than she was able to prove. Cassady v. Old Colony St. Ry. Co., 184 Mass. 156, 68 N. E. 10, 63 L. R. A. 285; Chicago City Ry. Co. v. Carroll, 206 Ill. 318, 68 N. E. 1087; North Chicago St. Ry. Co. v. Cotton, 140 Ill. 486, 29 N. E. 899; Wood v. Roxborough, etc., Pass. N. Co. (Pa.) 12 Montg. Co. Law Rep'r, 155.

A Mr. Johnson, who had formerly been a motorman in the employ of the Seattle Electric Company, was called as a witness on part of the respondent, and testified as to the proper method of stopping a car when on a grade such as the one on which the accident in question happened. On cross-examination he testified that he had been on the police force of the city of Seattle since he quit work for the Seattle Electric Company, but was dismissed therefrom because of certain charges which were preferred against him. He was asked what the charges were, and declined to answer. The question was repeated, when an objection was interposed, which the court sustained. It is claimed that this was error, but we think the ruling proper. The witness was being questioned on a collateral matter, which could affect only his credibility generally, not his credibility as a witness to the particular fact under consideration, or as a witness in the particular case. When such is the fact, a witness may decline to answer questions whose only purpose is to degrade him, or expose him to disgrace or infamy. That such was the purpose of this question cannot, of course, be gainsaid.

It is finally insisted that the amount of recovery is excessive, notwithstanding the reduction made by the trial judge. But we have examined the evidence on this question, and see no sufficient reason for a further reduction.

The judgment is affirmed.

1. PLEADING—AMENDMENT—DAMAGES.

Where, in a personal injury action, general damages were claimed, both in the complaint and on the hearing, in addition to special damages, though no designated amount was claimed as general damages other than that the demand for relief stated a sum larger than the total set out as special damages, it was proper to allow plaintiffs to amend, after both sides had rested, by specifying the particular amount demanded, where plaintiffs offered evidence of general damages without objection, and where the cause was tried as if upon sufficient pleadings. [Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 39, Pleading, §§ 642-664.]

Appeal from Superior Court, King County; Arthur E. Griffin, Judge.

Personal injury action by W. S. Lobb and wife against the Seattle, Renton & Southern Railway Company. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Sachs & Hale, for appellant. Aust & Terhune, for respondents.

FULLERTON, J. The appellant owns and operates an electric railway between the city of Seattle and the town of Renton, in King county. On November 2, 1906, the respondent Annie Lobb took passage on one of the appellant's cars at Renton, intending to ride to the city of Seattle. On the way the car for some cause left the track and turned partially over, throwing the respondent with considerable violence across the car, causing injuries for which she sued in this action. The jury returned a verdict in her favor, and from the judgment entered thereon, the railway company appeals.

It is first assigned that the court erred in allowing the respondents to amend their complaint at the close of the evidence after each side had rested. In their complaint the appellants alleged both general and special damages. The claims for special damage were itemized, and the amount of each item specially stated. There was no designated amount claimed as general damages other than that the demand for relief stated a sum considerably in excess of the total set out in the complaint as special damages. The amendment sought and allowed was to add to that paragraph of the complaint describing the injuries received and their effect the words, "and plaintiffs have been damaged thereby in the sum of $1,547.75," a sum which, when taken with the special damages alleged, equaled the amount demanded in the complaint. When the amendment was tendered, the appellant objected, and, on its objection being overruled, it claimed to be surprised by the amendment, and stated that it was not prepared at that time to meet it with further evidence, but did not move for a continuance or time to produce further evidence. It is urged here that the prayer of the complaint is no part of the allegations of fact, and that all the appellant was entitled to recover under the complaint as it stood prior to the amendment was the amount of the special damages alleged, and that it was error on the part of the court to allow at that stage of the proceeding an amendment which would so materially increase the amount of permissible recovery. But we think this contention not well taken, even if it be assumed that the complaint as it originally stood only permitted a recovery of special damages. There was no objection interposed when the respondents offered evidence to sustain their claim of general damages, and as far as the record discloses the case would not have been tried differently had this clause put in by the amendment been in the original complaint; or, to state the fact in another way, the cause was tried as if upon sufficient pleadings. Where such is the case, amendments may be allowed to the pleadings at any stage of the proceedings; and, even this court in such cases, where no amendments have been offered or made, is obligated by statute to treat all amendments which could have been made as made, and try the cause upon its merits. Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St. § 8535. The case of Howells v. North American T. & T. Co., 24 Wash. 692, 64 Pac. 786, is not in point here. In that case the court instructed the jury that the plaintiff could recover for a specific item, although no damages were claimed on account thereof in the bill of particulars furnished the defendant by the plaintiff on the defendant's demand. That is not the case before us. Here general damages for the injury were at all times claimed, both in the complaint and on the hearing, the defect being that the complaint did not specify the particular amount demanded. The amendment was properly made, and the appellant suffered no prejudice thereby.

The question whether the respondent waived her right to rely on the presumption of negligence, arising from the fact that the car was derailed, by pleading and undertaking to prove the specific cause of the accident, is discussed and decided contrary to the appellant's contention in Walters v. Seattle, Renton & Southern Railway Co. (Wash.) 93 Pac. 419. We find no merit in the claim that the evidence does not justify the amount of the recovery.

The judgment is affirmed.

Action by Peter Gennelle against Alphonse Boulais and another. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

W. T. Beck and Alfred M. Craven, for appellant. G. V. Alexander and C. P. Bennett, for respondents.

RUDKIN, J. On the 19th day of April, 1905, a conditional sale agreement of the personal property now in controversy was entered into between one Lucile Ries and the defendant Boulais. The memorandum of sale recited: That the property should remain the absolute property of the vendor until after the full and complete payment of the purchase price of $2,500. That the purchase price should be paid as follows: $200 in cash, the receipt of which was acknowledged; $300 on June 15, 1905; $500 on August 15, 1905; $500 on October 15, 1905; $500 on December 15, 1905, and $500 on February 15, 1906. That the deferred payments were evidenced by promissory notes of even date, bearing interest at the rate of 6 per cent, per annum from date until paid. That the property should be at the risk of the vendee while in his possession, and that loss thereof or damage thereto should not extinguish or diminish liability on the notes given for the purchase price. That the property should be kept insured in a sufficient sum to save the vendor harmless, if possible. That possession was given on the date of sale. That in case default was made in the payment of the purchase-money notes, or either of them, principal or interest, as the same became due, the vendor was empowered to take possession of the property, with or without process of law, and that the contract should be forfeited and determined at the election of the vendor, and all sums theretofore paid by the vendee should be retained by the vendor as rental for the use of the property. On the 30th day of April, 1904, one William Graham filed a lien against the mill property described in the above memorandum of conditional sale for the sum of $385.13, and on the 31st day of May, 1904, an action was commenced in the superior court of Ferry county against the vendor Lucile Ries, and one F. A. Gardner to foreclose said lien, which action was still pending at the time of the commencement of this action. The purchaser Boulais had no actual notice of the lien claim or of the pendency of the foreclosure action until after the conditional sale contract was entered into. The purchase-money notes were all paid except the two notes for $500, each maturing on the 15th day of December, 1905, and the 15th day of February, 1906, respectively. On the 3d day of May, 1906, demand was made for payment of these two notes, but payment was refused, except conditionally. On the same day Ries transferred the property by bill of sale to the plaintiff, Gennelle, and the present action was instituted to recover possession of the property.

The only controverted fact in the case is whether an extension of time was given within which to make payment of the last two notes to mature; the respondent contending that the time for the payment of the note maturing December 15, 1905, was extended until February 15, 1906, and that the time for payment of the note maturing February 15, 1906, was extended until May, 1906, the appellant contending that no such extension was granted. For reasons to be presently stated the question of extension is not very material. In April, 1905, all the purchase-money notes were left with the British-American Trust Company of Grand Forks for collection. During the month of February, 1906, the respondent Boulais paid the amount of the note maturing December 15, 1905, to the trust company, with instructions to pay the same over to the payee upon receiving a deposit of a transfer of a clear title to the mill property, which would include a release or satisfaction of the Graham lien. On the 11th day of May, 1906, the amount of the last note was paid to the clerk of the superior court of Ferry county under like conditions and stipulations. It clearly appears from all the testimony that the respondents were ready and willing to make full payment of the purchase price long prior to the commencement of this action, provided the vendor would convey a clear title and procure a release or satisfaction of the Graham lien, but not otherwise. If, therefore, the respondents had a right to insist upon a release or satisfaction of this lien before making final payment, they were not in default at the time of the commencement of this action. But if they had no such right, they manifestly were in default, whether an extension of time for payment had been granted or not; for the first note was more than two months overdue, and no payment had been made or tendered, except conditionally. The question to be decided, therefore, resolves itself into this: Can a purchaser under a conditional contract of sale retain possession of the property and defend an action for possession on the ground that the title of his vendor is defective or encumbered? The appellant rests his case on the broad principle that a bailee, a tenant, or a purchaser will not be permitted to deny the title of his bailor, landlord, or vendor in an action to recover possession of the property bailed, leased, or sold. Within certain limits this rule is well established, but we do not think that it is applicable or controlling here. It fairly appears from the record that the appellant's vendor did not have what is termed a "marketable title" at the time a demand for the purchase price was made, or at the time of the commencement of this action, and this fact does not seem to be controverted; and we cannot lend our sanction to a rule of law which will permit a vendor to maintain an action of this kind, while himself in default, and when his default is the direct and proximate cause of the default on the part of the purchaser. A purchaser of personal property may maintain an action against his vendor for breach of warranty of title without returning or offering to return the property, or he may recoup his damages in an action for the purchase price. A purchaser of real property in possession may recoup his damages in the same manner in an action for the purchase price, or he may maintain an action for specific performance and obtain a reduction or abatement of the purchase price commensurate with any encumbrance on the property. We do not think that a vendee in possession of personal property should be deprived of these rights by a mere change in the form of action. In other words, we do not think that a vendor can tender an encumbered or doubtful title and demand full payment of the purchase price, thus driving the purchaser to his action to recover the purchase money paid, or to an action for damages for breach of warranty. The appellant concedes that the same rule applies to both real and personal property, and in Stein v. Waddell, 37 Wash. 634, 80 Pac. 184, this court held that a vendor in default could not maintain an action for the rescission of a contract for the sale of real property. The rule there announced is fully sustained by the authorities. Dennis v. Strassburger, 89 Cal. 583, 26 Pac. 1070. Whatever other remedy the appellant might have, the court below correctly ruled that he could not recover possession of the property for a default on the part of the purchaser, caused directly and primarily by the default of his own vendor.

The judgment of the court below is therefore affirmed.

STATE ex rel. BURROWS et ux. v. SUPERIOR COURT FOR CHEHALIS COUNTY et al.

(Supreme Court of Washington. Jan. 15, 1908.)

1. EMINENT DOMAIN—PETITION—DESCRIPTION OF PROPERTY—SUFFICIENCY.

A petition in a proceeding by a logging boom company to condemn private riparian rights sufficiently complied with Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St. § 5637, requiring petitions in condemnation proceedings to describe with reasonable certainty the property to be taken, where it alleged the facts, as to the existing and proposed construction of a boom, that the lands affected are contiguous to the river, and described them by reference to government surveys and recorded plats, and alleged that it would be necessary to occupy the river and interfere with defendants' rights of navigation and access to and from their lands and their appurtenant shore rights and privileges, by occupying with saw logs, etc., the part of the river in front of their lands, etc.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 18, Eminent Domain, §§ 509-518.]

2. SAME — CONDEMNATION OF INSUFFICIENT PROPERTY—EFFECT.

Where enforcement of decrees enjoining a logging boom company from interfering with private riparian rights has been stayed, pending the prosecution of proceedings to condemn such rights, the owners may not complain of decrees in such proceedings adjudging a public use because the company is not condemning sufficient property to enable it to transact business without using additional property of such owners not sought to be taken, since they may enforce their rights adjudicated in the injunction suits, if invaded without compensation.

3. SAME.

A riparian owner's shore rights and rights to access to and from his land and to navigation of the part of the river adjoining his land are property rights, and subject as such to condemnation for public use, without appropriation of the land itself.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 18, Eminent Domain, §§ 94-96.]

4. SAME—LOGGING RIGHTS.

Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St. § 4379, requires a logging boom company to file with the state a plat or survey of so much of the shore lines of the waters of the state and lands contiguous thereto as are proposed to be appropriated, such plat to be made from United States records, etc. Held that, though a slough connecting with a river is not a part of the river as meandered by the governmental survey, from which such a company made its plat, it is subject to condemnation by the company, where it appears to be within contiguous lands included in the plat.

5. SAME—PRIOR ATTEMPT TO PURCHASE—NECESSITY FOR.

A logging boom company is not prevented from condemning riparian rights for failing to first attempt to purchase such rights, where the owners denied the company's right to take them.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 18, Eminent Domain, § 462.]

6. SAME—LOGGING—PUBLIC USE.

That no logging is done on a river except by a company in which the stockholders are identified with those of a boom company does not show, in proceedings by the boom company to condemn riparian rights, that condemnation is not sought for a public use, but for a private purpose.

Certiorari, on the relation of O. P. Burrows and others, to review preliminary decrees of the superior court of Chehalis county adjudging a public use in condemnation proceedings by Grays Harbor Boom Company against the relators. Affirmed.

J. C. Cross, A. Emerson Cross, Bogle & Spooner, and J. W. Robinson, for relators. Ben Sheeks and J. B. Bridges, for respondents.

CROW, J. On March 28, 1907, the Grays Harbor Boom Company, a corporation, instituted in the superior court of Chehalis county three separate proceedings to condemn certain property rights, the first being against O. P. Burrows and wife, the second against J. O. P. Lowsdale and wife and Ladd & Tilton, and the third against F. K. Hiscock. After preliminary decrees were entered adjudging a public use, all of the defendants, upon stipulation, applied to this court in this one proceeding for a writ of certiorari, and the writ having been issued, the decrees are now before us for final review.

The respondent, the Grays Harbor Boom Company, was incorporated under the laws of Washington in 1893, with authority to conduct a booming business in the Humptulips river and elsewhere. Within the statutory time it filed in the office of the Secretary of State a plat or survey of so much of the shore lines of the waters of the Humptulips river and lands contiguous thereto as it proposed to appropriate, and without unreasonable delay proceeded to construct and operate a boom. Thereafter the relators, claiming it was interfering with certain of their private property rights as riparian owners, instituted equitable actions to enjoin such interference. Decrees in their favor were affirmed in Burrows v. Grays Harbor Boom Company (Wash.) 87 Pac. 937, Lownsdale v. Grays Harbor Boom Company (Wash.) 87 Pac. 943, and Hiscock v. Grays Harbor Boom Company (Wash.) 87 Pac. 943. Later this court, upon motion, entered orders staying enforcement of the several decrees until the respondent could institute and prosecute condemnation proceedings. The Humptulips river, which empties into Grays Harbor, is, for a distance of three miles above its mouth, subject to a tidal flow, which reaches and passes the lands of relators. Within the Lownsdale lands is a navigable tide-water slough, known as "Jessie's slough," connecting with the river, which the respondent has used, and is now using, in its booming operations. It alleges that its boom commences about the middle of the river near the southern boundary of Lownsdale's land, and extends northerly, occupying that portion of the stream lying between its center and the west bank; that the Jessie slough, which is not meandered, connects with the west side of the river, and is practically included in the boom; that the occupancy and use of the slough is necessary for receiving, storing, and sorting logs, which will interfere with its navigation; that in so using the slough it will be necessary for servants of the boom company to also use 10 feet of its westerly bank by walking thereon when handling, driving, booming, and sorting logs, such use of the west bank not to be exclusive, but concurrent with that of the owners of the land.

The evidence shows that at the time of the hearing the upper end of the boom as then constructed was immediately below the land of the relators Burrows and wife; that the United States government had granted the respondent permission to extend its boom further up the river past the Burrows land, leaving for navigation an open channel of 50 feet in width on the Hiscock or easterly side of the river; that the respondent was at the time perfecting arrangements to so extend its boom; that the purpose of such extension is to aid navigation; that heretofore logs coming down the river on freshets, in great quantities, not controlled by the respondent, would first fill the boom, and then back up and fill the upper channel of the river opposite the lands of Burrows on the west and Hiscock on the east, and that the boom, when extended and enlarged, will avoid this difficulty, by receiving all logs and timber products, and permitting the eastern channel of the river to remain open for navigation to the width of 50 feet. By these proposed extensions and improvements respondent is endeavoring to avoid any continuance of the acts enjoined in Burrows v. Grays Harbor Boom Company, and the other cases above mentioned, and it contends that such riparian and property rights of the relators as it will hereafter need it is now seeking to condemn.

As against the relators Lownsdale and wife and Ladd & Tilton respondent asks that it be permitted to condemn and appropriate the right to occupy with saw logs and other timber products that portion of the river which is between its westerly bank and the boom, also to interfere with the relator's shore rights and right of access to and from their lands, and to appropriate the right to occupy the whole of the waters of the slough within their lands, together with a right of way along its westerly bank as above mentioned. As against the relators Burrows and wife, respondent asks that it be permitted to appropriate and condemn the right to occupy with saw logs and other timber products that portion of the Humptulips river opposite their lands, and the right to interfere by so doing with their right of navigation of that portion of the river so occupied, with their right of access to and from their lands, and with their appurtenant shore rights and privileges. As against the relator Hiscock it asks that it be permitted to appropriate and condemn the right to occupy the waters of the river with logs and other timber products consigned to it where the river borders upon his land, and the right to interfere with his right of navigation and access to and from his lands, and his appurtenant shore rights and privileges.

The relators' first contention is that the preliminary decrees are void, or at least erroneous, for the reason that the descriptions of the property sought to be taken are too indefinite within the requirements of the eminent domain statute. Section 5637, Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St. The petitions, after alleging the facts as to the present and proposed construction of the boom, further allege that the lands of the several relators are contiguous to the river. They describe the lands by reference to government surveys and public plats now of record, and then allege that it will be necessary for respondent to occupy the river and interfere with shore rights and privileges of the several relators appurtenant to said lands, as above mentioned. Respondent thus seeks to condemn certain definite rights with which it must necessarily interfere, but asks no other property of the relators Burrows and Hiscock. In other words, it does not seek to take any of their lands by metes and bounds, but only certain private shore rights and privileges appurtenant thereto. As against the Lownsdales it further seeks to condemn certain rights in the Jessie slough and upon its west bank, which are set forth in the petition and decree. The descriptions are sufficient to identify the property rights sought to be taken and to meet the requirements of the statute.

The relators further contend that the respondent is seeking to condemn limited rights and easements which when taken will be insufficient to enable it to transact its business as a public service corporation without using additional property of the relators not sought to be appropriated. We fail to understand how the respondents' alleged failure to condemn sufficient property for its public needs can afford the relators any ground of complaint. The record shows that the respondent is endeavoring to appropriate such property rights as it thinks it will need in its corporate business, so that it may use the same without disobeying the injunction decrees. That it might do so the enforcement of those decrees was temporarily suspended by orders of this court, which orders of suspension will become inoperative upon the final determination of these condemnation proceedings. Respondent will then act at its peril if it interferes with any property or rights of the relators, protected by the injunctions, but not appropriated. The relators' rights have been heretofore adjudicated in their equitable actions, and upon the final determination of these condemnation proceedings they will be at liberty to immediately enforce and protect such of their property rights as may be thereafter illegally invaded by the respondent. The condemnation will only authorize it to use property legally appropriated. The injunctions were granted in the equitable actions, because it appeared that the respondent was taking and damaging certain private property rights of the relators without just compensation, in direct violation of section 16, article 1, of the state Constitution. The respondent contends that it is now endeavoring to proceed in strict compliance with the Constitution, the eminent domain statute, and the injunctive decrees, and it should be permitted to do so without being required to condemn, at the relators' instance, lands which it insists it will neither need nor use. If respondent is not proceeding in good faith (a condition not yet appearing), the relators will be afforded ample protection when its bad faith or wrongful acts shall assume substantial form. The relators' riparian rights and interests here involved have been adjudicated to be property rights, which we now hold to be subject to condemnation for public use. This holding is in harmony with principles announced in the following cases pertaining to rights of a somewhat kindred nature: Hatch v. Tacoma, Olympia & Grays Harbor R. Co., 6 Wash. 1, 32 Pac. 1063; New Whatcom v. Fairhaven Land Co., 24 Wash. 493, 64 Pac.

735, 54 L. R. A. 190; State ex rel. Smith v. Superior Court, 26 Wash. 278, 66 Pac. 385; Seattle Transfer Co. v. Seattle, 27 Wash. 520, 68 Pac. 90; State ex rel. Smith v. Superior Court, 30 Wash. 219, 70 Pac. 484. Mr. Lewis, in the second edition of his work on Eminent Domain, at section 56, says: "If property, then, consists, not in tangible things themselves, but in certain rights in and appurtenant to those things, it follows that, when a person is deprived of any of these rights, he is to that extent deprived of his property, and hence, that his property may be taken, in the constitutional sense, though his title and possession remain undisturbed; and it may be laid down as a general proposition, based upon the nature of property itself, that, whenever the lawful rights of an individual to the possession, use, or enjoyment of his land are in any degree abridged or destroyed by reason of the exercise of the power of eminent domain, his property is, pro tanto, taken, and he is entitled to compensation." If riparian rights, right of access, right of light and air, and other kindred, intangible rights appurtenant to real estate, are property, they are certainly such property, and such an interest in real estate, as an owner would be entitled to alienate, thereby conveying an easement. If such rights may be conveyed, we see no reason why they may not, under the right of eminent domain, be condemned, when necessary, for public use, without an appropriation of the actual land itself.

The relators further contend that the respondent is not seeking to condemn the westerly bank of the river, although it will necessarily be used as a retaining wall for the boom, and that for this reason it should not be permitted to proceed, unless it seeks to appropriate the bank and a portion of their lands also. The respondent insists that it does not intend to use any private property of relators in the banks of the river; that although the banks may at times hold logs in the boom, they also hold the water in the river which floats the logs; that such use of the banks and the water is a necessary incident to the public rights of navigation to which respondent is entitled under the statutes of this state; and that it will only use the banks in the same manner that any other person will use them in navigation. As heretofore suggested, the relators will sustain no loss if the respondent fails to condemn sufficient property rights for its public use. As to the relators Lownsdale and wife and Ladd & Tilton it is contended that the map of location, filed by the respondent with the Secretary of State does not show the Jessie slough as being within the property which it then intended to appropriate, and that it cannot now condemn the same, or any rights therein. The map was made from the government field notes taken from the office of the Surveyor General. These field notes do not, nor does the government survey, show the existence of the slough. The evidence shows that the slough was not meandered, and that the present physical location of the river itself does not exactly correspond with the government field notes and survey which have been made for more than 50 years. Section 4379, Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St., requires a boom company, within 90 days after its articles of incorporation have been filed, to file in the office of the Secretary of State a plat or survey of so much of the shore lines of the waters of the state and lands contiguous thereto as are proposed to be appropriated; such plat to be made from the records in the United States Surveyor General's office of this state, or by a competent surveyor subsequent to an actual survey. This plat was made from the records in the Surveyor General's office. It not only shows the stream as meandered by the original field notes, but also shows the relators' and other lands contiguous thereto. If it be conceded that the slough is not a part of the river as meandered, and shown by the original government survey and field notes, it is as shown by the evidence actually within the lands of Lowndale and wife, which are included in the plat and are therefore subject to condemnation. The relators contend that, by these condemnation proceedings, as prosecuted, the respondent is endeavoring to entirely close the river from navigation, in violation of the statutes of the United States and the permit granted to respondent by the United States government that the appropriation thus attempted should not be decreed by the courts of this state, and that any such judicial action would constitute an attempted grant of judicial authority to respondent, permitting it to maintain a public nuisance in the navigable waters of the state. The evidence does not sustain this contention. It has been shown that the respondent, by the extension of its boom now being made under permission of the United States government, will be enabled to, and will, keep open for navigation a channel of 50 feet in width on the easterly side of the river, and that it is now seeking to appropriate property rights of the relators as above mentioned to aid it in carrying out that purpose. There is no merit in another suggestion made by the relators that the respondent cannot condemn because it did not, prior to the commencement of these proceedings, endeavor to obtain by purchase the rights and privileges it now seeks to appropriate. The evidence shows that such endeavors were made by respondent; but, even though the contrary appeared, yet the position of the relators in this proceeding will not permit them to now present any such objection. State ex rel. Skamanla Boom Co. v. Superior Court (Wash.) 91 Pac. 637.

Relators further contend that the respondent is not seeking to condemn for a public use, but for a private purpose. They base this contention on the proposition that no logging is being done upon the stream except by a certain other corporation in which the stockholders are identical with those of the respondent corporation. The evidence does not sustain this contention, which in any event is without merit, as shown by the opinion in State ex rel. Wilson v. Superior Court (Wash.) 92 Pac. 269, recently rendered by this court.

The relators further contend that no public necessity for the condemnation has been shown. Without discussing the evidence in detail, all of which we have carefully read and considered, we will state that it is amply sufficient to sustain the finding of the trial court that such public necessity does exist. The foregoing discussion substantially covers all controlling points presented by the relators. We will, however, state that, having examined the entire record, together with all the assignments of error made and discussed in the briefs, we are unable to find that the trial court has committed any prejudicial error.

The judgments are affirmed.

STATE ex rel. BURROWS et ux. v. SUPERIOR COURT FOR CHEHALIS COUNTY et al.

(Supreme Court of Washington. Jan. 15, 1908.)
EMINENT DOMAIN—RIPARIAN RIGHTS—STATUTES CONSTRUED.

Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St. § 4388, authorizes log driving companies to condemn "shore rights or other property" upon rivers. Section 4390 provides that when remonstrances are legally made and filed such a company may not take "lands or sloughs" within territory owned by the remonstrators. Held that, though lands or sloughs may not be condemned as against sufficient remonstrances, such companies may condemn the right to create and use artificial freshets past lands, without regard to remonstrances.

Certiorari on the relation of O. P. Burrows and wife, to review a preliminary decree of the superior court for Chehalis county adjudging a public use in a condemnation proceeding by the Hump-tulls Driving Company against relators. Affirmed.

J. W. Robinson, for relators. Ben Sheeks and J. B. Bridges, for respondents.

CROW, J. On March 28, 1907, the Hump-tulls Driving Company, a corporation, instituted in the superior court of Chehalis county proceedings to condemn certain property rights of O. P. Burrows and Alice Burrows, his wife. After the entry of a preliminary decree adjudging a public use, the defendants applied to this court for a writ of certiorari, and the writ having been issued, the decree is now before us for review.

The application herein was made to this court at the same time a like application was made in State ex rel. O. P. Burrows v. Superior Court of Chehalis County (No. 6,853) 93 Pac. 423, in which we have this day affirmed all assignments of error made in that proceeding are repeated here, and we will in this opinion only consider one point not then presented. The respondent, the Humptulips Driving Company, was organized under "An act to provide for the organization and incorporation of companies for clearing out and improving rivers and streams in this state, and for the purpose of driving, sorting, holding, and delivering logs and other timber products thereon," etc. Chapter 72, p. 128, Sess. Laws 1895; sections 4386-4394, Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St. In its petition the respondent alleged that within the statutory time it filed its plat as required by section 4387, Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St., showing shore lines of waters of the Humptulips river in Chehalis county, and lands contiguous thereto, proposed to be appropriated; that it has erected, maintained, and is now operating in the Humptulips river and its tributaries, many miles above the lands of the relators, certain splash dams for creating artificial freshets to aid it in driving saw logs and other timber products into a boom near the mouth of the river; that the relators own certain described tracts of land contiguous to and bordering upon the west banks of the Humptulips river; that it is at times necessary for respondent to create artificial freshets by means of its splash dams; and that it is also necessary for it to condemn and appropriate as against the relators the right to create such artificial freshets in so far as their private riparian rights may be affected, and also the right to drive saw logs down the river by means of such artificial freshets. The respondent had been operating upon the river for a number of years, when the relators instituted an equitable action against it and the Grays Harbor Boom Company to enjoin them from interfering with the relators' riparian rights, and secured an injunction decree, which was affirmed by this court in Burrows v. Grays Harbor Boom Company (Wash.) 87 Pac. 937. Thereupon the respondent, the Humptulips Driving Company, instituted condemnation proceedings in which it now seeks to appropriate the right to create artificial freshets past the lands of the relators to the extent that such freshets may interfere with their riparian rights and to drive saw logs on such freshets, contending, however, that it does not intend to take or flood any of their contiguous lands.

The relators answered, alleging that the Humptulips river was and is affected by the tide for a distance of about three miles above its mouth, and past their lands; that within the time fixed by section 4390, Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St., the relators and others being then owners of more than one-half of the lands lying alongside and abutting that portion of the Humptulips river affected by the tide, filed in the office of the auditor of Chehalis county their written remonstrances against the respondent's contemplated improvement of that portion of the river affected by the tide; and that the respondent is therefore estopped from making the appropriation it now asks. The evidence shows that this remonstrance was signed by owners of more than one-half of the lands contiguous to that portion of the river affected by the tide but that it was not signed by owners of one-half of the lands contiguous to the entire river, or to that portion of the river used by the respondent, and which it has improved or now seeks to improve. The contention of the relators for an estoppel is based upon section 4390, Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St., reading as follows: "Such corporation shall have power and is hereby authorized, in any of the rivers and streams of this state, or the dividing waters thereof, to remove jams, roots, snags and rocks, improve and straighten the channel, build wing dams and sheer booms, construct dams with gates or otherwise for the purpose of storing water with which to produce artificial freshets, and in all ways to improve such streams and rivers for the purposes herein mentioned and contemplated: * * * Provided, however, that whenever the owners of more than one-half the land lying alongside or abutting on any stream affected by the tide, proposed to be improved according to this act, shall file with the board of county commissioners of the county in which said river is situated a remonstrance against any improvements of so much of the stream as is affected by the tide, it shall then be unlawful for any corporation to take the land or any slough within the territory owned by any such remonstrances: Provided, That such remonstrance shall be filed with said board within fifteen days from the filing of said plat."

The evidence shows that portions of the Humptulips river are about 250 feet in width; that the respondent's splash dams are respectively 14, 25, and 30 miles above the relators' lands; that the stream is floatable for logs during certain seasons of the year at times of natural freshets, and with the aid of artificial freshets at other times; and that there is a vast amount of tributary timber dependent upon its use for being carried to market. What effect do the remonstrances filed and pleaded have in this case? Must the statute be so construed as to hold that such remonstrances will prevent any condemnation of the right to create and use artificial freshets in the stream past relators' lands? Section 4388, Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St., confers upon the respondent the right to acquire by condemnation, if necessary, land, shore rights or other property upon the river. Section 4390, above quoted, provides that, when the remonstrances are legally made and filed, it shall be unlawful for the driving company to take lands or sloughs within territory owned by the remonstrancers. Con-strung these two sections of the same act together, it is evident that the Legislature intended to distinguish lands and sloughs from shore rights and other property, and that, while lands or sloughs may not be taken as against the remonstrances, the statute does not make it unlawful to take shore rights or other property subject to appropriation. The respondent is not attempting to appropriate any land, but seeks only to interfere with the relators' riparian rights by creating artificial freshets in the river, thus interfering with the natural flow of the water, without flooding or taking their contiguous lands. The respondent contends that under the statute it is necessary for the remonstrances to be signed by the owners of more than one-half of all lands abutting the river above, as well as along that portion affected by the tide. While there is merit in this contention, we do not find it necessary to pass upon the same; for, assuming without deciding that the remonstrances are sufficient, and that they need only be signed by the owners of one-half of the land abutting that portion of the river affected by the tide, yet the relators' plea of estoppel must fail, as the respondent is not appropriating any land or slough owned by them. The statutory authority to appropriate shore rights and other property of the relators is not affected by the remonstrances, and under that authority respondent now seeks and is entitled to condemn the right to create artificial freshets. No part of relators' lands will be taken, and it is not contended that the driving company is attempting to violate the statute by taking any slough.

The judgment is affirmed.

TERGESON v. ROBINSON MFG. CO.

(Supreme Court of Washington. Jan. 15, 1908.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT—DEFECTIVE APPLIANCES—NEGLIGENCE—QUESTIONS FOR JURY.

Whether a guard on a machine had become defective and out of repair, and whether its want of repair was the proximate cause of injuries to an employé operating the machine, and whether the employer was negligent in permitting the guard to remain out of repair, held, the evidence being conflicting, for the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 34, Master and Servant, §§ 1001-1050.]

2. SAME—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—QUESTIONS FOR JURY.

Whether an employé injured while operating a machine was guilty of contributory negligence, held for the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 34, Master and Servant, §§ 1089-1132.]

3. SAME—FAILURE OF EMPLOYER TO WARN AND INSTRUCT EMPLOYÉ—NEGLIGENCE.

One who employs a youth, without experience, to operate a planing machine provided with top, bottom, and side heads, equipped with knives, must instruct and warn the employé, and a failure so to do is negligence.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 34, Master and Servant, §§ 314-316.]

4. SAME—QUESTION FOR JURY.

Where, in an action for injuries to an employé while operating a planing machine, the evidence was conflicting whether the employer had instructed and warned the employé, the issue was for the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 34, Master and Servant, §§ 1044-1050.]

5. APPEAL—INSTRUCTIONS—REVIEW.

Where the transcript on appeal shows that a written request setting forth the instructions desired was made and filed with the clerk, and the statement of facts shows the instructions given and exceptions to those given and refused, an instruction formally requested in writing, and filed with the clerk, is under 2 Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St. § 5004, a part of the record, and the refusal to give it is reviewable, though it is not included in the statement of facts.

6. TRIAL—QUESTIONS FOR JURY—WITHDRAWAL OF ISSUE.

Where, in an action for injuries to an employé while operating a machine, the complaint charged that the employer was negligent in failing to provide a proper belt shifter, in permitting a guard to become and remain out of repair, and in failing to instruct and warn the employé, and there was no evidence that the insufficiency of the belt shifter had anything to do with the accident, the refusal to charge that it was immaterial, whether the belt shifter was or was not a proper shifter, was erroneous.

7. APPEAL—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where, in an action for injuries to an employé operating a machine, there was no evidence that the insufficiency of a belt shifter had anything to do with the accident, the error in refusing to charge that it was immaterial whether the belt shifter was or was not a proper appliance for its intended purpose was not cured by a charge that if the employer did not provide a proper belt shifter, and the failure so to do caused the injuries complained of, the employer was negligent, as it submitted an issue not authorized by the evidence tending to confuse the jury.

Appeal from Superior Court, Snohomish County; J. A. Coleman, Judge, pro tem.

Action by Pearl Terjeson, by Soren Terjeson, his guardian ad litem, against the Robinson Manufacturing Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed, and remanded for new trial.

Cooley & Horan, for appellant. Frank C. Park and Wilshire & Kenaga, for respondent.

CROW, J. This action, which has heretofore been in this court (43 Wash. 298, 86 Pac. 578), was commenced by Pearl Terjeson, by Soren Terjeson, his guardian ad litem, against Robinson Manufacturing Company, a corporation, to recover damages for personal injuries. From a judgment in plaintiff's favor, the defendant has appealed.

The respondent, an employé of appellant, was injured on March 2, 1905, while running lattice through a sticker or planing machine, which machine was provided with top, bottom, and side heads, equipped with knives. The lattice material was passed through feed rolls to the lower and upper knives, and thence out of the machine to the rear. A long pole was provided as a belt shifter. It was placed on top of the machine, one end being within easy reach of the operator, and the other end resting in a notch to the rear of the belt and countershaft. In this position it served to retain the belt on the fixed pulley. Near the center of the machine the pole rested between a set screw and an iron casting, which served as a fulcrum when shifting the belt. To stop the machine the operator pulled down the front end of the pole to raise the further end from the notch, drew the pole towards him, pushed it back on the opposite side of the belt, and then, by using the pole as a lever, shifted the belt on to a movable pulley. To start the machine this method was reversed. The heads and knives were located near the center of the machine to the rear of the feed rolls. An iron hood, which could be raised and lowered, was located immediately over the upper head to safeguard the knives. The respondent had on previous occasions fed larger material into this same machine, but his regular employment was to feed moulding into a smaller machine. About closing time on the evening preceding the accident appellant's foreman ordered the respondent to feed lattice material into the larger machine. He did so, and continued the same work about one hour the next morning. The lattice material was crossgrained, which caused one piece to break. This broken piece passed the feed rolls and lower head, but clogged the top head, and extended about 10 inches to the rear above a pressure bar. Respondent stopped the feed rolls, and, without shutting down the machine, attempted to remove the broken lattice by pulling it towards the rear, when it was caught by the top head and drawn back so forcibly and quickly as to carry his hand against the knives. The respondent alleged that the appellant was guilty of negligence, (1) in failing to provide a proper belt shifter; (2) in permitting the hood to become old, battered, and out of repair, so that it did not properly perform the functions of a guard; and (3) in failing to properly instruct respondent, an inexperienced minor, as to the duties and dangers incident to his work. The appellant pleaded assumption of risk and contributory negligence.

Appellant by its several assignments in substance contends that the trial court erred (1) in denying its motion for judgment non obstante verdicto, and (2) in refusing to give instructions requested. In support of the first contention it insists that no failure to instruct respondent or warn him of dangers was shown, sufficient to constitute negligence. We have read the entire record, and conclude that the evidence on this issue was so conflicting as to necessitate its submission to the jury. Appellant further contends that no liability on its part was shown, arising out of any alleged defect in the hood, and that it affirmatively appears that such pretended defect was not a proximate cause of the accident. While it was conceded by the respondent that the hood as originally constructed was a proper safeguard, it was contended by him, and he produced evidence tending to show, that it had been permitted to become out of repair, that it was battered and worn to such an extent that instead of remaining in a firm and fixed position when lowered over the top head it would on being struck move against the knives, that when struck by appellant's hand it did so move, that instead of being a guard it permitted his hand to be carried against the knives, and that no such result would have occurred had it been in good repair. The evidence on this issue was in such direct conflict that it was for the jury to determine whether the hood had become an insufficient guard, whether it was by reason of want of repair a proximate cause of the accident, and whether the appellant was guilty of negligence in permitting it to remain and be used in such condition. Appellant further contends that the evidence conclusively shows the respondent was guilty of contributory negligence in attempting to remove the broken piece of lattice without stopping the knives. There was evidence tending to show that respondent, although a minor, had a limited experience on this and other machines, and he testified that he knew he could not have been hurt had he stopped the machine. Yet there was evidence tending to show that he did not realize the danger of removing the lattice without stopping the machine, that he did not know it would run back into the knives instead of passing on towards the rear, that such knowledge would only come with experience, that lattice material when crossgrained was more liable to break than heavier material such as flooring or ceiling, that he had not previously run any lattice into this or any other machine, and that he had not been instructed by the appellant or any other person as to the danger to which he subjected himself in attempting to remove the lattice without stopping the machine. If respondent had been an experienced employé of mature years, he might possibly, under the evidence before us, be held guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law; but, in view of his youth, the surrounding circumstances, and the conflicting evidence, it became in this case a question of fact for the jury to determine whether he did realize or ought to have realized the danger to which he was subjected, and was guilty of contributory negligence. Upon the evidence before us we cannot hold him guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law. Kirby v. Wheeler-Osgood Co., 42 Wash. 610, 85 Pac. 62. It was appellant's duty to properly instruct and warn respondent. This it contends was done, not only by its foreman, but also by respondent's father. Appellant's alleged failure to perform this duty would be negligence. The evidence on this issue was conflicting, and properly submitted to the jury.

The appellant in writing requested an instruction withdrawing from the jury all evidence as to the defective condition of the hood, contending that such alleged defective condition had nothing whatever to do with the accident, and was not a proximate cause thereof. Under the issues and the evidence above discussed this instruction was properly refused, and the assignment of error which appellant has predicated on such refusal cannot be sustained.

Appellant in writing requested the trial court to instruct the jury as follows: "You are instructed that one of the grounds of negligence charged by the plaintiff herein against the defendant is that said defendant maintained a machine upon which plaintiff was injured without any proper belt shifter for starting and stopping such machine. Upon this branch of the case you are instructed that there is no evidence showing or tending to show that plaintiff received his injury as the proximate result of a failure on the part of defendant to maintain a proper belt shifter. You are therefore instructed that it is immaterial in determining this case whether the belt shifter maintained upon this machine was or was not a proper shifter, and you will not take that matter into consideration in arriving at your verdict." Appellant now contends that the trial court erred in refusing this instruction. The respondent has moved to strike appellant's requested instructions from the transcript, for the reason that they have not been made a part of the record by being included in any statement of facts. He contends that instructions, whether requested or given, must for the purpose of predicated error thereon be brought to this court in a statement of facts, and not in any other manner. The transcript shows that a written request setting forth the instructions desired was made by appellant and filed with the clerk. The statement of facts shows the instructions actually given, and appellant's exceptions to those given and refused. An instruction formally requested in writing and filed with the clerk is a part of the record. 2 Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St. § 5064. The motion to strike is denied. The refusal of the trial court to give the requested instruction last mentioned constituted prejudicial error. There is an utter absence of evidence showing or tending to show that the alleged insufficiency of the belt shifter was a proximate cause of the accident, or that it had anything whatever to do with it. If respondent had been injured while attempting to use the appliance provided, then the question of its sufficiency or insufficiency would have been an issue in this case to be submitted to the jury. We are utterly unable to understand how the character of the appliance became material. The respondent testified that he had repeatedly used it as a belt shifter, with complete success. True he said that by reason of certain conditions the pole sometimes had a tendency to strike him on the breast, but he further testified that he received no injury, and substantially admitted that it was not at all dangerous. It affirmatively appeared that neither he nor any other appellant's employees complained of its insufficiency. He made no attempt to use the belt shifter at the time of the accident, although he could have successfully stopped the machine by its use had he desired to do so. At respondent's request the trial court did in substance instruct the jury that, if they should find from the evidence that the appellant did not provide and maintain in use proper belt shifters or other mechanical contrivances for throwing the belts on and off the pulleys which operated the machine, and that the failure so to do caused the injury complained of, such failure constituted negligence upon the part of appellant. This instruction does not cure the error above mentioned, as it submits an issue not authorized by the evidence, tending to confuse the jury. Had the jury, in answer to special interrogatories, found (1) that the appellant had not failed to properly instruct or warn the respondent, (2) that it had performed its duty in furnishing a proper safeguard for the top head of the machine, but (3) that the belt shifter was not a proper appliance for the purpose for which it was intended, a general verdict for respondent upon the evidence before us would not be permitted to stand. Yet we are unable to say that the jury did not reach its verdict in this manner. For aught that appears the general verdict may have been based solely upon the alleged defective character of the belt shifter, notwithstanding the fact that it had absolutely nothing to do with the accident, and was not the proximate cause of the injury sustained.

Having carefully considered all the contentions made by the appellant, we conclude that no prejudicial error was committed by the trial court in any instance other than the one above mentioned, in refusing appellant's requested instruction as to the belt shifter, for which error the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

BARCLAY v. PUGET SOUND LUMBER CO.
(Supreme Court of Washington. Jan. 15, 1908.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT—EXISTENCE OF RELATION—INDEPENDENT CONTRACTOR.

Where defendant operated a lathmill through a contract with T., by which T. was to receive 75 cents per 1,000 lath produced, and was to employ other men, whom defendant was to pay out of the 75 cents per 1,000, T. to receive the balance, if any, and plaintiff was employed by T. to work in the mill, T. was not an independent contractor, but an agent of defendant acting in its behalf, and the relation of master and servant existed between plaintiff and defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 34, Master and Servant, § 5.]

2. SAME—ACTIONS FOR INJURIES—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE—GUARDING MACHINERY—PRACTICABILITY.

In an action by a servant for personal injuries received from a saw of a lath trimmer, evidence that the saw could have been effectively and practicably guarded by the use of a certain attachment is proper, in view of the factory act requiring the maintenance of reasonable safe guards for saws if they can be practicably guarded; irrespective of whether such attachment was in general use, or generally known to millmen.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 34, Master and Servant, §§ 920, 921.]

3. SAME—QUESTIONS FOR JURY.

Whether a master has exercised reasonable care and prudence in protecting dangerous machinery, as required by the factory act, is ordinarily a question for the jury, and in an action for injuries to a servant from a saw of a lath trimmer, where there is a substantial conflict in the evidence as to whether the saw was properly guarded or could be practicably guarded, those issues should be determined by the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 34, Master and Servant, §§ 1010-1050.]

4. SAME—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE—MATTERS NOT IN ISSUE.

In an action by a servant for injuries where there was no issue as to whether the saws used on a lath trimmer were larger than necessary, or less safe than smaller saws, evidence as to the master's trying smaller saws is immaterial.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 34, Master and Servant, §§ 861-876.]

5. TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—CONSTRUCTION AS A WHOLE.

Though certain portions of instructions would be objectionable as abstract propositions of law, there is no error, if in the connection in which they are used they are so limited in their application that they could not mislead the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 46, Trial, §§ 703-717.]

6. DAMAGES—EXCESSIVE DAMAGES—LOSS OF FINGERS.

A verdict for $5,000 for the loss of two front fingers of the right hand is excessive.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 15, Damages, §§ 372, 379.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Pierce County; W. O. Chapman, Judge.

Action by Andrew Barclay against the Puget Sound Lumber Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Remanded, with directions.

F. D. Oakley, for appellant. Govnor Teats, for respondent.

FULLERTON, J. The respondent, while employed in the appellant's mill, cut his hand on one of the saws of a lath trimmer on which he was working, and brought this action to recover damages therefor. He based his cause of action on the contention that the saw on which he was injured was not guarded as required by the factory act. On the trial the jury returned a verdict in his favor, assessing his damages in the sum of $5,000. From the judgment entered on the verdict, this appeal is taken.

The first assignment is that the court erred in overruling the demurrer to the complaint. The third and fourth paragraphs of the complaint were as follows:

"(3) That on the 6th day of February, 1906, the said defendant was operating the said lathmill by and through a certain contract made by said defendant with one Robert S. Tillman, at 75 cents per 1,000 lath produced, wherein the said Robert S. Tillman was to employ the other men at work in said lathmill, and the said defendant was to pay the said employes so employed by the said Tillman out of the said 75 cents per 1,000 any and all wages due them in the operation of the said lathmill, and the said Tillman, in consideration of his employment, was to receive the balance and residue, if any, computing at the rate of 75 cents per 1,000 lath produced.

"(4) That on the 6th day of February, 1906, the plaintiff herein was employed to work in defendant's said lathmill by the said Robert S. Tillman, under and by virtue of said Tillman's contract with the said defendant as herein set out, and while at work in the said defendant's lathmill on said 6th day of February, 1906, in the operation of the same, pulling, tying, and trimming the lath at the trimmer saw," etc., he was injured.

It is the appellant's claim that the facts alleged show Tillman to have been an independent contractor conducting an independent enterprise; that the relation of master and servant existed between the respondent and Tillman, and not between the respondent and the appellant; and that in consequence the duty to guard the machinery devolved upon Tillman, the immediate employer, and was not a duty imposed upon it as between itself and Tillman's employer. But we cannot concede that this result follows from the facts pleaded. Tillman's relation to the appellant was rather that of an agent than that of an independent contractor. The appellant did not lease or surrender to him the management or control of this department of its mill. It surrendered only the right to employ the persons needed to carry on the work. It still retained control as to the manner and mode of doing the work, and control over the workmen employed by Tillman. This, as we say, did not make Tillman an independent contractor. He was but the agent of the appellant, acting in this regard for and on its behalf. Under a similar state of facts, the court, in Nyback v. Champagne Lumber Co., 109 Fed. 732, 48 C. C. A. 632, used the following language: "The defendant here was engaged in the general operation of its own mill. Owning the mill and machinery, it had possession, and, in a general sense, control, of all operations and work carried on. The slasher belonged to the defendant, and its sole use was to cut slabs and other like material belonging to the defendant into proper lengths for shingles, lath, and pickets, which, when cut, should belong to the defendant. The burden of keeping that machine in running order, the expense of oiling and repairing, remained with the defendant. The power to run it and the light to light it the defendant furnished; but it contracted with Barber to do the manual work necessary to operate the machine in cutting the material so furnished, giving him no authority to use it upon other material of his own, or for anybody other than the defendant, and for the doing of this manual work upon the defendant's machine and material, as directed by the defendant, the defendant agreed to pay him a price measured by the product. While nominally Barber was to employ and pay for such assistance as he needed, the wages of the helpers were paid by the defendant, and deducted from the amount, which otherwise should have been due to Barber. Without undertaking to lay down lines for the decision of other cases, we have no hesitation in saying that upon the facts stated, and as they appear in this record, Barber was not an independent contractor, but a servant of the defendant, put in charge of a particular machine upon the terms stated to operate it for the defendant, and that whatever duty there was to notify an inexperienced person engaged to work upon or about it of the dangers incident to the employment remained a duty of the defendant." See, also, Ziebell v. Eclipse Lumber Co., 33 Wash. 591, 74 Pac. 680; Johnson v. Spear, 76 Mich. 139, 42 N. W. 1092, 15 Am. St. Rep. 298.

The appellant next argues that the evidence was insufficient to justify a finding on the part of the jury that the saw was not properly guarded, or could have been guarded in such a manner as to protect against injuries such as the respondent suffered and not seriously interfere with its practical operation. On these questions there was a substantial conflict in the evidence. Indeed the record shows that these were the principal questions of fact in dispute in the court below, and that the greater number of witnesses called on each side were called to establish or disprove one or the other of these propositions. Under these circumstances the questions were for the jury. As was said by us in Rector v. Bryant Lumber, etc., Co., 41 Wash. 556, 84 Pac. 7: "Doubtless many cases will arise in which the court can say, as a matter of law, from the location of the machinery and the uses to which it is applied, that it can or cannot be advantageously guarded; but between these extremes there will necessarily arise a large class of cases where the question will be solely one of fact. The statute does not attempt to specify the particular machinery that shall be guarded, but declares that all machinery of a certain class shall be provided with proper safeguards, where this can be done advantageously. If there is a conflict in the testimony as to whether a particular machine can or cannot be advantageously guarded, the question must be submitted to the jury under proper instructions. Under our system of jurisprudence there is no other way to determine the fact." See, also, Erickson v. McNeeley Co., 41 Wash. 509, 84 Pac. 3; Boyle v. Anderson & Middleton Lumber Co. (Wash.) 90 Pac. 433; Noren v. Larson Lumber Co. (Wash.) 89 Pac. 563.

Certain witnesses, called on the part of the respondent, testified that the saw could have been effectively and practicably guarded against dangers similar to those causing the injury to the respondent by the use of an attachment to the contrivance on which the bundles of laths were laid before being pushed into the saws, called by them a "third leg." The appellant moved the court to take from the jury all evidence relating to this attachment on the ground that it was visionary and impracticable, and not in use in mills generally, and one not commonly known to millmen. This motion was properly denied. On the question of the practicability of the contrivance there was a difference of opinion among the witnesses, and this being so the jury were the proper judges of that question. It was no objection to its introduction as evidence that it was not in use in mills generally, or generally known to millmen. This plea, if allowed, would defeat the purposes of the factory act. That act was passed because owners and operators of dangerous machinery did not generally guard such machinery against possible injuries to their employes, and if the act requires the use of such guards only as were in general use at the time of its passage, or generally known to millmen at that time, its effectiveness is destroyed. Being intended to compel the guarding of dangerous machinery, owners and operators of such machinery, if they wish to avoid liability for accidents to their employes, must exercise reasonable prudence and care in guarding it. They must adopt such guards as reasonable prudence, observation, and care would suggest, regardless of the question whether other owners or operators of other mills have taken action on like machinery or not. And this being their duty, whether they have exercised that due care is ordinarily a question for the jury. They are not to be held because they may not have foreseen some ingenious contrivance that makes an effective guard, but they must not stand back and await the suggestion of remedies, when the exercise of reasonable prudence and care on their part will suggest them. This third leg, it seems to us, is not so far out of the ordinary that the court could say as a matter of law that it could not have been foreseen by the appellants, had they exercised the care required of them, and this being so, the court very properly submitted the question to the jury.

A witness, called on behalf of the appellant, in answer to questions put to him by appellant's counsel, testified that it was necessary to use a 32-inch saw on the lath trimmer (the machine on which the respondent was injured), because a saw lesser in size would not trim all the laths in an ordinary bundle. He was then asked if the appellant had tried a 28-inch saw and found it too small. To this question an objection was interposed and sustained by the court, on the ground that the inquiry was immaterial. The ruling is assigned as error, but we think the court was right in holding the inquiry immaterial. There was no issue on this point. It was not contended that the appellant negligently used saws on the trimmer larger than the necessities of the business required, nor was it contended that smaller saws would have been more safe than the ones in use. This being true, the question sought to introduce immaterial matter, and was properly rejected.

The appellant complains of certain portions of the court's instructions to the jury. Separated from their connection with other instructions given, and considered as abstract propositions of law, doubtless some of them would be objectionable, because stating the rule too broadly. But, considering them in the connection in which they are used, they were sufficiently limited in their application, and limited in a way that could not possibly have misled the jury. For example, a portion of the charge is quoted and urged as error, because the court in that part of the charge did not mention the fact that practicability to guard a saw is a factor in determining whether a saw is or is not properly guarded, yet the court on this question charged the jury as follows: "(1) The laws of the state of Washington in force at the time of the accident to the plaintiff provide that any person, firm, or corporation, operating a mill where machinery is used, shall provide and maintain in use reasonable safeguards for all saws which it is practicable to guard, and which can be effectively guarded with due regard to the ordinary use of such machinery and appliances and the danger to employes therefrom, and with which employes of any such mill are liable to come in contact while in the performance of their duties. Under this law you are instructed that if you find that the trimmer saw or saws, upon which the plaintiff claims to have been injured, were unguarded and unprotected, and that it was practicable to guard the same effectively, having due regard for the use of the same, and if you find that it was not guarded, then you are to find the defendant negligent in that regard. (2) If, on the other hand, you should find that the saw was guarded, or that it was not practicable to guard it, and it could not be guarded and used, then you should find that the defendant was not negligent in failing to guard the saw. There is a question of practicability as well as of fact that the saw was actually guarded. If it could not be guarded and used, the law would not require it to be guarded. (3) You are instructed that the only questions for you to decide as to the negligence of the defendant, if any, are: First, whether or not the trimmer saw upon which the plaintiff was injured was guarded; second, whether or not it was practicable to guard the said trimmer saw in question; and, third, whether or not the trimmer saw in question could have been guarded effectively, with due regard to the ordinary use of the same, and the dangers to the plaintiff therefrom, and with which the plaintiff was liable to come in contact while in the performance of his duties as operator of said trimmer saw. (4) You are instructed that, if you find from the evidence that the said trimmer saw or saws, or either of them, upon which the plaintiff was injured, were not guarded and protected, but could have been guarded and protected as you have been instructed, and that the plaintiff was injured by reason of the same being unguarded and unprotected, and not by his own negligence, then you are to find the verdict for the plaintiff." It is difficult to understand how the court could have been more explicit on this point.

The appellant next complains of the language of respondent's counsel used in his argument to the jury. Counsel unquestionably did go beyond the limits of legitimate argument; but the trial judge rebuked him for it, and we think removed any prejudice or wrong impression the jury may have imbibed from the argument.

The respondent suffered the loss of the two front fingers on his right hand. The verdict was for $5,000. This, we think, so far excessive as to lead to the conclusion that it was given under the influence of prejudice. A verdict for one-half that sum, we think, will fully compensate for the injuries suffered.

The cause will be remanded to the superior court, with instructions to allow the respondent 30 days after notice to him that the remittitur has reached that court in which to remit from the amount of the judgment $2,500. If the remission be made, the judgment will stand affirmed for the remainder, but if not made, the lower court will award a new trial.

GREENWOOD v. CORBIN.

(Supreme Court of Washington. Jan. 20, 1908.)

1. TROVER AND CONVERSION—EVIDENCE—RELEVANCY.

In an action to recover the value of certain personal property alleged to belong to plaintiff, which defendant had acquired through attachment and sale thereof in a suit by defendant against plaintiff's father, evidence with reference to the merits of the controversy between defendant and plaintiff's father was irrelevant.

2. SAME—OWNERSHIP OF PROPERTY.

In conversion for the value of certain personal property acquired through attachment proceedings instituted by defendant against plaintiff's father, evidence held to require a finding that the property belonged to plaintiff, and was therefore not subject to the attachment.

3. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES—TRANSFER OF PERSONAL PROPERTY — CHANGE OF POSSESSION—STATUTES—APPLICATION.

Where a contract by which a son acquired certain personal property from his father was made prior to the removal of the property to Idaho, and prior to an indebtedness of the father to defendant, who claimed the property under attachment proceedings in Idaho, neither the statutes of Idaho, nor Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St. § 4578, providing that no bill of sale for the transfer of personal property shall be valid as against existing creditors or innocent purchasers, where the property is left in the possession of the vendor, unless the bill of sale is recorded, etc., were applicable to invalidate such transfer.

Appeal from Superior Court, Spokane County; D. C. Carey, Judge.

Action by Richard Greenwood against D. C. Corbin. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

George A. Latimer (Dalbert E. Twitchell, of counsel), for appellant. Allen & Allen, for respondent.

DUNBAR, J. This action was commenced by Richard Greenwood against D. C. Corbin to recover the value of the following described personal property, to wit: One blue roan mare named Pete, one light grey mare named Doll, one set of double harness, one double wagon, one-half truck, together with damages for the detention in July, 1906. The cause was tried without a jury, and a decision rendered in favor of the defendant. From the judgment of dismissal, the appeal is taken.

The property above described came into the possession of the defendant through a suit and attachment against the partnership composed of J. I. Greenwood, father of the plaintiff, and Frank Campbell, brought by the defendant in the courts of Idaho. The property was afterwards sold by defendant by an order of the court as perishable property, and the money therefrom was turned in to the clerk of the said Idaho court. At the time of said attachment the plaintiff was working for the aforesaid partnership as a teamster. An examination of the record in this case convinces us that the judgment of the court was wrong, not only in relation to some of the technical errors assigned by the appellant, but in consideration of the merits of the case; and the judgment, we think, was rendered by the lower court under a misapprehension of the law governing the case. The case seems to have been largely tried with reference to the merits of the original controversy between J. I. Greenwood, the father of the plaintiff, and D. C. Corbin, the defendant in this action, and a great deal of testimony was introduced with regard to that controversy, while, of course, the only question at issue in this case is the ownership of the property by the appellant. The introduction of testimony in relation to the merits of the former case only served to confuse and obscure the issues in this case. We are constrained to think, from the findings of the court and the opinion of the trial judge, which is sent up in the record, that the delinquencies of the father, J. I. Greenwood, were to a certain extent visited upon the appellant in this case. Stripped of all immaterial facts, the record shows that the blue roan mare was given to the appellant by his father for a birthday present on appellant's twenty-first birthday, viz., the 7th day of July, 1905. This was testified to by the father in a straightforward manner, also by the son, and also by the mother of the appellant, who stated that they had talked the matter over, that the son had been working faithfully for them, and that they had concluded to, and did, make him a present of this mare. The record also shows by the testimony of the father and the appellant that the grey mare was sold to the appellant by his father on the 28th day of August, 1905; that the harness was bought by the appellant from a secondhand dealer, the money for the same being paid by the appellant with funds he received for labor while working for his father; and that the wagon was bought by the appellant from a liveryman at Spokane with his own money. The man who sold the harness, who seems to be entirely disinterested, and who only had a casual acquaintance with the appellant and his father, testified to the sale of the harness to the son, and the payment by him for the same; testified that the transaction was with the son, who told him that if he would throw in a couple of old collars he would take it at the price offered. The collars were thrown in, and the trade consummated. The man who sold the wagon to the son also testified to the purchase of the same by the son. There was no attempt by any one to dispute this testimony.

A single circumstance was proven, which on first thought would seem to be inconsistent with the theory of ownership on the part of the son. This circumstance was that J. I. Greenwood gave a chattel mortgage on this property to a man by the name of Root, after the time that ownership of it was claimed by the appellant, making the usual affidavit in relation to the ownership thereof. In explanation of this, however, the testimony shows that the appellant was with his father at the time this chattel mortgage was given; that the ownership of the son in the property was made known to Mr. Root, and it was agreed that if any more money were required the son would sign the mortgage with the father. Mr. Root, however, deeming the security ample, did not require this. This was testified to, not only by J. I. Greenwood and the appellant, but also by Mr. Root. It seems that there was no special attention called to the conditions of the affidavit, but that J. I. Greenwood in a rather careless manner signed the same and executed the mortgage. The transaction was made without the assistance of any outsider, Mr. Root having prepared the mortgage himself, and, while it is a practice which is not commendable and might be fraught with serious results to parties indulging in it, under all the circumstances as shown by the testimony we do not think it was sufficient to overbalance the real testimony in relation to the ownership of the property.

The only other circumstance tending in any way to dispute the testimony of the appellant was that of the deputy sheriff, who testifies that, when he levied upon the property, the appellant claimed to own a certain brown team instead of the team in controversy. This was denied by the appellant, who stated that he simply told the deputy that he claimed one of the teams, not specially mentioning the team, the teams all being together at the camp where the levy was made. We think, under all the circumstances surrounding the levy, and in consideration of the testimony of both parties, the deputy sheriff might easily have been mistaken as to what particular team was referred to by the appellant on that occasion.

The statutes of Idaho, which were introduced, even if they had been legally introduced, have no bearing upon this question, for it is conceded that the contract of sale to this appellant, if any was made, was made prior to the time when the property was removed to Idaho, and prior to any indebtedness on the part of J. I. Greenwood to the respondent in this action. For the same reason section 4578, Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St., which is to the effect that no bill of sale for the transfer of personal property shall be valid as against existing creditors or innocent purchasers, where the property is left in the possession of the vendor, unless the said bill of sale be recorded in the auditor's office of the county in which such property is situated within 10 days after such sale shall be made, is inapplicable, no debt existing at the time this sale and gift were alleged to have been made.

It was not inconsistent with the idea of ownership on the part of the appellant that his father gave him employment with his team upon the contract which he had taken from Mr. Corbin, nor was it inconsistent with the idea of ownership that when his father, whether justly or unjustly, left Idaho and started for his home in Washington, he accompanied him on the trip, bringing his team with him; and whatsoever may have been the merits of the original controversy between J. I. Greenwood and the respondent Corbin, the undisputed testimony in this case in relation to the ownership of this property is so strong and convincing that, notwithstanding the judgment of the superior court on the same testimony, we cannot but deem it sufficient to establish legal ownership in the appellant.

The judgment will therefore be reversed, and the value alleged, viz., $475 having been established by uncontradicted testimony, the court will enter judgment for the appellant for the sum of $475, with legal interest from the date of the detention of the property.

PIGOTT v. GRAHAM.

(Supreme Court of Washington. Jan. 20, 1908.)

FRAUD—FRAUDULENT REPRESENTATIONS—RELIANCE ON STATEMENTS—SALE OF BUSINESS.

Plaintiff, a stockholder of one company, negotiated with defendant, a stockholder of another company, engaged in similar business in the same city, for the consolidation of their respective companies. Defendant misrepresented that his company was in a prosperous condition, and plaintiff, believing and relying upon his statement of its assets and liabilities, agreed upon the consolidation. It did not appear that the property and assets of defendant's company were concealed, nor that it was impossible or inconvenient for plaintiff to have made an examination into the financial standing of the company, nor that he was induced by defendant to refrain from making such an examination as any prudent person would make under the circumstances, nor did it appear that such an examination was not made. Held, that plaintiff could not recover for the misrepresentations; since, where there are no fiduciary relations existing between a seller and buyer, and the means of knowledge are equally available to both parties, and the subject of purchase is open to their inspection, if the buyer does not avail himself of his means of investigation, he cannot complain of being deceived by the seller's misrepresentations.

Fullerton, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, King County; R. B. Albertson, Judge.

Action by H. C. Pigott against A. B. Graham. From a judgment of dismissal, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Peters & Powell, for appellant. Chas. F. Munday, for respondent.

DUNBAR, J. The appellant brought an action against the respondent for damages alleged to have been caused by reason of the deceit and misrepresentation of respondent, which induced him to enter into a certain contract. The material facts alleged in the complaint are: That the Metropolitan Press was a corporation having a capital of $60,000, consisting of 600 shares of the par value of $100 each, and that said shares of stock were worth $65,000, of which stock the appellant Pigott owned 475 shares. That the

Graham-Hickman Company was a corporation having a capital of $50,000, consisting of 500 shares of the par value of $100 each. That of this stock Graham, the respondent owned 77 shares. That each company was doing business in Seattle. That the Graham-Hickman Company was, until the 29th day of March, 1905, engaged in the business of printing and the manufacture of paper boxes in the city of Seattle. That the Metropolitan Press was, until said last-mentioned date, in the printing and binding business in said city. That during the month of March the respondent Graham approached the appellant, and opened negotiations with him for the union and consolidation of the business and properties owned by the aforesaid corporations. That said negotiations were carried on between the plaintiff and the defendant, and through them with the other stockholders of said corporations respectively, extending over a period of several days. That in order to induce the appellant to consent to such union and consolidation the respondent stated and represented to the appellant that the Graham-Hickman Company was solvent, in a prosperous condition, and conducting a highly profitable business, and then had on hand a stock of merchandise to the amount in value, according to the inventoried cost thereof, of $37,932.80; that it had bills receivable of the face value of $5,447.80, and other property aggregating in excess of $100,000; that the said Graham-Hickman Company owed no indebtedness excepting mortgage bonds to the amount of $42,500, bills payable to the amount of $2,119, and accounts payable to the amount of $3,108.84. That the appellant believed these statements, and, so believing and relying upon them, agreed with the respondent that the two companies aforesaid should be consolidated into a new corporation to be called the "Metropolitan Press Printing Company," the property of the two original companies to be transferred to the Metropolitan Press Printing Company, each stockholder of the respective companies to receive such a proportion of one-half of the stock of the new company as his shares in the original companies bore to the capital stock of the new company, and that in consummation of said agreement a new corporation, known as the Metropolitan Press Printing Company, was organized by the stockholders of the Graham-Hickman Company and the Metropolitan Press on or about the 28th day of March, 1905, with a capital stock of $100,000, divided into 1,000 shares of $100 each. That the appellant subscribed for 376 shares of said capital stock, and the respondent subscribed for 77 shares, and that all of the capital stock of said corporation was duly subscribed on the 28th day of March, 1905. That thereupon the Graham-Hickman Company conveyed all of its property and assets of every kind and description to the said Metropolitan Press Printing Company, and at the same time the Metropolitan Press conveyed all of its property and assets of every kind, except a small portion thereof, to the said Metropolitan Press Printing Company. That at the time of making said conveyance to the Metropolitan Press Printing Company, in order to induce this plaintiff to complete and consummate the plan of consolidation as aforesaid, the respondent stated and represented to the appellant that the Graham-Hickman Company was then transferring and conveying to the Metropolitan Press Printing Company all the property and assets which he, the said defendant, had theretofore stated and represented that the Graham-Hickman Company possessed. That in truth and in fact the statements and representations made by the appellant to the respondent, to the effect that the said Graham-Hickman Company had, as a part of its property and assets, merchandise of the amount of $37,932.80, according to the inventoried cost thereof, were false and untrue, and the value of said merchandise was in reality only $12,847.73, and that the representation that the Graham-Hickman Company did not owe on account of bills payable any amount in excess of $2,119 was false and untrue, and that it did owe at that time the sum of $4,544 in excess of the said $2,119. That the representation that the Graham-Hickman Company transferred all the property and assets of which it was possessed was untrue, and that the representation made that the company was solvent and in a prosperous condition and doing a prosperous business was false and untrue. This suit is brought to recover the difference between the actual value as alleged of the Graham-Hickman Company and the value alleged by the respondent Graham. Demurrer was interposed to this complaint, to the effect that it did not state a cause of action. The court sustained the demurrer, the action was dismissed, and appeal was taken from the judgment of dismissal.

It will be noticed from the complaint that this is a plain action for deceit, the corporations not in any way being involved. But the essence of the complaint is that the respondent, by false representations, induced the appellant to make a trade by which he was damaged, and without discussing any of the preliminary questions discussed by the respondent in relation to the power of the appellant to bring this action, which it is claimed is an action in effect for the benefit of the corporation, we are satisfied that as between the appellant and respondent, considering them as vendor and vendee, there is no cause of action stated. There is no allegation in the complaint that the property and assets of the Graham-Hickman Company were concealed from plaintiff. There is no allegation that it was impossible or inconvenient for him to have made an examination into the financial standing of the company. He does not allege that he was induced by Graham to refrain from making such an examination as any prudent person would make under the circumstances. He does not even allege that such an examination was not made.

This court in an early case, viz., Washington Central Improvement Company v. Newlands, 11 Wash. 212, 39 Pac. 366, laid down the rule that, where there were no fiduciary relations existing between the seller and the buyer, it was the duty of the buyer to make an examination with reference to the representations made by the seller and as to the value of the property purchased, and that a purchaser who refused to do this could not call upon the law to stand in loco parentis to him in the ordinary transactions of business and ordinary dealings with his fellow-men. Cases of this character are frequently hard to determine, for there are so many independent circumstances surrounding each case that it is difficult sometimes to discern the dividing line between that character of fraud and misrepresentation which justifies the purchaser in relying upon such representations and those representations which are made where the parties are standing on a plane, where the facts which are the subject-matter of the representations are ascertainable, and where it is the duty of the purchaser to put on foot such examination as is necessary to determine the facts concerning which the negotiations are made. But notwithstanding these different circumstances there are certain basic principles upon which the cases must be adjudicated, and the difficulty is not so much to determine the law as to determine whether the particular circumstances bring the cases within the established rules of law. This court, in the case above referred to, said: "We think the proper and sensible rule was laid down by the United States Supreme Court in Slaughter's Adm'r v. Gerson, 13 Wall. (U. S.) 379, 20 L. Ed. 627, where it was held that the misrepresentation which would vitiate a contract of sale and prevent a court of equity from aiding its enforcement must relate to a material matter constituting an inducement to the contract, and respecting which the complaining party did not possess at hand the means of knowledge." That court, after announcing the rule as noted, further said, through Judge Field, who delivered the opinion of the court: "A court of equity will not undertake, any more than a court of law, to relieve a party from the consequences of his own inattention and carelessness. Where the means of knowledge are at hand and equally available to both parties, and the subject of purchase is alike open to their inspection, if the purchaser does not avail himself of these means and opportunities, he will not be heard to say that he has been deceived by the vendor's misrepresentations. If, having eyes, he will not see matters directly before them, where no concealment is made or attempted, he will not be entitled to consideration when he complains that he has suffered from his own voluntary blindness and been misled by overconfidence in the statements of another." This doctrine was followed by this court in West Seattle Land & Imp. Co. v. Herren, 16 Wash. 665, 48 Pac. 341; Griffith v. Strand, 19 Wash. 636, 54 Pac. 613; Walsh v. Bushell, 26 Wash. 576, 67 Pac. 216; Samson v. Beale, 27 Wash. 557, 68 Pac. 180; Sherman v. Sweeny, 29 Wash. 321, 69 Pac. 1117.

In some more recent cases, for instance, in Mulholland v. Washington Match Company, 35 Wash. 315, 77 Pac. 497, it was said that it could not be the law that a person of ordinary faculties may never rely upon representations made to him, even though no fiduciary relations existed, and that each case must depend upon its own circumstances. In that case the representations were made with regard to an ingenious device for manufacturing matches, and involved a special, skilled knowledge of the mechanism itself. In addition to that the machine was not at hand, and the court found that it did not in fact exist, but that the facts with reference to the existence of such a machine and the patent thereof, together with the ownership thereof, were peculiarly within the knowledge of the appellant's officers and agents who made the representations. In that case the court held that the purchaser was not bound to rely upon the representations made by the seller, but reiterated the doctrine that, where the subject-matter was at hand, and the truth easily ascertainable, the purchaser must use his senses, and could not afterwards be held to say that he had been defrauded, if he neglected to avail himself of the present and reasonable opportunity to learn the truth. This case was followed by Daniel v. Glidden, 38 Wash. 556, 80 Pac. 811, and was really the basis of the decision in that case. This case more nearly approaches the facts as stated by the complaint in the case at bar, but yet we think it is easily distinguished in principle. There the payee of a note was induced to loan money, by the fraud of officers of the corporation, and it was held that the payees were not bound to investigate the truth or falsity of the representations concerning the financial ability of the corporation, facts which would involve the examination of a concern represented as doing a banking business, and of public records, and a large number of houses said to be building, that the means of knowledge were not open, and that under all the circumstances of that case there was a reasonable call for reliance on the representations made. There too the officers, who represented themselves to be doing a certain banking business, and who were doing an intricate kind of business, were dealing with people who were not acquainted with that kind of business, and who would probably not have understood the intricate business of the appellant if they had undertaken to make an examination. At least it would have to have been done by employing expert assistance, and at a great expense and trouble.

But here it will be observed the parties were in the same kind of business, competitors in the printing business in the city of Seattle, both stockholders in the business, and stockholders and managers of their respective businesses. It was their knowledge of the business in all its details that prompted them to enter into this consolidation, so that money might be made thereby and expenses saved. The property was on hand, it was all in the city of Seattle, and it would have been but an act of the most common kind of prudence on the part of the appellant to have investigated the business and books of the concern, which he was practically buying. In fact the representations made by Graham may have been preliminary, and he may have presumed that Pigott would exercise ordinary prudence and make the ordinary investigations before the trade was consummated. Certainly there is no showing that he was prevented by any manipulation, fraudulent, or otherwise, on the part of the Graham Company, from making such an examination. There was no obliteration of evidence in the case, as there was in Lawson v. Vernon, 38 Wash. 422, 80 Pac. 559, 107 Am. St. Rep. 880, where it was held that the vendee had a right of action where he had relied upon false representations of the vendor in pointing out certain lots as the ones offered for sale, when it developed that the lots pointed out were not the lots for which the deed was given; it appearing in that case that where the lots were located the ground was obscured by brush and trees, and that the stakes could not be found, and that under such circumstances the vendee had a right to rely upon the representations of the owner in pointing out the certain lots which he offered for sale. Nor does this case fall within the rule announced by this court in Northwestern Lumber Company v. Callendar, 36 Wash. 492, 79 Pac. 30, where the representations which the court decided the vendee had a right to rely upon were representations with reference to a patent and the working of machinery. There the court held that the representation of the vendor, familiar with machinery, amounted to a warranty, when relied upon by purchasers unfamiliar therewith, and they were induced to purchase by such representations. On the examination of this case it will be found that there was an attempt to make an examination by the vendee; but not having the peculiar knowledge necessary, such attempt proved futile.

In Griffith v. Strand, 19 Wash. 686, 54 Pac. 613, it was held that the purchaser of a stock of goods cannot avoid the sale on the ground of fraud, in that false representations were made to him as to the quality, quantity, and value of the goods, when there was no fiduciary relation between the parties, and when it was within the purchaser's power to readily determine the truth or falsity of such representations by an inspection of the goods. In that case it was said: "It must not be forgotten that the contracting parties were dealing at arm's length. No fiduciary relations existed between them—nothing to inspire confidence or disarm suspicion—and there was no imbecility of age, weakness, or disease. The property in question was at hand, and an inspection of it by the defendants could have been made had they insisted upon it. The representations related solely to quantity, quality, and value, the truth or falsity of which could have been determined by an inspection. Under such circumstances we think it will not do to hold that a party may successfully complain of his own failure to exercise ordinary care, prudence, and caution, when, by the exercise thereof, the injury of which he complains could not have arisen. This language may, it seems to us, be appropriately applied to this case. While it is true that in that case it was a stock of goods, the value of which was involved, in this case it is the value of the property of the Graham-Hickman Company, which consisted of goods, book accounts, and of the good will of the business. The value of the goods and book accounts could have been easily ascertained by an examination of the corporation, and the good will of the concern is a character of property so indefinite that a statement of its value must necessarily be regarded by any man of any business acumen whatever as very largely a matter of opinion.

It was more recently decided by this court in Hulett v. Achey, 39 Wash. 91, 80 Pac. 1105, that a sale of standing timber and saw logs could not be rescinded by the vendee for false representations by the vendor as to quality, where no claim was made that there was no opportunity to make examination. In fact, the rule announced by the Supreme Court of the United States in Slaughter's Adm'r v. Gerson, supra, which has been consistently followed by this court, it seems to us is entirely applicable to the case at bar. If contracting parties were allowed, after making contracts and agreements with reference to business and property, and after discovering that their trade had not been a profitable one, to annul such contracts either by rescission or by actions for damages, it would render the business conditions of the country perilous and uncertain, make contracts unstable and unreliable, and keep the courts of the state busy in determining matters which ought to have been determined by the parties to the contract before they entered into the same.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEDERSON v. LEASE.

(Supreme Court of Washington. Jan. 15, 1908.)

1. EXECUTION—REQUISITES OF WRIT—NAME IN WHICH WRIT SHOULD RUN.

An execution: "State of Washington, C. County—ss.: To the Sheriff of C. County—Greeting"—and then proceeding in the usual form followed in executions, is not fatally defective as not running in the name of the state, though the form is not strictly in compliance with the Constitution and statute.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 21, Execution, § 175.]

2. NAMES—NAME OF DEFENDANT IN EXECUTION—IDEM SONANS.

That the name of defendant in execution "Peder Pederson" was written "Peter Peterson" did not render the sale thereunder void, the rule of idem sonans controlling, and it appearing that defendant was well known in the community under the name of Peter Peterson.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 36, Names, §§ 12–15.]

3. SAME.

Objections that an execution did not state the amount actually due, and did not command the sheriff to levy on the "real property upon which the judgment is a lien," does not invalidate the sale, where no objections to the confirmation thereof were made, and the purchaser and his successor in interest have held and paid taxes on the property for over 12 years.

Appeal from Superior Court, Clallam County; Geo. C. Hatch, Judge.

Action by Peder Pederson against Fred Lease, Jr. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Trumbull & Trumbull, for appellant. A. A. Richardson, for respondent.

ROOT, J. Plaintiff brought this action to quiet title to certain lots in Port Angeles, Clallam county, alleging ownership, and that the real estate was unoccupied. From the judgment in defendant's favor, plaintiff appeals.

It appears that plaintiff owned this property in 1895, at a time when one Fred Lease, father of respondent, obtained judgment against plaintiff in the justice court of Clallam county. The transcript of this judgment was, on the 1st day of June, 1895, filed and entered in the office of the clerk of the superior court of said county, and on the 26th day of July, 1895, an execution was issued out of the superior court upon said judgment, and the property in question levied upon and sold to said Fred Lease, and the sale confirmed by order of court on December 19, 1896, no exceptions or objections to the confirmation having been interposed. No redemption has been had. Fred Lease died on the 26th day of June, 1902, and it is conceded that respondent herein is his sole heir. Taxes have been paid ever since the sale by respondent and his father, a certificate having at one time been issued to appellant and redeemed by respondent. Appellant contends that the sale of the property was void, first, because the execution did not run in the name of the state of Washington; second, did not state the amount actually due; third, did not command the sheriff to levy upon the real property upon which the judgment is a lien; fourth, that it was not issued against the property of appellant, but against that of one "Peter Peterson." The execution complained of reads, in the commencement thereof: "State of Washington, Clallam County—ss.: To the Sheriff of Clallam County—Greeting"—and then proceeds in the usual form followed in executions. It may be that this form is not strictly in compliance with the statute and Constitution, but we are not prepared to hold that it was fatally defective; and, inasmuch as no objections were made to the confirmation of the sale, we cannot hold the sale void by reason of this alleged defect.

As to the error in the name of plaintiff, it appears that he was sued as "Peter Peterson" in the justice court; that he appeared in response to such name at that time, and defended the action in person, testifying therein as a witness. He consequently had personal knowledge of the entry of the judgment, and that his name was misspelled in the proceedings. That another error was made in the spelling in the execution was not, in our opinion, sufficient to render the sale thereunder void. The name "Peter Peterson" is the English form of the Danish name "Peder Pederson," and we think the question is controlled by the rule of idem sonans. Schooler v. Asherst and notes, 1 Litt. (Ky.) 216, 13 Am. Dec. 232–234. It appears from the evidence that appellant was well known in the community under the name of Peter Peterson. The contentions that the execution does not state the amount actually due, and does not command the sheriff to levy upon the "real property upon which the judgment is a lien," we cannot hold, at this late day, sufficient to invalidate the sale; no objections to the confirmation having been made, and the purchaser at such sale and his successor in interest having held and paid taxes upon the property for over 12 years. Terry v. Furth, 40 Wash. 493, 82 Pac. 882.

We think the judgment and decree of the trial court should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

FULLERTON, MOUNT, DUNBAR, and RUDKIN, JJ., concur. HADLEY, C. J., and CROW, J., took no part.

HOUTZ v. UNION PAC. R. CO.

(Supreme Court of Utah. Jan. 27, 1908.)

1. CARRIERS—TRANSPORTATION OF PROPERTY—LIMITATION OF LIABILITY—NATURE OF RIGHT.

Though common carriers are as a general rule liable as insurers of property, and are responsible for loss or damage, unless caused by the act of God or of the public enemy, this liability may be limited by a fair and reasonable contract as to any loss not caused by its negligence or misconduct, or that of its servants.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 9, Carriers, §§ 637, 933.]

2. SAME—LIABILITIES SUBJECT TO LIMITATION—NEGLIGENCE OR MISCONDUCT.

A carrier cannot by contract exempt itself from nor limit its liability for the loss of or damage to property caused by its negligence or misconduct or that of its servants.¹

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 9, Carriers, §§ 854-859, 934, 935.]

3. SAME—TRANSPORTATION OF LIVE STOCK.

Provisions in a contract with a carrier that a shipper of sheep assumed all risk of damage from delay in transportation, or loss or damage from any other cause than willful or gross negligence, and other provisions exempting the carrier from or limiting its liability for loss or damage from failure to exercise a proper degree of care, contravene public policy and are void.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 9, Carriers, §§ 934, 935.]

4. SAME.

A contract provision that the rules, regulations, and conditions prescribed by a carrier of live stock, as evidenced by its published tariffs, classifications, and circulars, were binding on the shipper, and that his signature of the contract was conclusive evidence of his knowledge of and assent to the conditions thereof, is void.

5. APPEAL—REVIEW—FINDINGS—EFFECT.

Findings by the court as to a carrier's delay and negligence in the transportation of sheep are binding on the carrier on appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, §§ 3055-3992.]

6. CARRIERS—TRANSPORTATION OF LIVE STOCK—LIMITATION OF LIABILITY—VALIDITY.

A stipulation with a carrier of live stock, fairly entered into and reasonable under all the circumstances, requiring the presentation of a claim for loss or damage, is not ineffectual in all cases where the loss or damage results from negligence.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 9, Carriers, § 938.]

7. SAME.

Where a contract for the shipment of sheep limits the carrier's liability to loss from willful or gross negligence, a paragraph requiring the presentation of a claim within 10 days as a condition of liability must be construed as referring only to claims for willful or gross negligence.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 9, Carriers, § 938.]

8. SAME.

A contract exempting carrier of sheep from liability except for willful or gross negligence, and then only on presentation of a claim, is void.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 9, Carriers, §§ 934, 938.]

9. TRIAL—FINDINGS BY COURT—CONFORMITY TO PLEADING AND EVIDENCE.

In an action for injuries to a shipment of sheep, a finding, not based on any pleading or evidence, that a stipulation requiring notice within 10 days of claim for damage is reasonable, is a mere conclusion of law, without effect.²

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 46, Trial, §§ 935-938.]

Appeal from District Court, Second District; J. A. Howell, Judge.

Action by John S. Houtz against the Union Pacific Railroad Company. From a judgment in favor of defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Heywood & McCormick, for appellant. P. L. Williams, Geo. H. Smith, and Jno. G. Willis, for respondent.

STRAUP, J. This is an action to recover damages for an injury to live stock, consisting of sheep, alleged to have been occasioned through the negligence of the defendant, a common carrier, in transporting the sheep from Soda Springs, Idaho, to Omaha, Neb. The case was tried to the court, who, among other things, found that the defendant, at Schuyler, Neb., negligently delayed the carriage of the sheep, and there negligently held and confined them on its cars for a period of 72 hours, and at a place where the sheep could neither be unloaded, watered, nor fed; that during the time the sheep were there delayed the plaintiff frequently urged the defendant to transport and convey the sheep to a place where they could be unloaded, fed, and watered, and, although the defendant could well have done so, nevertheless it negligently failed and refused to do so; and that in consequence thereof the plaintiff was damaged in the sum of $1,326 by an excess shrinkage in weight of the sheep, and in the further sum of $954 because of a drop in the market occurring within the time of the negligent delay and detention. The court further found that the plaintiff and defendant entered into a written contract by the terms of which it was stipulated (quoting from findings); "(1) That the carrier shall not be liable for the loss or damage of, nor for any injuries received by, any of said stock, unless the same is the direct result of willful misconduct or actual negligence of said carriers, their agents, servants, or employees. (2) That the shipper agreed to load and unload and reload all said stock at his own expense, and to feed, water, and attend to the same at his own risk, while it was in any stockyard. (3) That the shipper assumed all the risk of any of them being weak and maiming each other or themselves in consequence of cold or suffocation or any other defects, and the shipper agreed to assume all the risk of damage which may be sustained by reason of delay in transportation, or loss or damage for any other cause, or anything not resulting from the willful negligence of the defendant. (4) It is also specially agreed and provided that the defendant should not be liable for any loss or damage to said stock by causes beyond its control, or by floods or fire, shrinkage in weight, changes in weather, heat or cold, or any other thing or cause not directly the result of gross negligence on the part of said defendant, its agents, or servants. (5) Said contract further provided that unless claims for loss or damage or detention are presented within 10 days from the date of unloading said stock at destination, and before said stock has been mingled with the other stock, such claims shall be deemed to be waived, and the defendant under said contract was discharged from all liability thereby. (6) It was still further provided in said contract that the rules, regulations, and conditions prescribed by the defendant for the transportation of live stock, as evidenced by their published tariffs, classifications, and circulars in force and effect at said time, were binding upon said plaintiff, and that the signing of the contract by the shipper, or his agent, was and should be conclusive evidence of the knowledge, assent, and agreement to each and every stipulation and condition thereof by said shipper, the plaintiff." It was further found that no claim was presented to the defendant within 10 days, nor before the mingling of the sheep with other sheep, and not until 24 days after the sheep reached their destination, and that the "provision requiring the claim to be presented within 10 days after the unloading of the sheep and before the sheep had been commingled with other sheep is a reasonable provision under the circumstances." Judgment was rendered for the defendant on the sole ground that the claim was not presented "within 10 days after the arrival of the sheep at their destination and before having been mingled with other sheep." The plaintiff appeals.

The only question presented by the appeal is with respect to the validity and effect of the contract. As a general rule common carriers are held liable as insurers of property intrusted to them, and are held responsible for any loss of or damage to the property, unless occasioned by the act of God or by the public enemy. The law is, however, well settled in this country that the carrier's liability as an insurer may be limited by special contract, when fairly entered into and reasonable in its terms, and that it may limit its common-law liability for any loss, provided such loss is not the result of its negligence or misconduct, or that of its servants. The rule is equally well settled that the carrier cannot make a valid contract by which it is to be exempt from liability for any loss or damage resulting from its misconduct or negligence, or that of its servants; nor can its liability for a failure to exercise a proper degree of care in the transportation of property intrusted to it be limited by special contract. Williams v. O. S. L. R. Co., 18 Utah, 210, 54 Pac. 991, 72 Am. St. Rep. 777; 5 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law, 288-308, and cases there cited. These principles, of course, are not disputed. The contention made by respondent is that the stipulation requiring the presentation of a claim as a condition precedent of liability is not violative of these principles. The action was grounded on defendant's negligence. The court found plaintiff's loss and damage to be the result of such negligence. That the provisions of the contract whereby it was stipulated that the plaintiff assumed all risk of damage which might be sustained by reason of delay in transportation, or loss or damage for any other cause or thing not resulting from the willful or gross negligence of the defendant, and all other provisions exempting the defendant from or limiting its liability for loss or damage resulting from its failure to exercise a proper degree of care, contravene public policy, and are void, is not seriously disputed. For the same and other reasons not necessary to here state, it may be said that paragraph 6 of the contract is also invalid.

At a former hearing of this case we rendered an opinion, which was filed, but not published, wherein it was in effect held by us that the stipulation in the contract requiring the presentation of a claim as a condition precedent of liability for loss or damage should only apply to and be given effect in case of a loss or damage not occasioned by the defendant's negligence or misconduct; and, as the court found plaintiff's damage to be the result of defendant's negligence, the stipulation was held to be inoperative. We reached this conclusion upon the theory that, when an injury has been sustained by the negligence of the carrier, a complete cause of action arose upon the infliction of the injury; that to permit the carrier by special contract to make an additional requirement, such as the presentation of a claim as a condition precedent of liability, and before a right of action existed, restricted or limited the right which the shipper would have to maintain an action for such negligence, and to that extent limited or conditioned the carrier's liability for negligence; that, if it was against public policy to permit a carrier in advance to contract against its negligence, then it followed that it could not by special contract in advance impose conditions precedent of liability for a loss or damage occasioned by its negligence; that, if such a condition as here could be lawfully imposed, then other conditions could also be imposed, if fairly entered into, and if found to be reasonable under the circumstances of the case; and hence the stipulation, when applied to a loss or damage occasioned by the negligence of the carrier, was against the policy of the law and ineffectual. These views seem to be supported by the following authorities: 6 Cyc. 505; Mo. Pac. Ry. Co. v. Harris, 67 Tex. 168, 2 S. W. 574; Ormsby v. U. P. R. Co. (C. C.) 4 Fed. 706; Smith v. L. & N. R. Co., 86 Tenn. 198, 6 S. W. 209; So. Express Co. v. Crook, 44 Ala. 468, 4 Am. Rep. 140; So. Exp. Co. v. Bank of Tupelo, 108 Ala. 517, 18 South. 604; Baltimore & Oh. Exp. Co. v. Cooper, 66 Miss. 558, 6 South. 327, 14 Am. St. Rep. 586; Sanford v. Housatonic R. Co., 11 Cush. (Mass.) 155; Adams Exp. Co. v. Reagan, 29 Ind. 21, 92 Am. Dec. 332; G., C. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. York & Johnson, 2 Willson, Civ. Cas. Ct. App. § 813. The rule in 6 Cyc. 505, supra, is stated as follows: "It is usual to insert in bills of lading, or other contracts for shipment, a stipulation that written notice of a claim for loss of or damage to the goods shall be given to the agents of the carrier within some specified time, such as 30 or 90 days, and that unless such notice is given there will be no liability on the part of the carrier, and such stipulations are generally upheld so far as they are found to be reasonable. Cases holding such stipulations to be invalid are usually based on the ground that the terms thereof are unreasonable, rather than on the general invalidity of such conditions. But they are regarded as limitations of the carrier's liability, and therefore as ineffectual against a claim for loss or injury due to the carrier's negligence, and also as invalid where limitation of common-law liability is prohibited by statute." Cases are cited from several states in support of the text. In the case of Rathbone v. Railway Co., 140 N. Y. 48, 35 N. E. 418, the court says: "It is well settled that these stipulations in the contract will not be construed to relieve the carrier from liability for his own negligent acts. His duty and obligation to exercise a proper degree of care of the property while in his custody is not affected by them. Full and sufficient scope is given to their operation when it is held that they exempt the carrier from his common-law responsibility as an insurer of the property."

After our opinion was rendered, a petition for rehearing was filed. Upon further reflection we became somewhat doubtful of our position in this regard. A rehearing was therefore granted, and the case has again been argued and resubmitted. That the courts greatly divide on this question there can be no doubt. It may also be conceded that the greater number of cases hold, and many text-writers seemingly declare the law to be contrary to the views expressed by us. Among them may be cited the following: 4 Elliott on Railroads, § 1512; 1 Hutchinson on Carriers, § 442; Moore on Carriers, 333; 5 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law, 321. Many cases are cited by these text-writers. It is not necessary to set them forth here. The rule declared in 1 Hutchinson on Carriers, § 442, is as follows: "It is frequently the custom for the carrier to insert in the contract of shipment a condition that, in the event of loss, the owner shall give notice of his claim within a specified time. Such conditions are usually to the effect that the notice shall be in writing and presented to some officer or agent of the carrier, either before the goods are removed from the point of destination, or within a certain time thereafter, or within a designated time after the loss has occurred; and when such conditions are reasonable the owner will be precluded from the right to maintain an action against the carrier, unless he has presented the notice within the time stated and in the manner provided." Whether the author in the above quotation is dealing with a "loss" for which the carrier is liable as an insurer, or with a loss or damage occasioned from any cause for which the carrier is liable, including his misconduct and negligence, is not clear. The same is true of the statement in 4 Elliott, § 1512, where it is said: "A valid contract may be made requiring claims for loss or damage to freight to be presented in a certain manner or within a certain time, provided it is reasonable." In Moore on Carriers, at page 333, it is said: "The carrier may lawfully, by contract with the shipper made by clause or stipulation in the bill of lading or shipping receipt or otherwise, provide a reasonable time within which the shipper shall present his claim or give notice of claim for loss or damage, and the manner of giving such notice or presenting his claim, and limit its liability to cases in which the claim shall be presented or notice given in accordance with the terms of the contract." But on page 336 the following statement is made by the same author: "Most of the authorities sustain such stipulations, even where the loss is one caused by the defendant company's negligence. In Texas such a stipulation is held to be a limitation of the common-law liability of the carrier, and of no effect where the loss is one resulting from the carrier's negligence." While some of the cases cited in support of these texts pertain to claims of loss or damage for which the carrier was sought to be held liable as an insurer, yet others pertain to claims of loss or damage occasioned by the negligence of the carrier. Among the latter may be cited: Goggin v. Kan. Pac. Ry. Co., 12 Kan. 416; Sprague v. Mo. Pac. Ry. Co., 34 Kan. 347, 8 Pac. 465; W. & W. Ry. Co. v. Koch, 47 Kan. 753, 28 Pac. 1013; The St. Hubert, 107 Fed. 727, 46 C. C. A. 603; The Westminster, 127 Fed. 680, 62 C. C. A. 406; So. Ry. Co. v. Adams, 115 Ga. 705, 42 S. E. 35; Dawson v. Railway Co., 76 Mo. 514; Hatch v. Minneapolis, etc., Ry. Co. (N. D.) 107 N. W. 1087. The above are not all the cases that are cited on this point; but these sufficiently show that in a number of cases the requirement of notice or the presentation of a claim was held to apply to a loss or damage occasioned by the carrier's negligence, and by reason of their citation in support of the foregoing texts it may fairly be inferred that the text-writers intended the rule declared by them to apply to cases of loss or damage resulting from negligence or misconduct, as well as from other causes.

The cases cited from Illinois, Wisconsin, and New York are not in point, for the reason the rule obtained in those jurisdictions that it was not against the policy of the law to contract against ordinary negligence. All the courts giving effect to such stipulations, when applied to a loss or damage by negligence, in most positive terms assert that it is against public policy to permit a common carrier by special contract to relieve itself from, or limit its liability for, a loss or damage incurred by its negligence or misconduct; but it is asserted that the giving effect to such a stipulation in such a case is not violative of this principle. Some courts have given reasons for such a conclusion. Others merely discuss the question as to whether the stipulation was reasonable under all the facts and circumstances of the case, and, when found to be so, merely assert that it was not against the policy of the law. In some cases the conclusion is supported by the citation of cases where the stipulation was given effect in case of loss for which the carrier was sought to be held liable as an insurer. We well can understand why a stipulation, when reasonably and fairly entered into, requiring notice of claim of loss as a condition precedent to charge the carrier with liability as an insurer, does not contravene the policy of the law under consideration; for it is readily perceived that a loss or damage may occur by accident, dangers of carriage or navigation, and from other causes for which the carrier, at common law, is liable, but against which human skill and vigilance could ordinarily not have guarded. The principle is well illustrated in the case of So. Pac. Exp. Co. v. Caldwell, 21 Wall. (U. S.) 264, 22 L. Ed. 556. Many such losses will and do occur of which the carrier has no knowledge until notified, and unless a notice is given within a reasonable time no opportunity of investigating and ascertaining the facts is afforded it. A stipulation, therefore, that the carrier shall be relieved from the rigid and severe rules of the common law, which hold it liable as an insurer, unless notice of claim of loss shall be given in order that it may protect itself against imposition and fraudulent claims, is no longer regarded as contravening the policy of the law. When the carrier is charged with liability as an insurer, the question of negligence is ordinarily not involved. While the plaintiff in such a case must aver and show a breach of duty, he is not required to aver and prove negligence on the part of the carrier. When the carrier and shipper contract with respect to the former's liability as an insurer, they are not contracting with respect to a liability for the carrier's tort or negligence; and, as remarked by Mr. Justice Strong in the Caldwell Case: "The contract is not a stipulation for exemption from responsibility for the defendant's negligence, or for that of their servants. It is freely conceded that, had it been such, it would have been against the policy of the law and inoperative. A common carrier is always responsible for his negligence, no matter what his stipulations may be." The reasons so well stated by that court why the stipulation was not against the policy of the law, when applied to a case of liability as an insurer, and where the question of negligence was not involved, are now given by many courts in cases of damage or injury to property by negligence, as is well illustrated in the case of Sprague v. U. P. Ry. Co., supra. In that case the action was brought against the carrier for negligence in the management of its cars, by reason of which the plaintiff's horses, which were being shipped, were thrown down, bruised, and injured, so that one of them died and the others were disabled. The reason given why the stipulation in the contract of shipment requiring notice of claim as a condition precedent of liability was not against the policy of the law was that it tended "to protect the company from fraud and imposition in the adjustment and payment of claims for damages by giving the company a reasonable opportunity to ascertain the nature of the damage and its cause."

As we have attempted to show, in a case where the carrier is sought to be held liable as an insurer, there is much reason requiring notice of claim; for, in many instances, the carrier otherwise would not have knowledge of the loss. Even in such case, where it was shown that the carrier had full knowledge of the loss, the failure to give the notice did not defeat the action. When, however, the carrier, through its negligence, inflicts an injury or damage upon property intrusted to it, the reason for the rule no longer exists. The carrier certainly is bound to take notice of its own acts of negligence and of the consequences of such acts. The servants of the carrier undoubtedly are required to be attentive and vigilant in the handling of and looking after property intrusted to their master's care. If, through their negligence, stock under their immediate charge is killed or injured, they, better than any one else, ought to have knowledge of such fact. The carrier has, equally with the shipper, and in many instances much better, opportunity to ascertain the facts and results of its negligence and the extent and nature of the injury or damage inflicted by it. We need but to look at the case in hand to show the inapplicability of such a reason. Here the court found that the carriage of the stock was negligently delayed, and at a place where it could not be unloaded, fed, or watered; that the plaintiff at the time frequently urged the defendant to move the stock to a place where it could have been fed and watered, and, although the defendant well could have done so, nevertheless it refused; and that plaintiff's injury and damage was the direct result of such negligence. That the servants of the defendant in charge of the train, and other agents of the defendant connected with the movement and operation of the train, knew of the delay, goes without saying. That stock requires feeding and watering, and that shrinkage in weight is likely to occur if not done, must have been equally well known to them, especially when the plaintiff frequently complained at the time and urged that the sheep be taken to a place where they could be taken care of. The evidence on the part of the plaintiff shows that the delay was unnecessary, his complaints and requests wholly disregarded, and the defendant's refusal to take the sheep to a place where they could have been watered and fed inexcusable. The court in effect so found. Such finding, on this record, is binding on the defendant. To say that it was not bound to take notice of the consequences of such negligent acts, and was not required to exercise any vigilance in that regard until the shipper arrived with a prepared list of injuries, is but to say that it is not bound to discharge the duties and trust with that degree of care and fidelity imposed upon it by law. Such a holding tends to relax the motives for the exercise of such care.

Why was not the defendant, equally with the plaintiff, accorded every opportunity, before the sheep were unloaded at destination and before they left the stockyards, to investigate the results of its negligence and ascertain the nature and extent of the injury inflicted in consequence of such acts? Upon what principle should the carrier, in such case, be excused from exercising any vigilance in such regard until notified by the shipper, and be discharged from all liability if such notice is not given. The facts concerning plaintiff's damages alleged to have been occasioned by a change in the market could as readily have been ascertained 24 days as 10 days after the arrival of the sheep at destination. We cannot well see why the presentation of a claim of such a loss was necessary in order that the defendant might properly protect itself against fraud and imposition, unless it shall be said that in all cases of tort the wrongdoer shall be timely notified of the mischief done by him, in order that he may, while the transaction is fresh, the better investigate the extent of it. But it is said the servants in charge had no means of determining the extent of shrinkage, for such facts could only be determined by a comparison of the weight of the sheep when delivered to the defendant and when they arrived at destination. It is quite true that the extent of such an alleged damage is largely determined from a consideration of such facts; but, in order that the defendant may protect itself from unjust claims, it is not essential that knowledge of all the facts should be possessed by some particular servant or servants in its employ. The facts concerning its alleged negligence of delay were as easily ascertained 24 days as 10 days after its commission. So was the condition of plaintiff's sheep when delivered to it. Whoever was possessed of knowledge of such fact knew it 24 days as well as 10 days after the sheep arrived at destination. Whatever was known by such persons, and whatever evidence was possessed by them of such fact, could have been ascertained by the defendant one time as well as another, at least until the matter became stale. The record of this case discloses that the sheep on their arrival were weighed at the stockyards, and the average weight of the different kinds of sheep ascertained. The record does not directly disclose the fact, but from the evidence in the case we think it a fair inference that there was kept a stockyard record of such weight. But, whether there was or not, the fact that the sheep were there weighed and the result thereof was as readily ascertained 24 as 10 days thereafter. Such facts, in the very nature of things, were not peculiarly within the knowledge of the plaintiff. They were equally well known to the persons about the stockyards who attended the weighing and the person or persons to whom the sheep were sold. The contention made that the giving of notice within 10 days was essential to enable the defendant to investigate and ascertain the facts, so it might properly have protected itself against an unjust claim, is more plausible than sound. No good reason appears why the defendant, with full knowledge of its negligent acts occasioning the delay, and with knowledge that the natural and probable consequences of such acts would result to plaintiff's damage, was not, equally with the plaintiff, afforded every opportunity to investigate and ascertain the nature and extent of the injury after the sheep arrived at destination and before they left the stockyards.

A further argument made in this connection is that, owing to the vast amount of business conducted by common carriers, and to the impracticability of immediate supervision over their numerous employes, and to the limited knowledge of the servants as to the nature and extent of injuries, such as here, it is but just that notice of claim should be given before rendering the carrier liable. This position is likewise untenable. It involves the violation of the well-recognized doctrine of "respondet superior." If it shall be once said that the master shall not be liable, or held responsible, for the negligence or misconduct of his servants in the discharge of his business and within the scope of their employment, unless notified within a reasonable time, then are not only the fundamental principles upon which the law of common carriers is founded disregarded, but also one of the essential principles of the law of negligence relaxed? Another reason given by courts is expressed in the case of The Westminster, supra, where it is said: "The notice stipulated for is not of the fact of damage, more or less, but of the intent to hold the carrier liable for it, which, on failure to give notice, the latter, in view of the stipulation, may well regard as being waived." With due regard to the very high standing of that court, we submit that the giving of such a reason begs the question; for it assumes the validity of the contract, the very thing to be demonstrated. Undoubtedly, if the carrier may assume such validity, then it may well act upon the assumption that unless notice is given all claim for damages is waived. If the stipulation is invalid, then upon what theory may it be said that the carrier may regulate its conduct upon it? Another reason given is stated in Kalina v. U. P. R. R. Co.,

69 Kan. 172, 76 Pac. 438, as follows: "The clause in question is not one exempting the carrier from its common-law liability, or limiting that liability, but one imposing a condition upon the shipper, which he must observe before he may recover for a breach of the carrier's duty. In other words, it is a condition of recovery, and not an exemption from liability."

Such statements tend rather to confuse the proposition than to solve it. They consist of the making of one statement and denying it by asserting another, or the proving of a negative by an affirmative statement of its opposite. That there is a well-recognized distinction between a substantive right or liability, and remedy, though at times difficult of exact definition, is admitted. The assertion that the liability is not exempted nor limited, but the right of recovery is only conditioned, is not the making of such distinction; nor is the stipulation remedial, and not substantive, if such was intended to be declared. To say that a liability exists unrestricted, but that the remedial right shall be asserted within a prescribed time or under a certain procedure, is one thing. To say that a liability exists, but that no right of action or recovery shall exist until something else is done, is quite another and different thing. The one pertains merely to remedy; the other, to the cause of action itself. If a carrier's contract should expressly provide a liability, to the fullest extent imposed by law, for all torts committed by it, but should further provide that no recovery should be had for such wrongs, there would not be much difficulty in holding such a contract invalid, notwithstanding the argument that might be made that the contract did not affect liability, but only the right of recovery. The natural effect of such a contract would be to destroy or impair the substantive right or liability itself. When it is said that the liability for negligence is not exempted, nor limited, but that there should be no right of recovery with respect to it, there is a substantial denial of the one statement by the making of another. When, also, it is said such liability is not limited, but the right of recovery with respect to it is made to depend upon some condition precedent, it is, in degree, doing the same thing. If there is no right of vindication, or restoration, or recovery for a liability, except upon some condition precedent, it naturally follows that the liability is to that extent limited or conditioned. The condition goes, not to the remedy merely, but to the cause of action itself. Until performance of the condition, no cause or right of action exists; and such is the obvious meaning of the plain terms of the stipulation under consideration.

We now come to the reasons given by other courts, and which are stated in Moore's work on Carriers (page 334), as follows: "They do not relieve carriers from any part of their obligation as common carriers. As such they are bound to the same diligence, fidelity, and care as they would be required to exercise if no such stipulation had been made." We find these expressions first used by Mr. Justice Strong in the Caldwell Case, where, as we have shown, they were used with respect to a stipulation pertaining to a loss or damage not alleged to have been caused by negligence, but where the carrier was sought to be held liable as an insurer. The expressions were made because the loss and damage sought to be recovered had not been incurred by the negligence of the carrier, and because the stipulation did not pertain to such a loss. We do not think Mr. Justice Strong intended that the language used by him should apply to a case of damage or injury incurred by the negligence of the carrier. He had no such case before him. But let us see whether such language can properly be applied to a case of negligence by the carrier. Why is it against the policy of the law to allow the carrier, by special contract, to exempt itself from, or limit its liability for, negligence? It is because of the fiduciary relation between the carrier and the shipper, the inequality of their positions, and the duties owing by the carrier to the public. To permit it to make such a contract tends to make it less careful and prompt in the performance of its duties and obligations, and less faithful in the discharge of its trust. Hence the policy of the law forbids such a contract. Now, is it true that a stipulation providing that the carrier shall not be liable for its negligence, whether ordinary, willful, or gross, except upon the presentation of a claim within a specified time, has no bearing or influence upon the exercise of its care and the discharge of its trust? The question is well answered by the statement that, the more stringent the motives are for the exercise of care and diligence, the greater is the probability that the proper degree of care and diligence will be exercised; the less stringent the motives are, the less likelihood that such care will be exercised. It is readily perceived, in many instances, the motive for the exercise of a proper degree of care is not the same when the right of recovery is dependent upon some condition as when it is made absolute upon the infliction of the injury. The more conditions precedent of recovery which are imposed, the more difficult it is made on the part of the shipper to vindicate his right, and to recover for a loss or damage sustained by him. The more difficult it is made to vindicate the right, the less probable it is that it will be vindicated. Such matters have a natural tendency to influence the carrier in part to graduate its conduct, and to relax the degree of care and fidelity imposed upon it.

From a perusal of the cases we find no satisfactory reason for the conclusion that the stipulation in question does not affect the liability, nor influence the conduct of the carrier in the discharge of its duties, and is, therefore, not against the policy of the law.

We are, however, mindful that the views expressed by us are against the great weight of modern authority. We find ourselves in the position where the conclusion reached by us upon what we believe to be fundamental principles is contrary to the conclusion reached by many able courts upon a consideration of the same principles. When we find such to be the case, we confess the confidence in our original position on this point is somewhat shaken. We have therefore come to the conclusion not to rule the case upon the principle so broadly declared in our original opinion. Our holding in this regard is that a stipulation, when fairly entered into and found to be reasonable under all the circumstances, requiring the presentation of a claim for loss or damage, is not in all cases against the policy of the law, and for that reason ineffectual, merely because the claim pertains to a loss or damage occasioned by negligence. It is not necessary to consider the question when such a stipulation will be regarded reasonable and applicable, nor the circumstances under which the shipper is relieved from the giving of notice or presentation of such a claim, because of the further view entertained by us as to the invalidity of the contract before us. As we have seen, under the general doctrine of this country, a contract which exempts the carrier from, or limits its liability for, negligence, contravenes public policy. When the contract in question is considered as a whole, is it not such a contract? Considering it in its entirety, what was the ruling intention of the parties, as evidenced by the plain language of its terms? Is it with respect to the presentation of a claim for damage or loss of all kinds? Or is it with respect to an exemption from, or limitation of liability for, negligence? The alleged damages were found to have resulted from a negligent delay in transportation. In paragraphs 3 and 4 of the contract it is stipulated in most positive terms that the defendant should not be liable for any loss or damage which might be sustained from delay in transportation or shrinkage or for any other thing or cause not resulting from the defendant's willful or gross negligence. That such and all other stipulations in the contract exempting the defendant from liability for loss or damage, except for gross or willful negligence, are against the policy of the law, requires no discussion. Paragraph 5 relates to the question of presentation of claims for loss or damage or detention, not of all kinds for which the defendant in law would be liable, but for a liability of a loss or damage or detention stipulated about in the preceding paragraphs. We think the only fair meaning of the contract, and the ruling intention of the parties, as declared by its plain terms, are that the defendant should not, in any event, be liable for negligence or misconduct not amounting to gross or willful negligence, and that it should only be liable for gross or willful negligence upon the presentation of a claim. Paragraph 5 cannot be regarded as a separate and independent stipulation wholly unaffected by the obnoxious stipulations preceding it, and treated as merely dealing with the question of the presentation of claims for loss or damage of all kinds and for which the defendant, under the law, would be liable. It is directly related to and affected by the preceding paragraphs. Each is a part and parcel of a contract exempting the defendant from liability for ordinary negligence, and making it liable only for gross or willful negligence upon the presentation of a claim.

After the parties had in unmistakable terms stipulated that there should be no liability for negligence, except for gross or willful negligence, how can it be said that by paragraph 5 they intended to stipulate that there should be a liability for ordinary negligence and for all losses and damages for which the defendant in law is responsible, provided a claim is presented? If such were the intention of the parties, then the words employed by them in paragraphs 3 and 4 were entirely useless. The giving of such a meaning to paragraph 5 is antagonistic to every other provision of the contract. The meaning which we have given it is in harmony with all other provisions of the contract. If the carrier and shipper intend not to contract for an exemption from or a restriction of the former's liability for negligence or misconduct, but merely intend to restrict the latter's remedy by the imposing of a reasonable condition, it ought not to be a difficult matter to express such an intention in language which is certain and which fairly conveys such a meaning. The contract under consideration is not susceptible of such a construction. When the proposition is reduced to its simplest form, it presents the question: Is a contract which exempts a common carrier from liability for ordinary negligence, and which renders it liable alone for gross or willful negligence, and that only upon the presentation of a claim, forbidden by the policy of the law? We think it is, and so hold.

Upon this record such holding controls the case, and necessarily requires a reversal of the judgment. But these further observations might also be noted: Though the stipulation in paragraph 5 were to be regarded valid, can it be held applicable to the loss or damage sustained by plaintiff because of a change in the market? The cases seem to hold that stipulations similar in language as is the one here, requiring the presentation of a claim as a condition precedent of the carrier's liability, cannot be extended to a loss or damage occasioned by a fall of the market. The reasons for such a conclusion are that "agreements of this character are viewed with some strictness by the law, and unless the exemption from liability is clearly expressed it should not be allowed" (Railway Co. v. Poole, 73 Kan. 466, 87 Pac. 465), and that such a loss was not fairly contemplated by the parties and was not reasonably included within the terms of the stipulation. Mo., K. & T. Ry. Co. v. Fry, 74 Kan. 546, 87 Pac. 754; Cornelius v. Atchison, etc., Ry. Co., 74 Kan. 599, 87 Pac. 751; Atchison, etc., Ry. Co. v. Poole, 73 Kan. 466, 87 Pac. 465; Leonard v. C. & A. Ry. Co., 54 Mo. App. 293; Kramer & Co. v. C., M. & St. P. Ry. Co., 101 Iowa, 178, 70 N. W. 119; 5 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law, 324.

The weight of authority also seems to be that, in an action where there is a plea of a special contract in defense limiting or conditioning the carrier's liability, the burden is upon the carrier, not only to show a valid special contract, but also to allege and prove facts and circumstances showing the stipulation to be reasonable. Ft. W. & D. C. Ry. Co. v. Greathouse, 82 Tex. 104, 17 S. W. 834; Kan. & Ark. Valley R. Co. v. Ayers, 63 Ark. 331, 38 S. W. 515; Cox v. Cent. Vt. R. R., 170 Mass. 129, 49 N. E. 97; Brooks & Sons v. West. Un. Tel. Co., 26 Utah, 147, 72 Pac. 499; Westcott v. Fargo, 61 N. Y. 542, 19 Am. Rep. 300; 6 Cyc. 507-519, and cases; 5 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law, 324-326, and cases; notes to cases, 10 A. & E. R. R. C. (N. S.) 864; notes to cases, 13 L. R. A. 518. In the case of Railway Co. v. Greathouse, supra, it was said: "Without determining whether this provision in a contract such as this can in any case be enforced, we do not think the appellant has brought itself within the rules laid down in those cases that permit such contracts to be enforced and that recognize their legality. When such provisions of a carrier's contract are enforced, it is upon the assumption that such agreement is reasonable, when considered in the light of the subject-matter of the contract and the circumstances and surroundings of the parties. To prove that such conditions in a contract are reasonable is a burden resting upon the carrier, who must show by proper pleadings and evidence the existence of facts that call for an enforcement of the condition. There were no pleadings and proof whatever upon this question coming from the carrier. Railway v. Fagan, 72 Tex. 132, 9 S. W. 749, 2 L. R. A. 75, 13 Am. St. Rep. 776; Railway v. Harris, 67 Tex. 167, 2 S. W. 574." And in Galveston, H. & S. A. Ry. Co. v. Williams (Tex. Civ. App.) 25 S. W. 1019, it was observed: "It is the answer that must allege such facts as will show that the contract was reasonable in its character."

The answer here contained no allegations, nor was there any proof upon the question, of the reasonableness of the stipulation. While the court found that the provision requiring the claim to be presented within 10 days after the unloading of the sheep and before they had been mingled with other sheep was a reasonable provision, yet such a finding was a mere conclusion of law, without even evidence in support of it. Conclusions of law cannot be made to perform the office of findings. Dillon Imp. Co. v. Cleaveland (Utah) 88 Pac. 670. The question of reasonableness of such a stipulation is generally one of fact, and is dependent upon the particular facts and circumstances of the case. No facts are alleged, proven, or found from which the reasonableness of the stipulation may be deduced. The finding must be treated as no finding on the subject. The burden being cast upon the defendant to show the reasonableness of the special provision, until such fact is found in defendant's favor, the special contract, though otherwise valid and applicable, cannot avail it. The reasonableness of the provision cannot be determined from the face of the contract. It was well said by the Supreme Court of the state of Illinois: "We think no court could intelligently hold that such a provision [the giving of notice at destination to the station agent or some officer of the carrier before the stock is removed from the place of delivery and mingling with other stock] is in and of itself reasonable and valid, regardless of the facts and circumstances surrounding the parties to the contract." Baxter v. Louisville R. Co., 165 Ill. 78, 45 N. E. 1003. The provision in that case was held unreasonable and invalid, because of the inference from the evidence that the carrier did not have a station agent or officer at the place of destination. To the same effect are Engesether v. Gt. N. Ry. Co., 65 Minn. 168, 68 N. W. 4; Carpenter v. Eastern Ry. Co., 67 Minn. 188, 69 N. W. 720.

So, too, it has been held that stipulations requiring the presentation of claims at a particular place and within a specified time are not applicable to cases where the nature of the injury or extent of loss cannot be reasonably ascertained within such time; nor to damages for delay in transportation; nor where the communicated facts with respect to the loss or injury are as well or better understood by the carrier than the shipper. 6 Cyc. 508, 521, and cases; Popham v. Barnard, 77 Mo. App. 619; Smitha v. Louisville, etc., R. Co., 86 Tenn. 198, 6 S. W. 209. Such provisions have likewise been held unreasonable "if there is indefiniteness and uncertainty as to the agent to whom notice is to be given, or an agent is named to whom it would be impracticable to give notice, or if there is no agent reasonably accessible." 6 Cyc. 506, and cases cited.

These cases but illustrate the rule that what may be a reasonable requirement with respect to the presentation of a claim in one case may be unreasonable in another. There being no allegations nor proof of the reasonableness of the stipulation, the court, on that ground, erred in giving it effect.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment of the court below is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial. Costs to appellant.

UNITED STATES et al. v. CITIZENS' TRADING CO.

(Supreme Court of Oklahoma. Nov. 14, 1907.)

PUBLIC LANDS—REVIEW IN EQUITY—DECISIONS OF LAND DEPARTMENT.

Courts of equity will always interfere to prevent injustice and wrong after the matter has been finally determined in the Land Department, when there has been a manifest misapplication of the law to the facts found by such department.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 41, Public Lands, §§ 301-307.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from District Court, Pawnee County; before Justice Bayard T. Hainer.

Action by the Citizens' Trading Company against the United States and T. E. Gibson, Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Affirmed.

This is an action brought to declare a resulting trust to recover five lots in the townsite of Pawhuska, of which plaintiff below, defendant in error here, claims it had the preference right to purchase under Act Cong. March 3, 1905, c. 1479, 33 Stat. 1061, relative to the sale of the Pawhuska townsite, by reason of having permanent improvements thereon under the terms of that act. The character of the improvements is specifically set out in the petition. The defendant, in his answer and cross-petition, admitted the facts stated in plaintiff's petition to be true, but claimed that the improvements were not in law of the substantial character required by the instructions of the department. Both parties made motion for judgment on the pleadings. Motion of plaintiff below was sustained, judgment rendered in favor of plaintiff, exceptions saved, and the case is brought here for review.

John Embry, U. S. Atty., and Dale & Blerer, for plaintiffs in error. E. W. King, for defendant in error.

IRWIN, J. (after stating the facts as above). Act Cong. March 3, 1905, c. 1479, 33 Stat. 1061, is as follows (omitting the caption): "That there shall be created an Osage Townsite Commission consisting of three members, one of whom shall be the United States Indian agent at the Osage agency, one to be appointed by the chief executive of the Osage tribe, and one by the Secretary of the Interior, who shall receive such compensation as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe, to be paid out of the proceeds of the sale of the lots sold under this act. That the Secretary of the Interior shall reserve from selection and allotment the south half of section 4 and the north half of section 9, township 25 north, range 9 east of the Indian meridian, including the town of Pawhuska, which, except the land occupied by the Indian school buildings, the agency reservoir, the agent's office, the council building, and the residences of agency employes, and a twenty acre tract of land including the Pawhuska cemetery, shall be surveyed, appraised, and laid off into lots, blocks, streets and alleys by said townsite commission under rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, business lots to be twenty-five feet wide, and residence lots fifty feet wide, and sold at public auction, after due advertisement to the highest bidder, by said townsite commission, under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, and the proceeds of such sale shall be placed to the credit of the Osage tribe of Indians: provided, that said lots shall be appraised at their real value, exclusive of improvements thereon or adjacent thereto, and the improvements appraised separately; and provided, further, that any person, church, school, or other association in possession of any of said lots, and having permanent improvements thereon shall have preference right to purchase the same at appraised value, but in case the owner of the improvements refuses or neglects to purchase the same, then such lots shall be sold at public auction at not less than the appraised value, the purchaser at such sale to have the right to take possession of the same upon paying the occupant the appraised value of the improvements."

An examination of this record will disclose that the improvement upon which the occupant claims a preference right of purchase of the lots in controversy were of a permanent character. This fact is clearly set forth, and an accurate and particular description of the kind and character of the improvements is set up in the petition, and the facts are expressly admitted by the answer. This leaves no question as to the improvements being of a valuable and permanent character. This leaves nothing for the court to consider but the question of a misapplication of the law to the facts, and brings the case clearly within the class of cases of which courts of equity should and will take cognizance. King v. Thompson, 3 Okl. 644, 39 Pac. 466; Paine v. Foster, 9 Okl. 214, 53 Pac. 109; Moore v. Robbins, 98 U. S. 530, 24 L. Ed. 848. The improvements in this case being conceded to be lasting, permanent, and valuable, there can be no room for doubt but that the townsite board misapplied the law to the facts; and hence the decision of the district court was right and should be affirmed, which is accordingly done, at the costs of the appellant. All Justices concurring, except Justice HAINER, who, having tried the case below, took no part in this decision, and PANCOAST, J., absent.

SMITH et al. v. SMITH et al.

(Supreme Court of Oregon. Feb. 4, 1908.)

DEEDS—EXECUTION—PROOF—SUFFICIENCY.

Where a defendant who claims land under an unattested and unacknowledged deed containing unexplained erasures, said to have been executed by his father, did not disclose his claim until more than a year after his father's death, and in the meantime permitted the land to be treated as belonging to his father's estate, and allowed the executors to discharge a mortgage, taxes, etc., thereon, his explanation that he did not know that attestation or acknowledgment was necessary, and that he did not disclose the deed to his father's executors because "it was none of their business," was insufficient; there being no claim that his father, an experienced business man, did not understand the necessity of having the deed witnessed and acknowledged, and no explanation of a circumstance tending to dispute defendant's assertion that the deed was signed when it was prepared.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Multnomah County; M. C. George, Judge.

Suit by William C. Smith and another against Benjamin F. Smith and another. From a decree for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

James T. Lawler and E. T. Taggart, for appellants. H. H. Riddell and E. B. Dufur, for respondents.

BEAN, C. J. This is a controversy between the heirs of H. A. Smith, deceased, concerning the title to the home property of their father, being lots 7 and 8, block 21, Highland, Multnomah county. The defendant B. F. Smith claims to be the sole owner thereof, by virtue of a deed executed to him by his father about a year prior to his death. H. A. Smith died on the 18th of May, 1902, leaving a will executed on the same day, by which he bequeathed to his wife $5,000 insurance on his life, subject to the payment of a $1,200 mortgage "upon my house, lots seven and eight, block twenty-one, Highland, Multnomah county, Oregon," and gave to his son B. F. Smith $1,000 in cash, and use of "my home place," and $200 a year for the care and maintenance of the testator's wife during her life; and devised and bequeathed all the rest and residue of his property to his four children in equal shares. Mrs. Smith, his widow, died a short time after her husband's death. At the time of his father's death, and for some time prior thereto, B. F. Smith and family were living in the house on the property in controversy, and continued to so reside during the administration of the estate. H. A. Smith's will was admitted to probate a few days after his death, and the executors nominated by him appointed. They included the property in controversy in the inventory of the estate, with the knowledge and without objection, or protest from B. F. Smith, and afterwards paid the mortgage thereon from funds belonging to the estate, and taxes, insurance, and street assessments. On October 4, 1902, they applied to the county court for an order for the sale of real estate, including the property in controversy, for the payment of debts and expenses of administration, and defendant B. F. Smith admitted service of citation on the matter of such petition, and expressly consented in writing to the order of sale. The order was made, but the funds from other sources were sufficient to meet the expenses of administration and debts of the estate, without the sale of the home place. About the time this fact was ascertained, and more than a year after his father's death, B. F. Smith first asserted title to the property and disclosed the existence of the deed, under which he now claims. This deed purports to have been executed by H. A. Smith and wife on the 21st of May, 1901, about a year prior to the execution of a will asserting title and disposing of the same property. It is neither witnessed nor acknowledged, and, according to defendant's testimony, was prepared by him and signed by his father and mother, delivered to him, and was in his possession for more than a year after the death of his father before it was disclosed to the executors or any other person. In the meantime the property had been considered and treated by all parties, with his knowledge and without objection from him, as belonging to his father's estate, and had been listed and appraised as such. The executors had paid the mortgage, taxes, insurance, and assessments with his knowledge and acquiescence, and without the slightest idea that he had or claimed any interest in the property, other than as an heir. Now, these circumstances, while not conclusive against him, are such as to occasion grave doubts as to the validity of his asserted title, and call upon him for clear and convincing proof thereof, and this, in our opinion, he has not satisfactorily given. He explains the irregularity in the execution of the deed by saying that he did not know that a deed should be witnessed or acknowledged, and his failure to advise the executors of its existence was because it was none of their business. He does not claim, however, that his father, whom the record shows to have been a man of large business experience, did not understand the proper manner of executing deeds conveying real property, and it is hardly probable that he would have executed an instrument intending to convey his home place to his son, without having it witnessed and acknowledged.

Again, it is asserted by defendant that the deed was signed by the grantors at the time it was prepared, but the instrument in evidence shows that the signatures of the grantors are in a different ink from that used in writing the body of the deed, and there is no attempted explanation of this challenging circumstance. And, finally, an inspection of the deed itself raised a suspicion as to its genuineness. A printed form was used for making the deed. In the space designed for the description of the property three or four lines of writing appear to have been erased, and the description of the property in controversy or part thereof written over the erased portion. The nature of the writing erased cannot be determined definitely, but the fact of an erasure can admit of no doubt. The defendant offered no explanation of any of these discrediting facts, and while some of the points were not made by plaintiff in the court below, and probably cannot be urged here as an objection to the admission of the instrument in evidence, they are pertinent and must be considered on the question of the genuineness of such instrument, which is an important, if not the controlling, fact in the case. We do not undertake to adopt any theory as to how the deed came to be in its present form, nor is it necessary for us to do so. It is enough that, without a satisfactory explanation of the matters alluded to, the instrument cannot be accepted as a conveyance of the property in controversy from H. A. Smith to the defendant, and given precedence over the will of the alleged grantors of a later date.

It follows, therefore, that the decree of the court below should be reversed, and it is so ordered.

MAGONE v. PORTLAND MFG. CO.

(Supreme Court of Oregon. Feb. 4, 1908.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT—DUTY OF MASTER—WARNING—MINORS.

Where the dangers of an employment are visible so that any man of ordinary intelligence could not fail to see and comprehend them, an employer is under no obligation to warn the servant of their existence; but if the employé is a minor, who because of his immature age, inexperience, or want of comprehension does not appreciate the danger, though it is open and apparent, it is the duty of the employer to caution him of it, and instruct him how to avoid it.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 34, Master and Servant, §§ 308-316½.]

2. SAME—CARE REQUIRED OF A MINOR—ASSUMPTION OF RISK.

Care and caution of a minor to avoid danger can only be required to the extent that the danger is appreciated by him, and the assumption by a minor of the risks of an employment is commensurate with his age, experience, and capacity.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 34, Master and Servant, §§ 601-609.]

3. SAME—ACTIONS FOR INJURIES—QUESTIONS FOR JURY—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE OF MINOR.

Whether a servant, a minor, was negligent in putting his hand under certain knives of a machine while it was not in motion, held, under the evidence, for the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 34, Master and Servant, §§ 1089-1132.]

4. SAME—EFFECT OF CIRCUMSTANCE.

Where an employé's work requires haste, and his whole energy and attention is absorbed in performing it, he is not conclusively presumed to have a particular danger incident to his work constantly in mind, and the care and attention required may depend upon the facts of the particular case, so that whether they are such as to excuse him from the degree of care and thoughtfulness ordinarily required will become a question of fact for the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 34, Master and Servant, §§ 1089-1132.]

5. SAME—SUFFICIENCY OF WARNING.

Whether a servant, a minor, was sufficiently warned of the dangers of his employment at a certain machine, held, under the evidence, for the jury.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Multnomah County; Alfred E. Sears, Jr., Judge.

Action by Roscoe Magone, by his guardian ad litem, against the Portland Manufacturing Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Plaintiff, by his guardian ad litem, brought this action to recover damages for personal injuries. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Defendant is a corporation operating a mill at St. Johns, Or., for the manufacture of material for boxes, baskets, furniture, etc., by the use of various machines operated by steam power. The particular machine by which plaintiff was injured consists of two stationary knives set opposite each other with the edges downward, about 18 inches long and 6 inches apart, to cut stock for grape baskets, the stock being fed to the knives upon a movable table pressed up against them, which is operated automatically when the machine is in motion. When cut the finished stock is crowded up between the knives and removed by hand from above, the exposed stock being about 18 inches above the edge of the knives. The machine is operated intermittently at the will of the operator, being stopped to place a fresh supply of material on the table, viz., 25 or 30 thicknesses at a time, which would take, plaintiff says, "two or three minutes"; another witness says, "six or seven minutes"—and then the machine is set in motion, and continues so until such material is all cut. When the table is down, the space between it and the knives is about 6 inches. Plaintiff's duty at this machine was to carry away the finished stock from above the knives and place it upon tables situated from a few feet to 15 feet away; and when the machine was stopped for the reloading of the table his duty was to pick up from the floor the culls and waste with a fork and load them upon a wheelbarrow and take them to the engine, about 50 feet away—plaintiff's position being on the opposite side of the machine from the operator—and it kept him very busy. He says: "Why, I had to take the stuff, and run over to one table, and then run back again to get it; had to hurry, it piled up so quick there at the machine." Plaintiff went to work at this machine for the first time about 10 o'clock on the morning of the injury, and as the machine was stopped for the reloading of the table he would put his hand up under the knives to push up the stock that could not be reached from above. When asked why he put his hand up under the knives he said: "Well, I put my hand under the knives, because whenever the machines stopped—after it stopped—I would put my hand under the knives to get out the place for a distance of about 18 inches, and then I would go and clean up these here culls over the floor. I have to keep the waste from the machine, and when the machine would start up I would get back there in time. I would hear the machine start up, and get back in time before the machine would run over—the culls would run over—not the culls, but the stock, would run over the top and fall on the floor. I wanted to get back in time that way. Well, I would have more time that way. If I didn't do that, why then I would have to keep watching the machine so close I could not clean up the floor. I could not go far enough away. So I would clean up that, and I would not have to be watching the machine all the time while I went to clean up the floor, and as soon as I would hear the machine start to going then I would go back and be there in plenty of time." In another answer he says: "Well, it was all I could do to keep up with it. I could hardly keep up with it. There was so much stuff." He had been at work at this machine only about three-fourths of an hour when he again put his hand under the knives to remove the stock between them, and the machine was started, as he describes it: "When I went to get it out that time I was shoving it up through. I don't know whether I got it all out or not that time. The machine came right down and took my hand away. It hit so I didn't know it was off." Then again he says that it started up quicker that time than before; that it generally waits a minute or two, but that time it started a good deal quicker—in about 15 seconds. Plaintiff was about 16 years and 3 months old at the time of the injury. He was in the sixth grade in the public school. Previous to this time he had lived about four years in Sellwood, and then about two years in St. Johns. The only experience he had had in any kind of work prior to his employment by defendant on January 19, 1906, was about a month in a shingle mill helping to fix some concrete and assisting to clean trash out of the conveyor, and a little while in a brickyard wheeling soft brick. The accident occurred on the 13th of February, 1906. Prior to the morning of the accident he was off-bearer from a jointer, a machine consisting of one long knife, the material from which was received by the plaintiff directly from the knife. On the day he first went to work for defendant he was told by Oberg, the operator of the jointer, to "be careful of the knives," and at the time of the motion for the nonsuit there was no evidence of any other or different warning or caution given to plaintiff at any time.

R. W. Wilbur, for appellant. R. W. Montague and W. H. Stivers, for respondent.

EAKIN, J. (after stating the facts as above). The negligence of the defendant, alleged and relied upon by the plaintiff as the basis of recovery, is that the defendant carelessly and negligently failed and neglected to caution or warn plaintiff of the dangerous character of the said machine, and by reason of plaintiff's immaturity and inexperience he did not comprehend or appreciate the danger, and this is denied by the answer. And it further sets up the affirmative defense of contributory negligence that plaintiff knew of the danger, and that the injury was the result of want of care on the part of himself or of a fellow servant. Upon the trial at the close of plaintiff's evidence defendant moved the court for nonsuit (1) for the reason that there was no evidence to show any negligence on the part of defendant; (2) that it appears that defendant was guilty of contributory negligence; (3) that plaintiff assumed the risks of his employment; and (4) that the injury was the result of the negligence of a fellow servant. The motion was denied by the court, and a verdict rendered for the plaintiff, and the alleged error of the court in denying the motion for the nonsuit is the only question submitted on the appeal.

The general rule as to the duty of the master to warn the servant of the dangers incident to the employment is laid down by 4 Thompson, Law of Neg. § 4061, as follows: "The master owes no such legal duty to the servant in respect to dangers which are open, visible, and obvious to the comprehension of the servant, considering his years, experience, and understanding. In the case of an adult servant of sound mind the rule is understood to be that, where the dangers of the employment are visible, so that any man of ordinary intelligence, though not an expert, could not fail to see and comprehend them, an employer is under no legal obligation to warn the servant of their existence; but in cases of infants, as we shall hereafter see, the rule is to be applied with reference to their inexperience and want of comprehension." The question here is whether the age, experience, and comprehension of plaintiff was such as to render the danger open, visible, and obvious to him; that is, whether it was a matter of law or a question of fact and law for the jury under proper instructions. It is settled in this state that care and caution to avoid danger can be required of a minor to the extent only that such danger is appreciated by him, taking into consideration his age, experience, and comprehension of it. The assumption by the minor of the risks incident to the employment is commensurate with his age, experience, and capacity. Mundhenke v. Oregon C. Mfg. Co., 47 Or. 127, 8 Pac. 977, 1 L. R. A. (N. S.) 278; Westman v. Wind R. Lbr. Co. (Or.) 91 Pac. 478; Greenway v. Conroy et al., 160 Pa. 185, 28 Atl. 692, 40 Am. St. Rep. 715. In Mundhenke v. Oregon C. Mfg. Co., supra, Mr.

Chief Justice Wolverton says: "It has been determined by this court that only such care and caution to avoid the dangers of accident can be expected or required of a person of immature age as is common to other persons of his years of prudence, forethought, and discretion. * * * This must necessarily be so, because infancy and youth spring into manhood and maturity by degrees only, and responsibility develops accordingly." In MacDonald v. O'Reilly, 45 Or. 589, 599, 78 Pac. 753, a case of an infant of tender years, and the liability not arising between master and servant, Mr. Justice Bean says: "There has been a time in the life of every person of mature judgment, as all agree, when he was incapable of exercising the care and judgment necessary to avoid or avert danger, and was non sui juris. There is a time also when he is in law an adult, and responsible as such. Between these two periods is a transition stage, during which his capacity is a matter of fact for the jury." In Westman v. Wind R. Lbr. Co. (Or.) 91 Pac. 478, 480, Mr. Chief Justice Bean says: "It was defendant's duty, therefore, to point out or give him notice of the danger incident to his employment and the risks attending the same, * * * unless they were so open and apparent that one of his age, experience, and capacity, in the exercise of ordinary care and prudence, should know and appreciate them to the same extent as an adult; and that was a question for the jury." These authorities lead to the inevitable conclusion that, if the minor, by reason of immature age, inexperience, or want of comprehension, does not appreciate the danger, although it is open and apparent, then it is the duty of the master to caution him of it, and instruct him how to avoid it. 4 Thompson, Law of Neg. §§ 4092-4093; Bohn Mfg. Co. v. Erickson, 55 Fed. 943, 5 C. C. 341.

The danger or risk which plaintiff incurred was not his contact with machinery in operation. In that it differs from most of the cases on this question. His was the risk of being surprised by the machine starting prematurely. Aside from the question of the carelessness of a fellow servant that this suggests, it also has to do with the charge of contributory negligence by plaintiff. When he placed his hand under the knife the machine was at rest and harmless, except for the danger of its starting unawares. He had previously noted that it took a certain time to reload the table, and was acting upon the presumption that such stops would continue uniform. He was rushed with his work, and absorbed with the one thought of keeping up with it, attempting to economize his time. Under these circumstances we are not justified in saying that as a matter of law such act was contributory negligence on his part. Dowling v. Allen & Co., 74 Mo. 13, 41 Am. Rep. 298. It is a question of fact and law for the jury, under proper instructions, to say whether the danger was open, visible, and obvious to plaintiff, considering his age, experience, and capacity. The defendant urges that, because the plaintiff knew if he got his hand under the knives while the machine was running it would be hurt; that, therefore, it was negligence for him to put his hand in the machine; and that he is thereby precluded from recovery. His testimony upon this matter is as follows: "Q. Didn't you know if you put your hand under there and it started it would cut your hand off? A. Yes; if it would start up, I knew it would get my hand. Q. Well, why did you do it? A. Well, I didn't suppose it would start up so quick. I didn't think about that. I was thinking about getting the stuff out of there the shortest time. I was thinking of getting the stuff out of the machine so as I could get that off of the floor. I wasn't thinking much about the knives. I was thinking of just keeping up with the work." Where plaintiff's work required haste, and his whole energy and attention was absorbed in performing it, he is not conclusively presumed to have constantly in mind a particular danger incident to his work. The care and attention required of an employe while working about dangerous machinery may depend upon the facts of the particular case—whether they were such as to excuse him from that degree of care and thoughtfulness, which a prudent man would ordinarily exercise. Whether in such a case the injured party was guilty of contributory negligence is a question of fact for the jury. In Viohl v. N. P. Lbr. Co., 46 Or. 297, 301, 80 Pac. 112, Mr. Justice Bean says: "Indeed, in an action against a master to recover damages for an injury to a servant, due to the negligence of the former, the question of contributory negligence on the part of the injured party is ordinarily a question of fact in all cases. * * * It is not declared as a matter of law in any case, unless the danger was not only avoidable if the servant had acted prudently, but also such as no prudent man would have incurred. Mere knowledge of the danger is not conclusive of negligence in failing to avoid it. A servant's knowledge and his voluntary exposure to the danger are probative facts from which the ultimate fact of negligence must be determined, but they are not conclusive." See, also, Nosler v. Coos B. R. Co., 39 Or. 331, 64 Pac. 644; Roth v. N. P. Lbr. Co., 18 Or. 205, 22 Pac. 842; Johnston v. O. S. L. Ry. Co., 23 Or. 94, 31 Pac. 283. In the latter case the danger was open and visible, and the question of contributory negligence was held to be for the jury, and a nonsuit was set aside.

Defendant insists, however, that plaintiff was duly warned of the danger, and, therefore, it was not at fault. The only warning was that given on the 19th of January, the day he began work for the defendant, not by the superintendent, or foreman of the defendant, but by a fellow workman. He says: "Mr. Oberg kind of warned me from the machine." He said: "Be careful of the knives." This referred to the jointer. It was more than three weeks later when he went to work at the machine in which he was injured. It was operated intermittently, and this was apparently what misled the plaintiff. He had been shown how to take hold of the stock in carrying it away to avoid dropping it; but there was no reference in such instructions to the dangers incident to the work. 4 Thompson, Law of Neg. § 4068, says: "The master is here, as in every other case, bound to act reasonably and justly; and this rule requires him to give suitable warning and instructions to a minor employé in regard to any danger, whether open or concealed, where the danger is not sufficiently obvious to the intelligence or experience of the employé in the exercise of ordinary care on his part; this care being measured by the maturity of his faculties and the amount of his experience." And he further says that the warning should be graduated to the youth, ignorance, and inexperience of a minor. In Coombs v. New Bedford Cordage Co., 102 Mass. 572, 3 Am. Rep. 506, in the case of a boy, 14 years of age, the dangers of the machinery were open and apparent, and it was held that whether the boy appreciated the danger, and whether the defendant had given him sufficient or reasonable notice of it, were questions for the jury. And on the second appeal (at page 596 of 102 Mass., 3 Am. Rep. 506) the court held that the notice of the nature of the risk to be given by an employer to a minor must be such as will enable a person of his youth and inexperience in business intelligently to appreciate the nature of the danger attending its performance; and it is held that this is a question of fact for the jury. To the same effect was King v. Lbr. Co., 93 Mich. 172, 53 N. W. 10; Bohn Mfg. Co. v. Erickson, 55 Fed. 943, 5 C. C. A. 341. The work of plaintiff in the manner of its execution at the machine where he was injured in no manner resembled the work at the jointer. The machine was already in motion when the plaintiff was called to off-bear from it. Whether he should have been cautioned to keep entirely away from the knives, even when not in operation or as to the irregularity of its operation, or otherwise impressed with the dangers of the situation, depended upon plaintiff's capacity to appreciate it. Whatever was required to fix in his mind the risk to which his work was incident is the measure of defendant's duty. It is said by Mr. Justice McGraff in King v. Lbr. Co., supra: "In determining the question of the sufficiency of the notice it is proper and necessary to take into consideration, not only the plaintiff's youth and inexperience, but also the nature of the service, and the degree to which his attention while at work would need to be devoted to its performance. As we have seen that the extent of his capacity is a matter for the jury, it is also for them to determine from the whole case whether the notice given was sufficient or reasonable to enable plaintiff to appreciate the danger.

Therefore the motion for the nonsuit was properly denied, and the judgment is affirmed.

BECKWITH v. GALICE MINES CO. et al.
(Supreme Court of Oregon. Jan. 28, 1908.)

1. LARCENY — FALSE PRETENSES — DISTINCTION.

Where possession of personal property is obtained from the owner by fraud, trick, or device, and the owner intends to part with both possession and the title when he surrenders control of the property, the offense is obtaining property by false pretenses; but if the possession is fraudulently secured, and the owner does not intend to part with the title, the offense is larceny.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 32, Larceny, § 32; vol. 23, False Pretenses, § 16.]

2. CORPORATIONS — STOCK — "CERTIFICATE OF STOCK."

A certificate of stock is the written evidence of the right of a party to a pro rata share of the net profits of a corporation when declared, or to a like share of the assets after payment of its debts in case of dissolution of the corporation. Such certificates are not negotiable, but the owners may be estopped to assert title as against bona fide purchasers for value without notice.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 12, Corporations, § 404.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 2, pp. 1032-1033.]

3. SAME — TITLE — BONA FIDE PURCHASER — ESTOPPEL.

Plaintiff, pursuant to a contract for the sale of certain mining stock, sent the certificates containing a power of transfer duly signed to a bank designated by the seller, with instructions that it should collect a draft attached for the price, and then deliver the certificates to the buyer. The bank was in fact a mere pretended institution, organized by the buyer to promote his criminal operations in securing possession of unlisted securities without paying therefor. The bank, without authority, delivered the certificates to the buyer, who immediately sold the stock for less than its value, and the stock after several transfers came into hands of defendants, who were bona fide purchasers for value. Held that, as plaintiff's intention was to transfer the title to the stock, and his voluntary act in delivering the stock to the bank with the power of attorney executed in blank permitted the buyer to perpetrate the fraud, plaintiff was estopped to deny defendant's ownership.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Multnomah County; John B. Cleland, Judge.

Action by J. S. Beckwith, doing business under the style of J. S. Beckwith & Co., against Galice Mines Company and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

This is a suit to enjoin the transfer on the books of a corporation of certain shares of stock, evidenced by certificates, and to secure a surrender thereof. The complaint sets forth some of the facts hereinafter detailed, and alleges inter alia that the plaintiff at all the times stated herein was the owner of the stock mentioned, which was stolen from him and carried away by some person unknown to him, and that he had never received any compensation therefor. The defendant the Galice Consolidated Mines Company, a corporation, which issued the stock, and the defendants A. B. Cousin and Milton Weidler, who, at the days specified, were respectively the manager and secretary of the company, having no interest in the result of the suit, did not controvert the facts stated in the plaintiff's primary pleading. J. H. Pickart, H. A. Combs, and the Harry S. Lewis & Co., a corporation, by leave of court, were made parties defendant, and jointly answered, denying the material allegations of the complaint, and averring in effect that they were severally the owners of the stock mentioned, which each purchased in good faith for a valuable consideration, and without any notice of the plaintiff's rights to or interest in the property. The reply denied the allegations of new matter in the answer; and, the cause coming on for trial, the parties stipulated the facts, in substance, as follows: The plaintiff, J. S. Beckwith, is a broker, doing business at Pendleton, Or., under the firm name of J. S. Beckwith & Co., and dealing in unlisted mining stocks. The defendant mining company prior to October 10, 1905, issued two certificates of its stock to Robert C. Yenney for 10,000 shares each, and one certificate to E. D. Gaynor for 5,000 shares, in which vouchers it is stated that they were transferable on the books of the corporation only by the holder thereof in person, or by his attorney, upon a surrender of the certificate, properly indorsed. These certificates were transferred to the plaintiff by the persons to whom they were issued; but as the assignments are identical, except as to the name of the person subscribed thereto, only one indorsement will be given, to wit: "For value received, ——— hereby assign and transfer unto ——— shares of the capital stock represented by the within certificate, and do hereby irrevocably constitute and appoint ——— to transfer said stock on the books of the within-named corporation, with full power of substitution in the premises. Dated ——— 190—. [Signed] Robert C. Yenney. In presence of [Signed] L. Y. Keady." Prior to October 12, 1905, one H. Levy had been dealing in such stock at Chicago, Ill., and his name then appeared in a list of persons engaged as brokers in that city, at which time he notified the plaintiff that his offer to sell 25,000 shares of the Galice Consolidated Mines Company at 5¾ cents per share was accepted, whereupon he directed that the certificates, properly indorsed, should be sent to the Garfield Bank of Chicago, with instructions to hold the stock until the money stipulated should be paid. The plaintiff thereupon, without making any other indorsements of the certificates, placed them in an envelope, to which was attached a bill of exchange drawn on Levy, payable at five days sight to the order of the First National Bank of Pendleton, Or., for $1,437.50. The following address, "Mr. H. Levy, Chicago, Ill., Care of Garfield National Bank (Examination permitted)," was written on the envelope, which, with its contents, was delivered to the Pendleton bank to forward by mail as indicated. The cashier of the Pendleton bank wrote to the Garfield National Bank of Chicago as follows: "I inclose herewith for collection and return our regular No. 38,529. No protest. H. Levy. $1,437.50"—and placed the letter and the envelope so delivered in another wrapper, which was addressed and forwarded by mail to the Garfield National Bank, Chicago, Ill. Soon thereafter the plaintiff received from Levy a telegram, which, omitting the immaterial parts, is as follows: "Stock not at Garfield Bank. If you mailed it to Garfield National Bank, notify postmaster by mail to deliver it to the Garfield Bank, 56 Fifth Avenue. Postmaster will not recognize instructions by wire. There is no Garfield National Bank. Wire answer." Upon the receipt of this message the Pendleton bank, complying with the plaintiff's request, instructed the postmaster at Chicago to deliver the envelope containing the papers specified, as thus directed by Levy. The Garfield Bank was not organized as a banking corporation, and never did any legitimate banking business; but Levy, or one George R. Neville, had procured its name to be inserted in the Rand-McNally Bankers' Directory, with address as 1028 E. Garfield boulevard, in order to advance their fraudulent schemes. The Garfield Bank is a pretended institution, and as such was conducted by Levy, Neville, and others to promote their criminal operations in securing possession of unlisted mining stocks which they disposed of without making any returns in money therefor. The plaintiff, prior to October 12, 1905, had never done any business with Levy or his associates; nor did he know either of them, or such simulated bank, or their method of doing business. The Garfield Bank, upon the receipt of the envelope mentioned, and without any authority therefor, delivered the certificates to Levy, who sold all the stock in question to brokers at prices not exceeding two cents per share; and neither he, his associates, nor the bank ever made any payment therefor, or accounted in any manner for the certificates. The method whereby the plaintiff was deprived of the stock was practiced by Levy and Neville prior thereto in dispossessing many other persons of like property. Levy, in November, 1905, was arrested and held under an indictment, which charged him with using the United States mails for fraudulent purposes, and Neville, to escape apprehension, left Chicago, and is a fugitive from justice. The stock in question, after several transfers, was purchased by the defendants: J.

H. Pickart, 10,000 shares for $325; H. A. Combs, 5,000 shares for $162.50; and the Harry S. Lewis & Company, a corporation, 10,000 shares for $300. Each of the defendants last named was a bona fide purchaser of the stock for value, and obtained a certificate therefor, relying upon the authority conferred by the assignment and power of attorney, and each secured such property without notice or knowledge of any claim thereto on the part of the plaintiff. Based on these facts, which in a more extended form the court adopted as its findings, the temporary injunction that had been issued was dissolved, and the suit dismissed, from which decree the plaintiff appeals.

J. A. Fee, L. B. Reeder, and McCourt & Phelps, for appellant. H. K. Sargent, for respondents.

MOORE, J. (after stating the facts as above). It is contended by plaintiff's counsel that the mode adopted by Levy to secure possession of the stock constitutes larceny whereby no title passed by his delivery of the certificates to the persons from whom the defendants, answering herein, obtained them, and hence an error was committed in dismissing the suit. In support of the doctrine thus maintained two decisions of this court are cited: In State v. Skinner, 29 Or. 599, 46 Pac. 368, the defendant was indicted for the crime of larceny by bailee. At his trial evidence was introduced tending to show that, as an agent of a building and loan association, the defendant falsely represented to one R. B. Dixon that, in order to secure a loan of money from his principal, the applicant, as a condition and guaranty of good faith, was required to advance 1 per cent. of the sum desired, $10 of which was to be paid for procuring and examining an abstract of the title to the farm land offered as security, if the loan was approved, and the remainder to be credited on the note given as evidence of the indebtedness; but if the application for the loan was rejected, the money so paid was to be returned. Dixon thereupon applied for a loan of $10,000, and gave the defendant $100, which the latter converted to his own use. A judgment of conviction having been rendered, the defendant appealed; his counsel maintaining that the evidence was insufficient to establish the existence of any trust relation between the defendant and Dixon, and hence the trial court erred in refusing to direct a verdict of acquittal as requested. In affirming the judgment it was held that the evidence was sufficient to show that Dixon parted with the title to the money advanced only in case a loan was made, and for that reason the testimony was sufficient to warrant a conviction. In deciding that case an excerpt from the opinion of Mr. Justice Caton, in Welsh v. People, 17 Ill. 339, is taken in distinguishing between simple larceny and larceny by bailee as follows:

"Where * * * the alleged larceny is perpetrated by obtaining the possession of the goods by the voluntary act of the owner under the influence of false pretenses and fraud, * * * there is no real difficulty in deducing the correct rule by which to determine whether the act was a larceny and felonious, or a mere cheat and swindle. The rule is plainly this: If the owner of the goods alleged to have been stolen parts with both the possession and the title to the goods to the alleged thief, then neither the taking nor the conversion is felonious. It can but amount to a fraud. It is obtaining goods under false pretenses. If, however, the owner parts with the possession voluntarily, but does not part with the title, expecting and intending that the same thing shall be returned to him, or that it shall be disposed of on his account, or in a particular way, as directed or agreed upon, for his benefit, then the goods may be feloniously converted by the bailee, so as to relate back and make the taking and conversion a larceny. The pointed inquiry in such a case must always arise, did the owner part with the title to the thing, and was the legal title vested in the prisoner? If so, he was not guilty of larceny." The other case is State v. Ryan, 47 Or. 338, 82 Pac. 703, 1 L. R. A. (N. S.) 862, in which the defendant was charged with the crime of larceny. At his trial testimony was introduced tending to show that pursuant to his fraudulent representations he induced one John F. Roth to deliver to him $2,000 as evidence of responsibility to hold a sum of money claimed to have been staked on a trial of human speed, which proved to be a fake race. The court thereupon charged the jury inter alia as follows: "So you are to consider whether or not this whole transaction was a mere scheme or device to steal Roth's money." An exception having been taken to such language, it was contended by defendant's counsel, on an appeal from a judgment of conviction, that an error was thus committed. In affirming the judgment, a part of the opinion of Mr. Justice Caton (Welsh v. People, supra) is again quoted, and it was ruled that, if the possession of the money was obtained by fraud, trick, or device, and the owner intended to part with the title when he surrendered the control, the offense, if any, was obtaining money under false pretenses, but that, though the possession might have been secured in the manner last indicated, yet, if the owner did not intend to part with the title, the crime was larceny, and hence the instruction was a correct statement of the law applicable to the facts involved.

The elementary proposition thus announced is undoubtedly controlling in the case at bar, and the question to be considered is whether or not the delivery of the certificates to the Garfield Bank of Chicago manifests an intention on the part of the plaintiff to dispose of the title to the property, or evinces such conduct, on his part, as to estop him, as is alleged in the answer, from asserting any right to the stock as against the parties who purchased it in good faith, for a valuable consideration, and without any notice or knowledge of the means adopted to effectuate the transfer. A certificate of stock is the written evidence of the right of a party to a pro rata share of the net profits of a corporation when declared, or to a like share of all its property, after the payment of its debts, in case of a dissolution of the artificial being. Such certificates are not negotiable instruments; but the owners thereof have frequently been held to have been estopped to assert any title thereto as against bona fide purchasers thereof for value, without notice of the rights of prior holders. This rule is founded upon the principle that, when the owner of corporate stock voluntarily delivers to another a certificate evidencing a right to participate in the profits or property of a corporation, indorsed in blank, but containing all the indicia of ownership of the property, he is estopped to assert a title thereto as against a person, who in good faith and for value, purchased the certificate from the apparent owner, relying upon the written assignment. The reason advanced for this rule is thus stated by a text-writer: "In view of the custom by which certificates indorsed in blank are transferable from hand to hand, like negotiable paper, the owners of such certificates should be required to use the utmost care and diligence in their safe keeping. If a bona fide purchaser should be deceived through any negligence or want of diligence in this respect, justice requires that the owner should suffer the loss." Morawetz, Priv. Corp. (2d Ed.) § 190. As supporting the text quoted, the case of Shattuck v. American Cement Company, 205 Pa. 197, 54 Atl. 785, 97 Am. St. Rep. 735, affords a good illustration. In that case the plaintiff secured a title to certain certificates of stock, issued by the defendant to another, and delivered to him with an assignment and power of attorney indorsed thereon in blank. Without surrendering the certificates and obtaining others in lieu thereof, or filling the blank spaces in the indorsement, the plaintiff took the certificates to brokers with whom he had been accustomed to deal. The certificates, inclosed in an envelope on which the plaintiff's name was written, were placed in a pocketbook in a safe in which the brokers were in the habit of keeping securities belonging to their customers. One of the brokers, without authority from or knowledge of the plaintiff, took the certificates from the wrapper and pledged them to a bank as collateral security for a bona fide loan of money, made to him in the name of his firm, without notice of any interest of the plaintiff therein. Default having been made in the payment of the sum lent, the bank sold the certificates to third parties, whereupon a suit was instituted to enjoin the defendant from transferring on its books such certificates and issuing others in place thereof. The relief sought was granted by the lower court; but on appeal the decree was reversed, the court holding that the rights of a bona fide holder as against the true owner of the stock to whom the apparent owner had sold or pledged it do not depend on a negotiable character of the certificates, but rest on the principle that, where one has conferred upon another by a written transfer all the indicia of ownership of property, he is estopped to assert title to it as against a third person, who has in good faith purchased it for value from the apparent owner. So too, in McNeil v. Tenth National Bank, 46 N. Y. 325, 7 Am. Rep. 341, it was held that, where the owner of bank stock delivers to his brokers, to secure a balance of account, certificate of shares, indorsed with blank assignment, and irrevocable power of transfer, and the brokers without his knowledge pledge the shares with other securities for advances, one who pays the advances at the brokers' request, and in good faith receives from them the certificates and other securities, is entitled to hold the shares as against the owner for the full amount of the advances remaining unpaid, after the other securities are exhausted. In deciding that case Mr. Justice Rapallo, speaking for the court, says: "It must be conceded that, as a general rule, applicable to property other than negotiable securities, the vendor or pledgor can convey no greater right or title than he has. But this is a truism, predicable of a simple transfer from one party to another where no other element intervenes. It does not interfere with the well-established principle that, where the true owner holds out another, or allows him to appear, as the owner of or as having full power of disposition over the property, and innocent third parties are thus led into dealing with such apparent owner, they will be protected. Their rights in such cases do not depend upon the actual title or authority of the party with whom they deal directly, but are derived from the act of the real owner, which precludes him from disputing as against them the existence of the title or power which, through negligence or mistaken confidence, he caused or allowed to appear to be vested in the party making the conveyance." To the same effect see, also, 28 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law (2d Ed.) 879; 10 Cyc. 631; Brittan v. Oakland Bank, 124 Cal. 282, 57 Pac. 84, 71 Am. St. Rep. 58; Walker v. Detroit Transit Ry. Co., 47 Mich. 338, 11 N. W. 187; Mount Holly, etc., Co. v. Ferree, 17 N. J. Eq. 117; Pennsylvania R. Co.'s Appeal, 86 Pa. 80; Wood's Appeal, 92 Pa. 379, 37 Am. Rep. 694; Burton's Appeal, 93 Pa. 214.

In the case at bar the Garfield Bank of Chicago was evidently organized to promote the fraudulent practices of Levy and his associates, who knew that certificates of stock, assigned in blank, would not in all probability be sent to strangers as intending purchasers. The insertion in a Bankers' Directory of such pretended institution would allay suspicion, and give color to Levy's apparent honesty, when he requested the plaintiff to send the certificates to that bank, properly indorsed, to be held until the consideration agreed upon had been paid. The First National Bank of Pendleton, instead of mailing the certificates to its regular correspondent in Chicago, which would undoubtedly have been done except for the plaintiff's request, obeyed his direction, and sent the papers, and ultimately caused the postmaster of that city to deliver them to the simulated bank. That the scheme throughout was the rankest kind of fraud will be admitted. The plaintiff, however, voluntarily made such bank his agent, clothed with apparent authority, and surrendered possession of the certificates with the intent that the title to the stock should be transferred to Levy, and the only breach of the agreement consists in his failure to pay the consideration which he had promised for the stock. The facts herein are not the same as in State v. Skinner, 29 Or. 590, 46 Pac. 368, or in State v. Ryan, 47 Or. 338, 82 Pac. 703, 1 L. R. A. (N. S.) 862, for in such cases the title to the money, the possession of which was delivered to the respective defendants, was never expected to pass to them.

It was the plaintiff's voluntary act that made it possible for the defendants, answering herein, to rely upon the apparent ownership of the stock, evidenced by the assignment and irrevocable power of attorney executed in blank, and as a consequence of such belief to expend their money without notice of any adverse right in or title to the stock. The plaintiff's intention to transfer the title to the stock, and his conduct in relation thereto, estop him, and bring the case within the rule that, when one of two innocent persons must necessarily sustain injury by the fraudulent act of a third party, he who first trusted such party, and placed in his hands the means of committing the wrong, must bear the loss.

The decree is therefore affirmed.

TRICKEY v. CLARK et al.

(Supreme Court of Oregon. Jan. 28, 1908.)

1. TRIAL—WAIVER AND CORRECTION OF ERRORS—REFUSAL OF NONSUIT.

Though plaintiff did not prove a case sufficient to go to the jury, a refusal of a nonsuit will not be disturbed if defendant afterward supplied the omission.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 46, Trial, § 982.]

2. MASTER AND SERVANT—INJURY TO SERVANT—NEGLIGENCE OF MASTER—QUESTION FOR JURY.

Whether defendants exercised reasonable care in providing a safe fastening for a lever, by the displacement of which a servant was injured, held, under the evidence, to be a question for the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 34, Master and Servant, §§ 1011-1013, 1017.]

3. SAME—CONCURRING NEGLIGENCE OF MASTER AND FELLOW SERVANT.

A master is liable for injuries to a servant caused by the concurring negligence of the master and a fellow servant, which would not have happened but for the master's negligence.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 34, Master and Servant, §§ 515-534.]

4. SAME—INJURY TO SERVANT—PROXIMATE CAUSE—QUESTION FOR JURY.

Whether the knocking loose of a carriage fastener by a fellow employé falling against it, resulting in plaintiff's son being injured, was a natural consequence to be anticipated from defendant's failure to provide a safe and suitable fastener, held, under the evidence, a question for the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 34, Master and Servant, § 1016.]

5. TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—FAILURE TO REQUEST.

Where a party did not request a direct instruction upon a point, he may not complain of the court's failure to instruct thereon.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 46, Trial, § 627.]

6. EVIDENCE—ADMISSIONS BY AGENT—COMPETENCY.

In an action to recover for injuries to plaintiff's son, resulting from the lever of a log carriage becoming unfastened, statements by defendant's agent while reconstructing the mill that the lever fastening was defective was properly received, as notice of such defect to the agent was notice to defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 20, Evidence, § 909.]

7. SAME—OPINION EVIDENCE—EXPERT TESTIMONY—WHEN PROPER.

In an action for injuries resulting from a lever being defectively fastened, the opinion of expert millmen as to the safety and propriety of the fastening was not necessary or competent, where the construction of the device was fully explained to the jury, and no particular skill was required to determine its safety.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 20, Evidence, § 2310.]

8. SAME—MATTERS OF COMMON KNOWLEDGE.

In an action for injuries resulting from a lever being defectively fastened, testimony that the pin in the fastener was so loose that the jar of the mill worked it out, and that the fall of the fastener tended to knock it out, given in explaining the models of the lever and fastener to the jury, was not expert testimony.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 20, Evidence, § 2310.]

9. APPEAL—RECORD—QUESTIONS PRESENTED—ARGUMENT OF COUNSEL.

Where an objection to an argument was overruled on the ground that it was in reply to defendant's argument, the argument of defendant's counsel not being in the record, such ruling cannot be reviewed.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, § 2896.]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Multnomah County; Alfred F. Sears, Judge.

Action by Charles G. Trickey, as guardian ad litem for Harry K. Trickey, a minor, against O. M. Clark and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

This is an action to recover damages for personal injury suffered by plaintiff's son, a lad about 17 years of age, while working for defendants. At the time of the injury, and for some time prior thereto, defendants were operating a steam sawmill at Linnton, a few miles below Portland, which they had purchased a few months previously. The mill was equipped with an upright iron feed lever fastened to the floor about 2½ feet from the saw pit, and which was connected with the engine and operated by the sawyer in moving the log carriage forward and backward while cutting lumber. When the lever was in an upright position the log carriage was at rest; but as there was danger of it being accidentally moved, and the carriage set in motion, it was provided with a cast-iron drop fork lock or fastener attached to the frame a few inches from the floor on the side next to the saw pit, and an iron pin passing through the lever and frame just below the lock for the purpose of securely holding the lever in position when the carriage was at rest. As the appliance came from the manufacturer, the lock or fastener projected about an inch from the lever frame, and could be conveniently raised and lowered into place with the hand only. Some time prior to defendants' purchase of the mill, however, a concave steel plate projecting about 2¼ inches had been riveted to the face of the lock to enable the sawyer to manipulate it with his foot; but for some reason the use of the lock, as thus equipped, had been abandoned by the former owner of the mill. Two or three months before the accident complained of, and while defendants were overhauling and repairing the mill, their millwright and superintendent contemplated reinstalling the lock; but objection was made to his doing so by some employees because it was unsafe, and had previously permitted an automatic movement of the carriage. The attention of one of the defendants was called to the matter, and he suggested that a hole be made through the frame and lever just below the lock, and an iron pin be provided to supplement the lock, which was done accordingly. As thus equipped the lever was used by defendants up to the time of the accident. It was necessary in the operation of the mill to remove the band saws from the wheels upon which they operated four times a day and take them to the filing room to be filed. Plaintiff was employed by defendants as saw filer, with his son as an assistant, and they were accustomed to aid in the work of removing the saws and taking them to the filing room. It required five or six men to do this, and they had to work in the space between the saw pit and the lever, and roll or move the saws over and across the carriage track to get them to the filing room. On the day of the accident, and while a saw was being removed and taken to the filing room, the teeth caught in the clothes of one of the workmen, and he was thrown against the lever, knocking out the pin, loosening the lock, and starting the log-carriage, which caught and severely injured plaintiff's son. This action is brought to recover damages for the injuries so sustained.

The negligence charged in the complaint is that defendants "carelessly and negligently failed to maintain a proper or safe fastening for said lever, so as to prevent it from jarring loose, or from being accidentally moved by workmen employed in and about the mill, and that the unsafe condition of said lever in being insufficiently fastened and secured was known to the defendant during all of said time." The defendants deny the negligence charged in the complaint, and affirmatively allege (1) that they had equipped their mill with reasonably safe machinery, tools, and implements, such as ordinarily used in similar mills, and that it was provided with ordinary safe machinery and appliances in good repair and condition at the time of injury to plaintiff's ward; (2) that while the saw was being removed to the filing room by plaintiff and his fellow servants one of such servants accidentally fell against the lever and released the fastening thereof, so that the log carriage was propelled forward, injuring plaintiff's son, which accident was unavoidable by defendants; (3) that whatever negligence, if any, caused the injury was that of a fellow servant and not the defendants; (4) that plaintiff's son fully understood the manner in which the lever was fastened, and the dangers incident thereto, and with such knowledge voluntarily entered upon and continued in defendants' service, and thus assumed all the risks and hazards reasonably to be apprehended in the performance of his duties. The reply put in issue the averments of the answer. Trial resulted in verdict and judgment in favor of plaintiff, and defendants appeal, assigning error in overruling their motion for nonsuit, in the admission and rejection of evidence, and in giving and refusing certain instructions.

J. F. Boothe and Rufus Mallory, for appellants. E. E. Coovert and G. W. Stapleton, for respondent.

BEAN, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). The record contains all the evidence given on the trial. In determining the questions arising on the motion for nonsuit we are therefore to consider the entire evidence. If plaintiff had not proved a cause sufficient to be submitted to the jury when he rested, the ruling on a motion for a nonsuit will not be disturbed if defendants afterward supplied the omission. Bennett v. N. P. Ex. Co., 12 Or. 49, 6 Pac. 160. Upon the entire record we think it cannot be said, as a matter of law, that there was no competent evidence tending to show that defendants did not exercise reasonable care in providing a suitable lock or fastener for the log carriage lever, under the circumstances attending its situation and location. The lock had been changed as it came from the manufacturer by the addition of a steel plate about 2¼ inches square, which necessarily made it more likely to drop from its own weight or the accumulation of sawdust thereon, or be displaced by defendants' employes working near it. Defendant Wilson testified that he was informed of its alleged unsafe conditions and the danger to be apprehended therefrom, and that he advised the use of a pin as an additional fastener. The evidence tends to show, however, that the pin as actually made was so short and loose in the hole that a dropping of the plate or an accidental contact therewith by an employe would have a tendency to drive the pin out, throw the lever, and start the carriage. Witness McKereghan testified that he could knock the lock down and drive the pin out so as to throw the lever by one motion of his foot. Moreover the fastener was located at a place where the employes were compelled to work in the discharge of their duties. There were only $2\frac{1}{4}$ feet between the lever and the saw pit. In this space five or six men were required to work in removing the saw. The saw itself was 12 inches wide, so there was necessarily danger of the workmen coming in contact with the lever, displacing the lock, and starting the carriage, unless the lever was safely fastened. On this evidence the court would not be justified in taking the case from the jury, and declaring as a matter of law that defendants exercised reasonable care in providing a safe fastening for the lever. Nor do we understand counsel for defendants to make any serious contention on this point. Their position is that the negligence of defendants was not the proximate cause of the injury, but it was caused by an employe accidentally or negligently coming in contact with the lever and disengaging the lock, an event for which they were not responsible. The doctrine of proximate cause in negligence cases is often difficult, and much learning has been displayed in its discussion. While there is an apparent if not real conflict in the authorities, or rather in the application of the rule to the facts of particular cases, we take the law, in any event, to be settled that a master is liable for an injury to his servant, caused by the concurring negligence of himself and fellow servant, which would not have happened had the master performed his duty. 12 Ency. Laack*, 143 Ill. 242, 32 N. E. 285, 18 L. R. A. 215.

In Sherman v. Menominee River Lumber Co., supra, plaintiff was injured by an edger in defendant's sawmill, which, by reason of a defect, was unnecessarily dangerous. He was working with the edger, and was injured by a plank which was thrown backward from the machinery, due to the negligence of another operator. The trial court held that plaintiff could not recover because the negligence which caused his injury was due to a co-employe. But on appeal the cause was reversed. The court said: "We are of the opinion that the negligence of the co-employe of the plaintiff, under such circumstances, would not excuse the defendant, but would simply be negligence contributing to the injury caused by the negligence of the defendant and the co-employe, and the defendant would be liable to the plaintiff. The culpability of defendant lies in the fact that it permitted the use of a machine in doing its work, which, by reason of its defects, was unnecessarily dangerous to its employes; and it cannot excuse itself by alleging that if it had been carefully used no accident would have happened to the plaintiff."

In Siegel, Cooper & Co. v. Trcka, supra, two servants of defendant were riding in an elevator. One threw the other down, so as to cause his foot to project over the floor of the elevator, and it was crushed in passing a new defectively constructed entrance. It was contended that defendant was not liable for the injury thus received, because the proximate cause was the negligent act of the servant who threw the plaintiff upon the floor of the elevator. But the court ruled that, if the defendant "was guilty of the negligence charged in the declaration, and without which the injury in question would not have occurred, then it would make no difference as to its liability that some act or agency of some other person or thing also contributed to bring about the result from which damages are claimed. Both or either of the contributing agencies were liable for the injury occasioned by their negligence, appellee being without fault, and not held to have assumed the risk involved in the improper construction."

In McGregor v. Reid, Murdock & Co., supra, defendant had employed competent mechanics to put in a new cable for its elevator. The contractors left the fastenings insecure and unsafe, by reason of which the cable parted, and on account of a defective safety device the elevator fell, injuring plaintiff. The defendant insisted that the imperfect fastening of the cable was the proximate cause of the injury, and that no recovery could be had against it, on account of the defective condition of the safety device. The court said: "This position is clearly untenable. The two causes operated together, and neither alone would have caused the elevator to fall, and if the pulling out of the cables was attributed to an accident or to the negligence of a third person, and still the elevator would not have fallen without the negligence of appellee, appellee would be liable; for both causes, operating proximately at the same time, caused the injury."

In Gila Valley, G. & N. Ry. Co. v. Lyon, supra, plaintiff's intestate was killed by reason of the concurring negligence of defendant company in constructing and maintaining a spur track, and that of the conductor of the train upon which he was riding at the time of the accident. In discussing the question the court said: "In the case at bar it was the duty of the railroad company to have exercised reasonable care and caution to construct and maintain its spur at the place where the accident occurred so as to guard against such accidents as might reasonably have been foreseen as liable to happen. If it failed in its duty in this respect, it was guilty of negligence, and if this negligence contributed to the accident in the sense that otherwise it would not have occurred, then its negligence, coupled with the negligence of the conductor, in operating the train, became the proximate cause. On the other hand, if the conductor was guilty of negligence in operating the train, and this negligence, coupled with the negligence of the railroad company in the matter of the construction and maintenance of its spur, was the cause of the injury, such negligence on the part of the conductor was a concurring or co-operative cause, but not the sole cause. If the negligence of the conductor was such as would have resulted in the accident even had the railroad company exercised due care and diligence, then the negligence of the conductor would have been not only the 'proximate,' but the 'sole,' cause of the injury, and the railroad company would not be liable. The issue raised by the pleadings and submitted was whether the accident was caused in whole or in part by the negligence of the company. The question whether the company was liable would be answered in the negative, were the jury to say that the conductor's negligence was the sole cause of the accident, for, if the sole cause, then no negligence on the part of the company could have contributed to it. The court did therefore properly charge the jury that in determining the question whether the company was liable for the injury they were to find whether negligence on the part of the company contributed to the accident, or whether it was brought about solely by the negligence of the conductor."

In Goe v. N. P. Ry. Co., supra, a servant employed about machinery slipped, and in falling struck an unguarded lever, which set the machinery in motion. In endeavoring to catch himself he threw his hand against a cog wheel, which caught and ground it. It was insisted by the defendant that the injury to plaintiff was caused by an accident, for which it was in no way responsible, and it was argued that, if it had not been for the accident of falling, supplemented by the accident of striking the lever, still further supplemented by plaintiff throwing his hand in the cog, no injury would have been sustained. The court said: "This may be conceded without settling the question of proximate cause, for it is well established that, where the primary cause of an injury is a pure accident, occasioned without fault of the injured party, if the negligent act of the defendant is a co-operating or culminating cause of the injury, or if the accident would not have resulted in the injury excepting for the negligent act, the negligence is the proximate cause of the injury for which damages may be recovered."

We conclude from these authorities that, if defendants were negligent in not providing a suitable and safe lock or fastener for the feed lever, and without such negligence the accident to plaintiff's son would not have happened, they are liable notwithstanding the act or negligence of a co-employee may have been a concurrent or co-operating cause of the injury. It is true a master is responsible only for the result of his own negligence. To render him liable for an injury to his servant, there must be a direct causal connection between his misconduct and the injury, and the latter must be the direct result of some negligent act of the master. But he is chargeable with the natural and probable consequence of his own act, and the causal connection will be sufficient, if, according to the usual experience of mankind, the result ought to have been foreseen and provided against by him. The intervening act of a third person or other agency contributing to, and bringing about, a condition necessary to produce the injurious effect of the original negligence, will not excuse the first wrongdoer, if the intervening cause and its probable consequence be such as should have been anticipated by the latter. Ahern v. Oregon Telephone Co., 24 Or. 276, 33 Pac. 403, 35 Pac. 549, 22 L. R. A. 635. "The test," says the Supreme Court of Massachusetts, "is to be found in the probable injurious consequences which were to be anticipated, not in the number of subsequent events and agencies which might arise." Stone v. Boston & Albany R. R., 171 Mass. 536, 51 N. E. 1, 41 L. R. A. 794.

It is claimed that the accidental or negligent tripping of the lock by one of the workmen falling against the lever was a thing not likely to happen in the ordinary course of events, and it was therefore not the duty of defendants to have anticipated or provided against it. But this was a question for the jury to determine, as a matter of fact, from all the circumstances of the case. The proximate cause of an injury is generally a question for the jury. It is only when the facts and inferences to be drawn from them are undisputed that it becomes a question for the court. Ahern v. Oregon Telephone Co., supra. There was certainly a sufficient dispute in this case as to whether according to the usual experience of mankind the lever by which the log carriage was operated was likely to be moved and the carriage accidentally started by an employé of defendant coming in contact with it, unless it was securely fastened, to render it a question of fact for the jury whether the defendants should have anticipated and guarded against such an event. Counsel complain that this question was not directly submitted to the jury. But the record does not disclose that a request to do so was made by defendants, not that an exception was saved to the court's failure in this regard, if there was any such failure. The defendants requested an instruction that, even if they were negligent as charged, they would not be liable if the injury would not have happened but for some intervening cause not produced by them, and which ordinary care on their part could not have prevented. This is not the law as we understand it. If defendants were negligent, an intervening cause or agency would not excuse them from the natural and probable result of their negligence if it was their duty to have anticipated and provided against such event, because such intervention would be a thing likely to happen in the ordinary course of events. Lane v. Atlantic Works, 111 Mass. 136.

Plaintiff testified that at the time the mill was being reconstructed he overheard a conversation between some of the employés and Mr. Mitchell, who was in charge of the reconstruction for defendants, in reference to a defect in the lever and the manner in which it was fastened, and was permitted, over the objection and exception of defendants, to relate such conversation. This evidence was, in our opinion, competent. Mitchell was the representative of defendants in charge of the reconstruction of the mill, and notice to him of a defect in the lever or fastener was notice to them. We do not think the jury could have been misled by supposing from this testimony that a previous runaway of the carriage had occurred while a lever was in use with the same fastening as it had at the time of the injury to plaintiff's son, since the record shows that the court on motion of defendants withdrew from their consideration all testimony concerning the former runaway. It clearly appears that the conversation testified to by the witness, so far as the jury were permitted to consider, had reference to the lever used in the mill prior to defendants' purchase, and the advisability of reinstalling such lever with its then fastener.

The defendants called as witnesses several expert millmen, and sought to show by them that, in their opinion, the lever in use at the time of the injury complained of was provided with a reasonably safe and proper lock or fastener. The plaintiff had previously asked such a question of one of his witnesses, but on the objection of defendants, the witness was not permitted to answer. Having thus been instrumental in establishing the law of the case, it would seem that defendants could not reasonably complain because the court adhered to it throughout the trial. But, however that may be, the evidence was incompetent. It was directed to the principal issue in the case, and one which the jury were required to determine from the facts, and not from the opinions of witnesses. Models of the lever and fastener were before the jury. Its construction and operation were fully explained to them, and it required no particular skill or science to determine whether the fastener was reasonably safe. The opinion of experts was neither necessary nor competent. Labett, Master & Servant, § 830; Harley v. Buffalo Car Mfg. Co., 142 N. Y. 31, 36 N. E. 813; Pulifer v. Berry, 87 Me. 405, 32 Atl. 986. The testimony of the witness Trickey that the pin used in the fastener at the time of the accident was so loose that the jar of the mill, when in operation, would work it out, and that of Bradford that the fall of the clip would have a tendency to knock the pin out was not of this character. It was given with reference to the models of the lever and fastener used on the trial and in explanation of the construction of such fastener, and its operation.

It appeared incidentally from the evidence that a fastener for the lever used by the previous owner of the mill had been removed by defendants, and the one in use at the time of the accident substituted in place thereof. In referring to the former fastener one of the witnesses denominated it as a "farmer's rig." Counsel for plaintiff in his closing argument, in alluding to the old fastener, so designated it, but did not undertake to describe it, but called the jury's attention to the fact that it had been adopted after a previous runaway of the carriage, and that it had been removed and another substituted in its place by defendants. Counsel for defendants objected to these remarks on the ground that they were a discussion of a matter not in evidence. The court overruled the objection, for the reason that the argument "was fairly an answer to the contention of the defendants," and as the argument of defendants' counsel is not in the record, we cannot say the ruling was error.

The judgment of the court below will be affirmed.

(51 Or. 1)

IN RE TURNER'S WILL.

(Supreme Court of Oregon. Jan. 28, 1908.)

1. WILLS—EXECUTION—UNDUE INFLUENCE.

Evidence examined, and held to show that a will was the free and voluntary act of the testatrix.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 49, Wills, §§ 421-437.]

2. SAME—NATURE OF TESTAMENTARY POWER.

Every person possesses absolute dominion over his property, and may bestow it upon whomsoever he pleases without regard to natural or legal claim upon his bounty, if he possesses testamentary capacity and exercises his own individual will and judgment in the matter.

3. SAME—VALIDITY—UNDUE INFLUENCE.

A mere confidential relation existing between the testator and a beneficiary under his will, or the opportunity of such beneficiary to exercise undue influence over the testator, is not enough to avoid a will, but fraud or undue influence to set aside a will must be such as to overcome the testator's free volition or conscious judgment and to substitute the wicked purposes of another instead, and must be the efficient cause without which the obnoxious disposition would not have been made.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 49, Wills, § 383.]

4. SAME—EVIDENCE.

Evidence of a statement of a testatrix, made after the execution of her will, that she had given her home place to one son and the rest of her property to her other children in equal shares, while the will gave such son substantially all her property, leaving only a cemetery lot to pass by the residuary clause to her other children, although it might be admissible to show the state of her mind, and whether she fully understood what she was doing when she made her will, is no substantial proof of fraud, duress, or undue influence.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 49, Wills, § 431.]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Umatilla County; H. J. Bean, Judge.

Action by Alvin F. Turner and others against Oliver C. Turner and others to contest a will. Decree for proponents, and contestants appeal. Affirmed.

This is a proceeding instituted in the county court of Umatilla county to have the probate of the will of Cynthia A. Turner revoked and the will set aside. The will was executed October 7, 1901, and the testatrix died August 30, 1905. At the time of her death she left, surviving her, seven children and one grandchild. Her husband, and the father of these children, died on May 26, 1898, leaving a will, in which, after bequeathing to each of his other children the sum of $50, he devised and bequeathed the remainder of his property, consisting principally of a farm near Weston, to his youngest sons, Samuel O. and Oliver C., charged with the payment of one-third the rent therefrom to his wife, during her lifetime. These two sons were 26 and 28 years of age, respectively, at the time of their father's death, and had, since their majority, lived with and assisted in the support of their parents. After the father's death, the eldest of them (Otis) resided on the farm which had been devised to himself and brother, and the youngest (Chauncey) lived with his mother in a house belonging to her in the town of Weston. About the 1st of October, 1901, Mrs. Turner was in poor health, and went to the hospital at Walla Walla for treatment. Chauncey accompanied her, and remained a day or two before returning home. After diagnosing her case, her physician, finding she was suffering from an ailment that would require a surgical operation, advised her to that effect, and at his suggestion she consented to submit to the same. A few days before the time fixed for the operation, she inquired of her physician if he thought she had better make a will, and he told her that she need feel no alarm as to the result of the operation, but thought it a good idea for every person to have a will. When her son Chauncey was advised of the day the operation was to be performed, he went from Weston to Walla Walla to see his mother, and to remain with her until after the operation. She told him to secure the services of an attorney to prepare her will, as she had concluded to make one. He tried to persuade her to abandon the idea, assuring her that she was in no danger from the contemplated operation, but she was persistent, and, after consulting her physician and being told by him that it could do no harm for his mother to make a will, he, accompanied by the physician, called on Judge Dumphy, a lawyer in Walla Walla, and requested him to prepare the will. Dumphy visited the hospital, obtained the necessary data from the testatrix, returned to his office, prepared the will, and took it back to the hospital, where it was duly and regularly executed and witnessed, after which it was placed in a sealed envelope by Dumphy, and, at the request of the testatrix, taken by her son Chauncey to Weston, and deposited with her other papers in the local bank, where it remained until after her death some four years later. At the time of her death, Mrs. Turner owned and possessed a house and 4½ lots in Weston, where she and her son Chauncey had resided for several years, of the probable value of $1,500; and personal property consisting principally of cash, amounting to about $4,000. After providing for the payment of her debts and funeral expenses, she declared, by the second clause of her will, her desire that the will and testament of her husband, deceased, should be executed and carried into effect, according to the terms and tenor thereof, and devised and bequeathed to her two sons, Otis and Chauncey, any interest in her husband's estate of which she might die seised. By the third clause she devised and bequeathed to her son Chauncey her home place in Weston, and all personal property of every kind and description situated and located in that town; and in the residuary clause gave the names of all her children and heirs, except Chauncey, and devised to them all the rest, residue, and remainder of her estate, both real and personal, share and share alike. The will was duly proved and admitted to probate in common form, September 5, 1905. A petition was filed in the county court for Umatilla county, June 20, 1906, by some of the heirs, praying for an order revoking the former probate and setting the will aside on the ground: (1) A want of testamentary capacity at the time it was executed, and (2) that it was induced by the fraud and undue influence of the chief beneficiary thereunder. After issue joined in the county court, testimony was taken, upon the consideration of which that court sustained the will and dismissed the petition. From this decree the contestants appealed to the circuit court, with like result, and they now bring the case to this court for final adjudication.

Charles H. Carter and Will M. Peterson, for appellant. James A. Fee and G. W. Phelps, for respondents.

BEAN, O. J. (after stating the facts as above). The averment that Mrs. Turner's mental and physical condition was such, at the time the will was executed, as to render her incapable of intelligently disposing of her property, has been abandoned by the contestants, and their sole reliance is upon the contention that the will was the result of the fraud and undue influence of her son Chauncey. The only witnesses who gave any definite or direct testimony concerning the making of the will and the circumstances surrounding its execution are Dr. Nelms, the attending physician, Chauncey Turner, chief legatee and devisee thereunder, and Judge Dumphy, who drew the will, and was present when it was executed. Dr. Nelms testified that while Mrs. Turner was in the hospital in Walla Walla, and after he had concluded that an operation was necessary she asked him if he thought she had better make a will, as she was afraid the operation was going to be serious; that witness told her that he did not want her to feel alarmed about the result of the operation, but thought it a good idea for all persons to have a will; that she asked him whom he would advise her to get to prepare the will, and he told her he thought Garrecht & Dumphy would be competent; that neither of her sons, Otis nor Chauncey, were present at that time or in Walla Walla; that Mrs. Turner told him she wanted her husband's wishes carried out, and that she was going to give Chauncey a home, or what she had, or something to that effect (witness could not exactly remember) because he had been with her all the time and taken care of her, and she wanted to make a liberal provision for him. Chauncey Turner testified that he lived with his father and mother before his father's death, and with his mother afterwards, until her death; that Otis lived on the farm during his father's lifetime and after his death; that his mother visited in Tacoma in 1901, returning to Weston in September; that soon afterwards she went to Walla Walla to consult a physician, and on the 3d of October of that year went to the hospital for the purpose of submitting to a surgical operation, and, at her request, he went with her; that he was at the hospital when the operation was performed and two or three days before that time; that he never undertook to induce his mother to make a will in his favor or to persuade her not to give as much to other members of the family as to himself, and never spoke to her about a will at his own instance, and that his mother acted of her own free will and according to her own judgment in everything she did; that two or three days prior to the operation he went to Walla Walla to see his mother, and she said to him that the physician had decided to operate on her, and she thought she ought to make a will as she might not live through the operation; that he told her not to do so as she was not in danger; but she insisted upon making a will, and requested him to get somebody to prepare it for her; that he went to Dr. Nelms' office and spoke to him about it, and the Doctor said he thought his mother would recover from the operation, but if she wanted to make a will to let her do so, as it would not do any harm; that he asked the Doctor whom to employ to prepare the will, and the Doctor took him across the hall to Judge Dumphy's office, and introduced him to Dumphy; that the Doctor told Dumphy our business and he said he would call at the hospital and see mother; that he (witness) did not see Dumphy again until after the will was prepared and brought by him to the hospital to be executed; that he was not in his mother's room while the will was being read by Dumphy, or until after it was executed, when he returned to the room, and told his mother she had better pay the lawyer, and at her request, he took from her purse $10 and gave it to him; that he never made any suggestion to his mother as to what should go in the will nor did she ask him anything in respect to that matter; that after the will was executed he put it in the family deed book in the bank, at her request, where it remained until after her death; that he did not know the contents of the will and his mother never mentioned it to him afterwards, and he never had any conversation with her about giving him the Weston property, and never asked her for it; that he never spoke to his mother about a will, nor she to him, until the day it was drawn; that she never said anything to him about the will or the way she wanted her property to go, and he never saw Judge Dumphy until the day he was introduced to him by Dr. Nelms. Judge Dumphy testified that he was employed by Dr. Nelms and Chauncey Turner to prepare the will; that they came to his office, and the doctor said they wanted him to draw a will for a lady at the hospital; that he told them he had to go to the courthouse soon on business, and when through there would go to the hospital and see Mrs. Turner; that after he finished his business at the courthouse he went to the hospital, called on Mrs. Turner, told her his name and that he came to see her about drawing her will; that she gave him the data and told him how she wanted to dispose of her property; that he returned to his office and prepared the will from the memorandum made by him, and then returned to the hospital where the will was executed; that no one but Mrs. Turner, the testatrix, ever spoke to him about anything contained in the will, and he put into form the data she gave him; that no one else told him about her husband's death or the names or ages of her children, and Chauncey never undertook to talk to him about the will except to tell him that his mother was in the hospital and wanted a will drawn; that he got all his information from Mrs. Turner, and, so far as he knew, Mrs. Turner dictated the terms of her will.

The evidence of these witnesses is uncontradicted, and the witnesses are unimpeached. In our opinion it shows quite clearly that the will in question was the free and voluntary act of the testatrix, and not the result of the undue influence of her son or anyone else. The principal features relied upon to overcome the effect of this testimony are the alleged unnatural and unjust disposition made by the testatrix of her property, the opportunity that her son Chauncey had to influence her in the matter of making her will, and testimony that she told some of her children, after the will had been executed, that she made a will giving her home in Weston to Chauncey and the remainder of her property equally to her other children. But these circumstances are not sufficient to justify the court in setting aside a will which clearly appears to have been the free and voluntary act of a competent testator. Every person possesses absolute dominion over his property, and may bestow it upon whomsoever he pleases, without regard to natural or legal claim upon his bounty, if he possesses testamentary capacity, and exercises his own individual will and judgment in the matter. Potter v. Jones, 20 Or. 239, 25 Pac. 769, 12 L. R. A. 161. A mere confidential relation existing between the testator and a beneficiary under a will, or the opportunity of such beneficiary to exercise undue influence over the testator, is not enough to avoid a will. The fraud or undue influence that will suffice to set aside a will, "must be such as to overcome the free volition or conscious judgment of the testator, and to substitute the wicked purposes of another instead, and must be the efficient cause, without which the obnoxious disposition would not have been made." Holman's Will, 42 Or. 345-358, 70 Pac. 908. Or, as put by Mr. Justice Moore, in Re Darst's Will, 34 Or. 58-65, 54 Pac. 947, "Influence arising from gratitude, affection, or esteem is not undue, nor can it become such unless it destroys the free agency of the testator at the time the instrument is executed, and shows that the disposition which he attempted to make of his property therein results from the fraud, imposition, and restraint of the person whose superior will prompts the execution of the testament in the particular manner which the testator adopts."

It is said in some cases that when the will of a testator is such that it could not have been made consistent with the claims of natural duty and affection, and a close confidential relation exists between him and the recipient of his bounty, slight evidence that the legatee or devisee had betrayed the confidence placed in him would be sufficient to avoid the will. Greenwood v. Cline, 7 Or. 17; Holman's Will, supra. But in this case there is not the slightest evidence in the record, that we are able to find, that Chauncey Turner ever attempted to take advantage of the confidential relation existing between himself and his mother, to unduly influence her in the disposition of her property, or that the terms of her will were ever discussed by them.

The statement of the testatrix, made after the execution of her will, that she had given her home place to Chauncey, and the remainder of her property to her other children, in equal shares, is not competent to invalidate the will. These statements may have been admissible to show the state of the testatrix's mind, and whether she fully understood and comprehended what she was doing at the time she made her will, but they afforded no substantial proof of fraud, duress, or undue influence. Loennecker's Will, 112 Wis. 401, 89 N. W. 215; Bevelot v. Lestrade, 153 Ill. 625, 38 N. E. 1056; Taylor v. Pegram, 151 Ill. 106, 37 N. E. 837; Trish v. Newell, 62 Ill. 196, 14 Am. Rep. 79.

Much stress was laid by counsel for contestants upon the fact that the only property belonging to testatrix, upon which the residuary clause could apply, was a cemetery lot, and it was stoutly insisted that this is strong, if not conclusive, evidence that the testatrix did not know or comprehend the disposition she was making of her property at the time she executed her will. But the reason for the residuary clause and the object had in view by the draftsman of the will is explained by Judge Dumphy in his testimony. It was adopted by him as a convenient means of naming all the children and heirs of the testatrix, and providing for the disposition of any legacies which might lapse, and is, therefore, of no particular weight in determining the question whether the will was the free and voluntary act of the testatrix.

Careful examination of the entire record has convinced us that the decree of the court below should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

(50 Or. 540)

(Supreme Court of Oregon. Jan. 23, 1908.)

1. TENDER — PAYMENT INTO COURT — CONDITIONAL TENDER — WITHDRAWAL.

Where, in forcible entry and detainer, defendant answered that he had tendered plaintiff $115 on July 1, 1903, and a like amount on August 1st of the same year, as rent for those months pursuant to an alleged oral contract for a lease, and that he brought said sum into court and deposited it with the clerk for plaintiff, he could not thereafter claim that the tender was conditional only as a part payment on the oral contract, and having paid the money into court, could not withdraw it without plaintiff's consent.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 45, Tender, §§ 93-95.]

2. SAME—RIGHT TO DEPOSIT.

Where defendant paid money into court for rent already earned under an alleged parol contract for a lease, the tender being unconditional, plaintiff was entitled to the money whether defendant was successful in enforcing the alleged parol contract for a lease or not.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 45, Tender, §§ 88-95.]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Multnomah County; Arthur L. Frazer, Judge.

Action by J. Dechenbath against D. C. Rima. From an order directing the clerk of the circuit court to pay plaintiff money deposited in court, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

This is an appeal from an order of the circuit court directing the clerk of that court to pay to the plaintiff $230, tendered by the defendant, and deposited in court with his answer in the case. The proceeding was a forcible entry and detainer action, commenced in the justice's court to oust defendant from certain property occupied by him 'as a saloon, possession of which he claimed under a parol agreement for a three years' lease. By his answer defendant alleged that he had tendered to plaintiff $115 on July 1, 1903, and a like amount again on August 1st of that year, as rent for those months, pursuant to such alleged lease, and that he "now brings the same, viz., $230, in like coin, into court, and deposits it with the clerk for the plaintiff, and with the above-entitled court for the plaintiff." The cause was taken by appeal to the circuit court, and from that court to the Supreme Court, where plaintiff recovered final judgment for the property against the defendant. Dechenbach v. Rima, 45 Or. 500, 77 Pac. 391, 78 Pac. 666. After the mandate from the Supreme Court was entered in the circuit court that court, upon the motion of plaintiff, made an order requiring the clerk to pay such deposit, viz., $230, to the plaintiff, from which order defendant appeals. For the issues in the action, see the opinion on the former appeal. The lease under which defendant's predecessor (Lake) occupied the premises expired July 1, 1903, and prior thereto on June 25th plaintiff served notice on Lake and the defendant to quit, and the complaint in this action was filed August 11, 1903.

George J. Perkins, for appellant. Wirt Minor, for respondent.

EAKIN, J. (after stating the facts as above). Defendant's answer, in which he tenders the money into court, was filed August 29, 1903, and his contention is that the tender was only a conditional tender as part payment upon the parol contract; but it is not so alleged. Plaintiff's right of recovery under the forcible entry and detainer action depends upon the conditions as they existed when the complaint was filed, and it was based upon the expiration of Lake's lease and the notice to quit, served June 25th, and had no reference to nonpayment of rent by either Lake or defendant. If the circumstances under which the parol lease was made constituted an estoppel, it was such without reference to the tender of the rent money, because the court in a forcible entry and detainer action can only determine plaintiff's right to immediate possession, and cannot decree specific performance or adjudicate defendant's rights otherwise than as affecting the plaintiff's right of possession at the time of the filing of his complaint. But at the time defendant filed his answer he had had the possession of the premises two months, lacking two days, and in effect admits that he owes for these two months, and by the answer deposits the money for the plaintiff. This had the effect of placing the money in the custody of the law, and defendant cannot withdraw it without the consent of plaintiff. It does not stand in the position of a tender of purchase money made contingent upon acquiring title in a suit for the specific performance of the sale of real estate. This is money apparently already earned, and tendered unconditionally, and plaintiff's right to it does not depend upon whether defendant is successful in enforcing the parol contract. Where an unconditional tender of money is made by a party, and the same deposited in court, the money is the property of the party for whom it is so tendered. West Portland Park Ass'n v. Kelly, 29 Or. 412, 45 Pac. 901; O. R. & N. Co. v. Oregon R. E. Co., 10 Or. 444.

Therefore there is no error in the order of the court, and the same is affirmed.

McGREGOR v. OREGON R. CO.

(Supreme Court of Oregon. Jan. 28, 1908.)

1. EXCEPTIONS, BILL OF—AMENDMENT—NUNC PRO TUNC ORDER.

Where an original bill of exceptions as filed purported to contain the matters which were inadvertently omitted, the appellant, after argument of the appeal, and after notice given in the Supreme Court, was entitled to a nunc pro tunc order of the trial court amending the bill by inserting the omitted matter.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 21, Exceptions, Bill of, §§ 106-111.]

2. SAME—RECORD OF TRIAL—PRESUMPTIONS.

Under B. & C. Comp. §§ 169-172, relating to the record of the trial and preparation of a bill of exceptions, it is presumed that the record was kept by the court, and that the court prepared the bill of exceptions, so that an oversight in omitting matter intended to be included in the bill is in law the error of the court, though it is the practice for the counsel to prepare and submit the bill of exceptions to the court for its approval.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 21, Exceptions, Bill of, §§ 106-111.]

3. CARRIERS—LOSS OF FREIGHT—ACTION—PLEA—ESTOPPEL.

In an action against a carrier for loss of freight, a plea of estoppel by reason of plaintiff having received the bill of lading after loss, and having forwarded it to defendant with his claim for damages, was insufficient, where it alleged no facts showing that defendant acted on the contents of the bill of lading to its prejudice, or that it was misled by anything plaintiff did with reference thereto.

4. SAME—FINDINGS—EVIDENCE—LIMITATION OF LIABILITY.

In an action against a carrier for loss of goods by fire, evidence held to support a finding that plaintiff never entered into a special contract, evidenced by a bill of lading limiting the carrier's liability.

5. SAME—EXECUTION AFTER LOSS.

Where, after loss of goods while in the possession of a carrier, it executed and sent to the shipper a bill of lading limiting the carrier's liability as a matter of convenience for the purpose of identifying the property lost, the shipper's receipt of such bill did not limit the carrier's common-law liability.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 9, Carriers, § 696.]

6. SAME.

Mere notice by a carrier to a shipper is insufficient to limit the carrier's liability, an express stipulation being necessary for that purpose.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 9, Carriers, §§ 675-677.]

7. SAME—CARRIER'S LIABILITY—WAREHOUSEMEN—DUTY OF CARRIER.

Where the consignee is present on the arrival of goods, he is required to receive them without unreasonable delay, or the carrier's liability as such is terminated. If the consignee is absent, but lives in the immediate vicinity of the place of delivery, the carrier must notify him of the arrival of the goods, after which he has a reasonable time to remove them; but if he is absent, unknown, or cannot be found, the carrier may place the goods in a warehouse, and after keeping them a reasonable time, if not delivered, the carrier's liability as such ceases.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 9, Carriers, §§ 608-609½.]

8. SAME—REASONABLE TIME.

Plaintiff's agent learned of the arrival of the goods in question between 4 and 5 o'clock p. m., which was a few hours after the car in which the goods were transported reached destination. The shipping receipt had not arrived, and it was customary for the carrier's office to close at 6 p. m. Plaintiff did not remove the goods that night, during which they were destroyed by fire. Held, that the loss occurred before the expiration of a reasonable time for the removal of the goods as a matter of law.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 9, Carriers, §§ 608-609½.]

9. SAME—QUESTION FOR COURT OR JURY.

Where the facts relating to the reasonableness of the opportunity offered to a consignee for the removal of goods after arrival are few and simple, and conclusively established, whether a reasonable time has or has not elapsed is a question for the court; it being proper to submit it to the jury only in case of a conflict in the testimony, or when the facts are doubtful or complicated, etc.

10. SAME—LOSS OF GOODS—DEFENSES—PLEADING.

A defense by a carrier that part of the goods sued for did not belong to plaintiff could not be proved where not specially pleaded.

11. SAME—LIMITATION OF LIABILITY—BURDEN OF PROOF.

A carrier being ordinarily an insurer of the goods it undertakes to transport, and all limitations of its common-law liability being in the nature of exceptions to its general responsibility, the burden is on the carrier to allege and prove a limited liability contract on which it seeks to relieve itself of its common-law liability.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 9, Carriers, §§ 722, 723.]

12. TRIAL—ORDER OF PROOF.

Where, in an action against a carrier for loss of goods, it relied on a limited liability contract, defendant, though entitled to introduce such contract as a part of its case, had no right to introduce it as a part of plaintiff's cross-examination, or to ask plaintiff whether at any time prior to the shipment his attention was directed by the carrier's agent or by any one to any of the printed matter on the back of the contract.

13. TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—REQUESTS—INSTRUCTIONS ALREADY GIVEN.

Requested instructions substantially covered by the general charge are properly refused.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 46, Trial, §§ 651-659.]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Union County; T. H. Crawford, Judge.

Action by L. McGregor against the Oregon Railroad Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Arthur C. Spencer, Jas. G. Wilson, and W. W. Cotton, for appellant. J. D. Slater, for respondent.

KING, C. This is an appeal by defendant from a judgment in favor of plaintiff for $900 damages for the loss, by fire, of certain household goods and bar supplies, used by him in the hotel business. The goods were left by plaintiff for shipment with defendant's agent at North Powder, Or., on February 9, 1906, and directed to be shipped to him at Elgin in the county named, with the view of having them transported from there by wagon a distance of 60 miles into Wallowa county, to which place he was removing. The goods reached Elgin about noon on February 12th following, and were left in the car in which they were shipped in front of the Elgin Forwarding Company's warehouse, which, from causes unknown, took fire during the night and spread to the car near by containing plaintiff's freight, destroying the goods. It is alleged that no receipt, bill of lading, or other instrument in writing was issued to the shipper thereof at the time the goods were shipped, but conceded that a few days after the fire he received a bill of lading with plaintiff's name thereon, which had been signed by the defendant's agent, who claims he was authorized to do so by plaintiff.

After the argument, and after notice thereof having been given in this court, counsel for defendant applied to the court below for permission to have the bill of exceptions amended nunc pro tunc to include the bill of lading and other matters inadvertently overlooked in preparing the bill of exceptions in the first instance. After due notice of the proposed amended bill it was signed by the judge of the circuit court as of the same date as that of the first one filed. Counsel for plaintiff moves to strike this amended bill from the files, stating as a reason therefor that the lower court had no authority, power, or jurisdiction to authorize the amendment in the case after the term at which the action was tried had expired, and that the application to amend shows there was no mistake made by the court in signing or approving the original bill of exceptions, and that it appears that the defect arises merely from certain matters not having been included therein, but now desired, and that the oversight was that of counsel and not of the court. In State v. Estes, 34 Or. 196, 206, 51 Pac. 77, 52 Pac. 571, 572, 55 Pac. 25, Mr. Justice Wolverton, after observing that some states, including the United States Supreme Court, have adopted a rigid rule as respects amendments to a bill of exceptions after having been filed in the appellate courts, announces as a rule of this court that: "A bill of exceptions, once settled and signed and properly filed, becomes a part of the record in the case to which it relates, and stands precisely upon the same footing as any other record," and that "if, however, a bill of exceptions, through inadvertence or mistake, has been so made up as not to fairly and truly recite or represent what it purports to show as having actually transpired during the course of the proceedings, it may, by order of the court, entered nunc pro tunc, upon proper notice, be so amended at a subsequent term as that it will accord with the real facts"; further stating: "We incline strongly to the more liberal practice as being better suited to subserve the ends of justice, and are therefore constrained to adopt it." Measured by the rule thus announced, and finding that the original bill of exceptions as filed purports to contain the matters included in the bill as amended, it follows that the court, in approving and signing the amended bill of exceptions, acted within its powers. Nor could it be material that the oversight upon which the amended bill was sought appears to be that of the attorney. It is sufficient if it appears that the matters were omitted by the inadvertence of either the court or counsel preparing the bill; for, if omitted, it is to be presumed that the court overlooked it. Although it has become the practice, and a commendable one, for the counsel to prepare and submit the bill of exceptions to the court for its approval, yet, under B. & O. Comp. §§ 169-172, inclusive, it is presumed that the court keeps the record of the trial and prepares the bill of exceptions when the case may be appealed, from which it follows that from whatever cause the oversight may have occurred it is in law the error of the court before which the cause may have been tried, and on having its attention called thereto, after notice seasonably made to those interested, the court has power to correct the bill of exceptions so as to conform to the facts intended to be included therein. It clearly appears, however, from the amended bill presented, and the court's certificate appended thereto, that it is intended to supersede the original bill, and to include all matters to be considered here, and it will be so treated.

In this connection counsel for plaintiff urge that the bill of exceptions, on account of containing more than sufficient testimony to explain the errors assigned, and not having stated separately and distinctly the evidence intended to show the application of the rulings of the court, etc., does not come within the rule of this court, as required in Hedin v. Suburban Ry. Co., 28 Or. 155, 37 Pac. 540, and subsequent decisions on the subject. Owing to the conclusion we have reached on the merits of the controversy, a consideration of this point becomes unnecessary. Steiger v. Fronhofer, 43 Or. 178, 72 Pac. 693.

This action is based upon the common-law liability of the defendant, which, after denying any negligence on its part, sets up four defenses: (1) Exemption from liability, in case of fire, by special contract with plaintiff; (2) that, if liable at all, it is responsible as a warehouseman only; (3) that by a contract with plaintiff its liability is limited to $5 per hundred weight for the household goods, and 50 cents per gallon for the liquors shipped, and that prior to the shipment the rates under which the goods were shipped had been established by the defendant for their transportation upon the character and value thereof, a higher rate being charged for goods shipped at the risk of the carrier, and a lower rate for goods shipped at the risk of the consignee; (4) estoppel by reason of plaintiff having subsequently received the bill of lading, and having forwarded it to defendant, with his claim for damages. The defense of estoppel was stricken out on motion of plaintiff as being sham, frivolous, redundant, and surplusage; but the other defenses were put in issue by the reply. It is urged first that the court erred in striking out the plea of estoppel. An examination of the averments discloses no facts alleged in support thereof, except such as might have been established under the other defenses relied upon. Again, the plea, as given, contains no allegation of facts showing that defendant acted upon the contents of the receipt or bill of lading to its prejudice, or that it was in any manner misled by anything done by plaintiff in reference thereto, all of which were essential to estop plaintiff from asserting his claim against the company. Haun v. Martin, 48 Or. 304, 86 Pac. 371. There is also testimony tending to show that plaintiff received no receipt, bill of lading, or other instrument from defendant until after the fire; that the shipment was made with no understanding between them in reference thereto or as to the contents thereof, all of which was submitted to and passed upon by the jury, as to which facts their verdict is conclusive. And there is testimony from which it could reasonably be inferred that the bill of lading was first wanted by the plaintiff and his agent in order that, by furnishing a means of identification thereof, they could more conveniently procure the goods from the agent at Elgin, and that it was not forwarded to that point until after the loss occurred. McGregor denies ever signing the instrument, and his testimony is broad enough to indicate that no authority was given to any one else to affix his name thereto. When he presented to the company his claim for the loss, he sent no bill of lading, nor did he state upon what theory his claim was based—whether upon the common-law liability of the company as a common carrier, or upon the special and written contract. So far as disclosed by the record, this shipping receipt was sent to the company as a matter of convenience for the purpose of identifying the property lost. On receipt of the demand for damages from plaintiff's attorney the company requested that the shipping receipt be sent in conformity with their rules in such cases, and it was evidently sent under this request. The claim was disallowed by the company, the receipt returned to plaintiff's attorney, and this action brought, not under the special contract here relied upon by the company, but upon its common-law liability. In this respect this case is unlike those cited by appellant, where the actions were brought upon the contract disclosed by the receipts, bill of lading, etc., and where an attempt is made at the trial to shift the character of the claim. It will be observed in the cases cited, in which this question was fully considered, that the shippers received their bills of lading at the time of the shipment, and not after the loss, as in this case, and that when so received they either expressly or impliedly ratified the contents thereof. There is evidence sufficient to support the findings of the jury to the effect that plaintiff never entered into the special contract claimed through the shipper's receipt, commonly known as the bill of lading, and the mere fact that he received it after the loss cannot avail defendant anything. There is a vast difference between consenting to the terms expressed in a bill of lading before the shipment, if such consent can be implied from the mere fact of receiving it without the signature of the consignor, and a case like the one at bar, where the jury has found that there was no consent to receive the bill of lading at some future time, nor to make the contract included therein. Many authorities hold that the acceptance of such receipt after the loss cannot be taken advantage of by the carrier, and that the shipper under such circumstances is not estopped from asserting his claim against the carrier under its common-law liability, among which are: 6 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law (2d Ed.) 642; Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Doyle, 142 Fed. 669, 74 C. C. A. 245; Gott v. Dinmore, 111 Mass. 45; John Hood Co. v. Am. P. S. Co., 191 Mass. 27, 77 N. E. 638; Bostwick v. Balt. & O. R. Co., 45 N. Y. 712; American Ex. Co. v. Spellman, 90 Ill. 455; Phoenix Powder Mfg. Co. v. Wabash R. Co., 101 Mo. App. 442, 74 S. W. 492; Allen, etc., Co. v. Can. Pac. Ry. Co., 42 Wash. 64, 84 Pac. 620. Under the verdict of the jury we must presume that plaintiff neither consented nor authorized his name to be signed to this receipt, and under the rule as substantially stated and recognized in this state in Seller v. Steamship Pacific, 1 Or. 409, Fed. Cas. No. 12,644, nothing short of an express stipulation will constitute such an agreement. It cannot depend upon implication or inference, nor conflicting and doubtful evidence, and mere notice to the shipper must be held insufficient. In that case the shipper, at the time of the delivery of the goods for transportation, and before they were transported, was handed a shipping receipt for the goods, which consisted of looking glasses, valued at $450, and the receipt received by the owner thereof contained the words "not accountable for contents." This receipt the owner of the goods accepted without signing, and without being requested to do so, which fact was relied upon by the company as a defense in a suit brought by the owner for the recovery of the value of the goods which were injured in transportation, it being claimed as such defense that, under the law, it was the custom for the company to ship goods in this manner without the signatures of both parties thereto, and that this released the company from liability thereon; but in discussing this feature Mr. Justice Deady says: "The law, and not such a custom, ascertains and determines the rights and liabilities of shippers and common carriers. Such pretenses of custom as this appears to be, if allowed to modify the law of the land, would place it in the power of common carriers to make and unmake the law as they choose. I conclude, therefore, that these words, 'not responsible for contents,' amount to nothing, and in no way affect the rights of the shipper or the liability of the carrier. This being the case, and it appearing that the goods were 'received in good order,' the burden of proof lies on the carrier to show that the injury to the goods arose from the only exceptions to his liability. * * *

It is urged that, since defendant had landed the goods at Elgin, and informed plaintiff's agent (Beals) that they were there and ready for delivery, and the latter, as agent of the plaintiff, had not removed them on the evening of the receipt of the notice, defendant thereafter became liable, if at all, as a warehouseman only. In this connection defendant claims that it was customary in that locality for defendant to unload from the cars on the track the goods of this class shipped to that point, which cars were usually placed in a certain locality for that purpose, and became what is known as "spotted," meaning that the car with its contents was thus placed preparatory to having the goods delivered therefrom, and that after the car reached its destination and was "spotted," and plaintiff's agent was apprised of these facts, the car, as a matter of fact, as well as of law, became a "warehouse on wheels," by reason of which it is maintained that its liability as a carrier then terminated. But whether the car became a warehouse as indicated or not the responsibility of defendant as a carrier continued until after the goods reached their destination and were either unloaded into a warehouse, or left in some other place equivalent thereto, and until plaintiff or his agent had a reasonable time to call for, examine, and remove them. "There is an irreconcilable conflict in the authorities," says Mr. Justice Wolverton, in Normile v. Oregon Nav. Co., 41 Or. 177, 182, 69 Pac. 928, "as to when the duties of a common carrier cease and those of a warehouseman begin; where freight is carried to its destination, and unloaded, and put in a place usual and convenient for its reception by the shipper. Many of the authorities hold that the shipper must have a reasonable time after the arrival and deposit thereof in which to receive and take it away; some requiring notice to the shipper also, while others relieve the carrier at once upon the safe deposit and storage at the usual place, the same being convenient for its reception by the shipper." The owner of the property shipped should undoubtedly have the right, if he chooses, of preventing his goods from remaining stored in a warehouse subject to the warehouseman's liability only as such, and, unless the carriers can announce the exact time when the goods will reach their destination, this would be impossible. That much uncertainty always exists in this respect is universally recognized, and to insist that the consignee must be on hand at the precise moment of the arrival of his cargo, which might require days, and in some instances weeks, of constant waiting and watching at the depot, is, in effect, to force upon him what he should clearly be permitted to avoid by the use of reasonable diligence. The enforcement of the rule invoked by the defendant would make these unreasonable requirements of the shipper or consignee necessary, in order to avoid the extra risk of a probable loss that might occur in a warehouse, even if such loss should occur within an hour after the cargo is unloaded and placed there. And, as stated by Mr. Justice Cooley, in McMillan v. M. S. & N. I. R. Co., 16 Mich. 79, 103, 93 Am. Dec. 208, cited with approval in Walters v. Detroit U. Ry., 139 Mich. 303, 305, 102 N. W. 1037: "To require the consignee to watch from day to day the arrival of trains, and to renew his inquiries respecting the consignment, seems to me to be imposing a burden upon him without in the least relieving the carrier. For it can hardly be doubted that it would be less burdensome to the carrier to be required to give notice than to be subjected to the numberless inquiries and examinations of his books, which would otherwise be necessary, especially at important points." In order, therefore, to avoid this burden, and at the same time impose diligence upon both the shipper and carrier without inconvenience to either, we find the weight of authority recognizes certain rules governing the delivery of the goods at their place of destination by the common carrier, which may be summarized as follows: If the person to whom the goods are shipped is present upon the arrival thereof, he must take them without unreasonable delay; if he is absent, but lives in the immediate vicinity of the place of delivery, the carrier should notify him of the arrival of the goods, after which he has a reasonable time to take and remove them; while, if he is absent, unknown, or cannot be found, then the carrier may place the goods in some warehouse, and, after keeping them a reasonable time, if the owner does not call for them, its liability as a common carrier ceases, but if, after the arrival, the consignee has a reasonable opportunity to remove them, and does not, he cannot hold the carrier as an insurer. The liability of the common carrier thus applied and limited we believe to be consonant with public policy, and sufficiently convenient and practicable. Among the authorities in support of this position are: Moses v. Boston & Maine Ry. Co., 32 N. H. 523, 64 Am. Dec. 381; Walters v. Detroit United Ry. Co., 139 Mich. 303, 102 N. W. 745; Hicks v. Wabash R. Co., 131 Iowa, 205, 108 N. W. 534, 8 L. R. A. (N. S.) 235; L. L. & G. R. Co. v. Maris, 16 Kan. 333; Mo. Pac. Ry. Co. v. Grocery Co., 55 Kan. 525, 40 Pac. 899; Normile v. Nor. Pac. Ry. Co., 36 Wash. 21, 77 Pac. 1087, 67 L. R. A. 271; Burr v. Adams Ex. Co., 71 N. J. Law, 203, 58 Atl. 609; Winslow v. Vt. & Mass. R. Co., 42 Vt. 700, 1 Am. Rep. 365; Wood et al. v. Crocker, 18 Wis. 345, 86 Am. Dec. 773.

But it is insisted by counsel for defendant that the question as to whether a reasonable time had elapsed after the arrival of the goods in which to permit plaintiff or his agent to remove them is, under the undisputed facts presented, one for the court and not for the jury to determine, and that the court erred in submitting the question to the jury. The rule on this point is clearly, concisely, and, we think, correctly, stated in Lemke v. Chicago, M. & St. P. Ry. Co., 39 Wis. 449, 455, in which the court say: "The rule doubtless is that, whenever there is a conflict of testimony in respect to material facts bearing upon the question, or when the facts are doubtful or complicated and the court cannot satisfactorily determine their weight or importance, the question as to whether a reasonable time has or has not elapsed should be submitted to the jury, under proper instructions. But when, as in this case, the facts relating to the question are few and simple, and are conclusively established by a special finding, or by the undisputed evidence, it is for the court to say whether a reasonable time has or has not elapsed for the performance of a given act." In the case before us it is disclosed by the evidence that the plaintiff's agent learned of the arrival of the goods between the hours of 4 and 5 o'clock p. m., which was a few hours after the car in which the goods were transported reached Elgin; that the shipping receipt had not arrived; that it was customary for the office to close at the hour of 6; and that, after considering these facts, he decided to wait until morning. It becomes unnecessary, therefore, to determine here whether the question of the reasonableness of the time in this instance should have been submitted to the jury, for, if the question was properly submitted to the jury, they have found adversely to defendant, and their decision thereon is not, under the testimony, subject to review; but if, on the other hand, it is a question for the court's determination, it appears from the evidence that, after the arrival of the car, the time was so short in which the goods could have been delivered, together with the lateness of the hour when plaintiff's agent was informed of the arrival thereof, that the court, under such circumstances, would have been impelled to hold that the loss occurred before the expiration of the reasonable time to which plaintiff was entitled in which to remove the property, and it would have been imperative upon the court so to instruct the jury, leaving no change in the result. It is clear, therefore, that defendant is in no position to complain in this respect.

It is next insisted that the court erred in sustaining the objections to the interrogatories tending to show that a part of the goods lost were not the property of plaintiff. Defendant makes no attempt to plead that plaintiff is not the real party in interest. Such defense must be specially pleaded, in the absence of which, testimony of the character offered on this point is inadmissible; and no error was committed in sustaining the objection thereto. Overholt v. Dietz, 43 Or. 194, 72 Pac. 695.

It is maintained that the court erred in not permitting the defendant to introduce the bill of lading in evidence on cross-examination of plaintiff, and in not permitting him to ask the plaintiff on cross-examination whether at any time prior to the shipment his attention was directed by the agent of the Oregon Railroad & Navigation Company, or by any one, to any of the printed contents on the back of the receipt, which was received by him after the fire. The point intended to be raised by the bill of lading or receipt was that it constituted a special contract between the parties releasing the defendant from liability as an insurer, and for this purpose was at the proper time admissible in evidence. West v. Washington & C. R. R. Co., 49 Or. —, 90 Pac. 668, 671. A common carrier is ordinarily considered and treated as an insurer of the goods it undertakes to transport, and all limitations of the common-law liability are in the nature of exceptions to its general responsibility, from which it follows that, in order to avoid such liability, and rely upon a limitation contract, it devolves upon the carrier both to allege and prove it. Normile v. Oregon Nav. Co., 41 Or. 177, 69 Pac. 928. This being an affirmative defense, and the burden of proof in this respect being upon the defendant, it follows that to have permitted him to go fully into this question on cross-examination would thereby have enabled him to have procured the advantage by prematurely making the witness his own, and at the same time, under the pretense of cross-examination, of depriving plaintiff of any cross-examination on the points thereby elicited. The court properly sustained the objection to this method of procedure. Hildebrand v. United Artisans, 49 Or. —, 91 Pac. 542.

A number of errors are assigned on account of instructions requested by defendant and refused by the court; but on examination we find the substance of the instructions requested, except to direct a verdict, were included in those given. Defendant was accordingly not prejudiced by the refusal to give the instructions in the form asked.

We find no error in the record detrimental to defendant, from which it follows that the judgment of the circuit court should be affirmed.

JOHNSON v. SHERIDAN LUMBER CO.*
(Supreme Court of Oregon. Feb. 4, 1908.)

1. CORPORATIONS—PROMOTERS—FIDUCIARY RELATION.

One who agrees with others to organize a corporation, in pursuance of which contract he purchases property to be turned over to the corporation, sustains toward the corporation a fiduciary relation which precludes him from deriving any secret advantage.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 12, Corporations, § 98.]

2. FRAUD—DEFENSE—ACTION AT LAW.

Fraud is available as a defense in an action at law.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 23, Fraud, § 27.]

3. PLEADING—ANSWER—CONSTRUCTION.

An amended answer not challenged by motion or a demurrer should be construed liberally, and is sufficient, where the facts would uphold a verdict if rendered thereon.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 39, Pleading, §§ 66-69.]

4. CORPORATIONS—ACTIONS—PLEADING.

Under an amended answer, in an action on a note executed by a corporation, averring that plaintiff fraudulently represented that the mill and timber lands had been purchased at a price named, and that the corporation relying on such representation adopted a resolution that in consideration of the transfer of the mill and timber lands to the corporation the stock subscribed by plaintiff and other promoters should be declared fully paid, it is fairly to be inferred that the corporation relied on the fraudulent representation, and that it had no knowledge of the secret profit alleged to have been made by plaintiff, and the facts are therefore sufficient to uphold a verdict, if rendered thereon.

*Rehearing denied March 10, 1908.

5. EVIDENCE—ADMISSIONS—PLEADINGS.

An original answer, though withdrawn by the filing of an amended answer, is admissible in evidence as a declaration against interest.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 20, Evidence, §§ 718, 719.]

6. SAME.

Where an answer denies the execution of a writing, and in a separate defense alleges that the same was made for a specific purpose, the defenses are so inconsistent that both cannot stand, and as the affirmative allegation is the latest expression of the pleader's intent, it will prevail, and the execution of the writing is thereby admitted.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 20, Evidence, §§ 713-719.]

7. SAME.

Admissions in a pleading that has been superseded by filing other formal allegations are extrajudicial, and the pleader is not concluded thereby.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 20, Evidence, §§ 718, 719; vol. 39, Pleading, § 86.]

8. SAME.

Where a pleading that has been withdrawn or superseded is offered in evidence, admissions contained therein should be construed in connection with qualifying statements, if any, and it is for the jury and not the court to determine from an inspection of the entire pleading the intent of the party interposing it.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Polk County; George H. Burnett, Judge.

Action by J. H. Johnson against the Sheridan Lumber Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed, and a new trial ordered.

This is an action by J. H. Johnson against the Sheridan Lumber Company, a corporation, to recover the amount of a promissory note given August 12, 1905, for $4,200, payable six months thereafter, with interest, at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum from that time, containing a stipulation to pay a reasonable sum as attorney's fees in case suit should be instituted thereon, and purporting to have been executed to the plaintiff by the president and secretary of the corporation on its behalf. The amended answer admits the incorporation of the defendant, but denies all the other allegations of the complaint. For a further defense it is averred that the note sued on is without any consideration. For a second defense it is stated, in effect, that in January, 1905, the plaintiff and Henry Stevenson, E. M. Yeaton, and A. A. Brace entered into an agreement to purchase a sawmill and timber lands, and to organize a corporation to engage in the manufacture of lumber. That the plaintiff and Stevenson were skilled in estimating the value of such property, and for that reason they were selected to make the purchase thereof; that, conspiring to cheat, wrong, and defraud Yeaton, Brace, and the corporation thereafter to be formed, the plaintiff and Stevenson entered into a contract with one T. H. March to purchase certain real property, agreeing to pay therefor $16,000. That thereupon the defendant corporation was organized with a capital stock of $50,000, of which sum the plaintiff subscribed $10,000, falsely representing that one-half thereof was for Stevenson, one Emil Schreler subscribed $10,000, Yeaton $5,000, and Brace $10,000; that pursuant to their intent to cheat, wrong, and defraud the defendant the plaintiff and Stevenson falsely stated to it that the price agreed to be paid for the land was $21,000; that, conformable to such fraudulent purpose, the plaintiff procured a deed of the land to be made by March to Stevenson to hold the title for the benefit of the defendant, and thereupon the plaintiff proposed to cause the premises to be conveyed to the corporation upon the payment of the several subscriptions mentioned, "and this defendant, through its board of directors, then and there relying upon the said representations, duly passed a resolution to the effect that, in consideration" of the plaintiff, Brace, Yeaton, and Schreler conveying the real property to the defendant, the stock so subscribed should be declared fully paid; that the plaintiff further represented to the defendant that he had paid March $5,000, the remainder of the purchase price above $16,000, and that the corporation owed him that sum, when he had not paid any part thereof; "that the said note was executed for and on behalf of this defendant, but without authority of the board of directors thereof, to the said J. H. Johnson in reliance upon the said false and fraudulent representations, and was pretended to be made on behalf of the said corporation without any other or further consideration than as hereinbefore stated." The reply denied the allegations of new matter in the answer, and averred, in substance, that the plaintiff, having agreed with the defendant to cut for it certain saw logs whereby he could have made a large profit, surrendered all his right under the contract to the corporation August 12, 1905, and transferred to it 84 shares of its capital stock, in consideration of $8,400, evidenced by two promissory notes, each for $4,200, one of which had been paid, and the other instrument is the note described in the complaint. The reply states further facts by way of estoppel, which are not deemed necessary to a decision herein. The cause was tried and judgment rendered in favor of the plaintiff for the amount of the note and $350 as attorney's fees, which sum was stipulated by the parties as reasonable therefor, and the defendant appeals.

Martin L. Pipes, for appellant. Bert E. Haney, for respondent.

MOORE, J. (after stating the facts as above). It is contended by defendant's counsel that the court erred in admitting in evidence the original answer filed in this cause, and in holding that an averment in that pleading afforded competent proof of the defendant's execution of the promissory note described in the complaint, and in refusing to instruct the jury as requested. To render the legal principles thus insisted upon intelligible, it becomes necessary to advert to the bill of exceptions, which contains all the evidence given at the trial, and shows that the plaintiff offered in evidence the books of the corporation, which contained the minutes of its proceedings as they consecutively occurred. An inspection of the record discloses that at a meeting of the board of directors held August 12, 1905, a resolution was adopted, authorizing the making of the note sued on in payment of certain stock of the defendant corporation, and also shows the consummation of a logging contract on behalf of the company with the plaintiff. It appears, however, that the meeting was special, at which only three of the five directors of the corporation were present, and the books do not indicate that any notice of such assembly was given to the absent officers. The parties having stipulated that the records of the corporation after August 12, 1905, do not contain any reference to the note in question, the court sustained an objection to the admission of books in evidence, on the ground that they failed to show any authority on the part of the president and secretary of the corporation to make the note. An amended answer in this cause having been filed, the note sued on, and the original answer, which was verified by the secretary of the corporation, were received in evidence over the defendant's objection and exception. E. M. Yeaton, a stockholder of the corporation, appearing as its witness, after answering a few preliminary questions, was directed as follows: "Now you may state whether or not you and Mr. Brace and Mr. Johnson (the plaintiff herein) and Mr. Stevenson had any conversation or arrangement between yourselves for the purchase of a sawmill and timber land." An objection to such inquiry having been interposed on the ground that the amended answer failed to state facts sufficient to constitute a defense, the defendant's counsel thereupon offered to prove by the witness the substance of the agreement thus alleged as new matter, and to show that during all the negotiations Johnson and Stevenson represented that the purchase price of the mill and lands was $21,000; that the directors of the corporation, being ignorant of the facts, relied upon such representations, in pursuance of which they adopted a resolution accepting a deed of the property in full payment of the subscriptions for stock; that Schreier sold his stock to the plaintiff, who, by reason of the declarations that he held his own stock and that which he had so purchased, received a certificate for 84 shares of the par value of $8,400, which he thereafter sold to the corporation; that the directors did not know that he had not paid any sum on account of his subscription or for the stock; that two of the directors were absent from the state on August 12, 1905, and two other directors—there being five in all—undertook to authorize the execution of the note in question. The defendant's counsel offered to prove by T. H. March, the person from whom the mill and timber land were secured, that $16,000 was the entire consideration therefor, but that, when a conveyance of the property was made, the plaintiff gave to him a check for $5,000, which the witness indorsed and returned. The court having sustained an objection to the offers so made, refused to permit the testimony to be given, and allowed an exception. The defendant having rested, the court directed a verdict to be returned for the plaintiff for the amount of the note and attorney's fees as agreed upon, and refused to instruct the jury, as requested, to consider the entire answer offered in evidence, and to determine therefrom whether or not the execution of the note was ever authorized by the defendant, and exceptions from such rulings were saved.

A consideration of the errors assigned necessitates an examination of the averments of new matter in the answer. As a preliminary matter, however, attention will be called to the rules of law applicable to the defense evidently intended to be interposed. Any person who agrees with others to organize a private corporation, in pursuance of which contract he purchases property for the company to be turned over to it, when legally created, sustains toward such artificial being a fiduciary relation which precludes him from deriving any secret advantage from the transaction. 23 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law (2d Ed.) 234; 7 Cur. Law, 871. If a promoter of a private corporation deceives its members as to the actual price which he paid for property and transferred to the company, or if, by collusion with the vendor, he retains or secures credit for a part of the alleged purchase price, he must account for the excess in a suit in equity, instituted for that purpose, or the company may maintain an action at law against him for the sum withheld, or for which he secured evidence of indebtedness, as money had and received to its use. Thomp. Corp. § 457. Fraud invalidates all contracts in a suit or action thereon between the original parties, and as a corollary from this legal principle the deceit of a payee of a promissory note destroys the efficacy of the negotiable instrument into the consideration of which the imposition enters. 1 Daniel, Neg. Inst. (2d Ed.) § 193. In discussing this question Mr. Justice Thacher, in Brewer v. Harris, 2 Smedes & M. 84, 41 Am. Dec. 587, says: "It has been repeatedly decided that courts of law have concurrent jurisdiction with courts of equity upon questions of fraud. Fraud saps the foundation of every contract in which it exists, and, where it evinces that a plaintiff is not entitled to recover anything because of its existence, is properly cognizable by a court of law. It has also frequently been decided that a failure of consideration, as well partial as total, may be introduced legitimately in evidence in an action at law upon a promissory note, because such defense may diminish the multiplicity and circuity of actions, which it is the policy of the law to discourage." So too, in Ferrall v. Bradford, 2 Fla. 508, 50 Am. Dec. 293, Mr. Justice Hawkins, commenting upon this rule, says: "It is an admitted principle that a court of law has a concurrent jurisdiction with a court of chancery in cases of fraud. The principles as to fraud may be often more correctly applied in a court of equity than in courts of law. Chancery can compel discovery of facts which a court of law cannot. Fraud may frequently be presumed in equity by the chancellor, while at law it is the province of the jury to find the facts and determine their character, under the instruction of the court." To the same effect see: Fleming v. Slocum, 18 Johns. (N. Y.) 403, 9 Am. Dec. 224; Lamborn v. Watson, 6 Har. & J. (Md.) 252, 14 Am. Dec. 275; Jamison v. Beaubien, 3 Scam. (Ill.) 113, 36 Am. Dec. 534.

Fraud being thus available as a defense in an action at law, the averments of new matter in the amended answer will be investigated. It is not alleged in such pleading that, when dealing with the plaintiff, the defendant had no knowledge that the mill and timber lands which it is stated he asserted cost $21,000 was purchased for $16,000, or that his profit was undisclosed. The amended answer was not challenged by a motion or a demurrer, in the absence of which that pleading should be construed liberally and its sufficiency determined by an affirmative answer to the inquiry: Would the facts thus defectively stated uphold a verdict if rendered thereon? The verdict in the case at bar is not based on the answer, it is true, but that pleading, when its adequacy is unassailed, is to be governed by the test that, while a general verdict will not supply a material averment, going to the gist of the action or defense, it will aid and may cure a defective informal statement. Houghton v. Beck, 9 Or. 325; Booth v. Moody, 30 Or. 222, 46 Pac. 884; Savage v. Savage, 36 Or. 268, 59 Pac. 461. It will be remembered that the amended answer avers, in effect, that the plaintiff fraudulently represented that the mill and timber lands had been purchased for $21,000, and that the defendant's agents, relying upon such statement, adopted a resolution that, in consideration of the transfer of the property to the corporation, the stock subscribed by the promoters should be declared fully paid. In State v. Miller, 47 Or. 562, 570, 85 Pac. 81, 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 365, it is said: "Reliance by a person upon the representations of another implies a belief in the accuracy of the declarations that inspired the confidence reposed. In the absence of faith in the truth of the statements thus made, a dependence thereon is an impossibility." It is therefore fairly to be inferred from the averment that the defendant relied upon the plaintiff's fraudulent representations that it had no knowledge of the secret profit which it is claimed he made by the transaction, and, this being so, the facts thus defectively stated would, in our opinion, uphold a verdict, if one had been rendered thereon.

The offer of the defendant's counsel to prove by the witnesses produced at the trial that his client had no knowledge of the plaintiff's alleged fraud, or of the secret profit which it is asserted he made in dealing with the property, should have been accepted, in rejecting which an error was committed. An amended answer having been filed by leave of the court, the original answer was thereby withdrawn; but, notwithstanding such pleading was thus eliminated, it was nevertheless admissible in evidence as a declaration against interest. Sayre v. Mohney, 35 Or. 141, 56 Pac. 526. If the rejected answer, when received in evidence, is to be treated as a pleading, the court properly construed the averments; for it has been held that, when an answer denies the execution of a writing, and in a separate defense alleges that the instrument was made for a specific purpose, the defenses are so inconsistent that both cannot stand, and as the affirmative allegation is the latest expression of the pleader's intention, it will prevail, and the execution of the instrument is thereby admitted. Veasey v. Humphreys, 27 Or. 515, 41 Pac. 8; Maxwell v. Bolles, 28 Or. 1, 41 Pac. 661; Baines v. Coos Bay Nav. Co., 41 Or. 135, 68 Pac. 397. Admissions in a pleading that has been superseded by filing other formal allegations of a cause of action or defense are treated as extrajudicial, by which the pleader is not concluded. 18 Cyc. 1049. Judge Elliott in his work on evidence (section 236) sanctions the admission in evidence of an adversary's pleading that has been superseded; but in discussing the effect of avowals against interest contained therein, very pertinently observes: "Suppose, however, that there are several distinct issues raised by different counts or paragraphs of a pleading. In such a case, can the statements in one of them be used as admissions upon the other issues? Upon this question there seem to be few authorities, and in the few cases in which the question has arisen the courts have not been of one mind. There is much reason in support of the view that, where the law authorizes a party to plead in this way, as, for instance, where it authorizes him to set up independent and even inconsistent defenses in different paragraphs of answer, the statements in a particular paragraph are made for the purpose of presenting the issue to which they relate, and no other, and to permit them to be used against the pleader on another issue would deprive him of his denials, or at least make it dangerous for him to do what the law authorizes him to do. He may, for instance, plead by way of denial in one paragraph, and by way of confession and avoidance in another, and it would seem unjust to permit his unavoidable and, in a sense, conditional, admissions in the latter paragraph to be taken as admissions upon the issue raised by the denial. This seems to be the view taken by most of the courts by which the question has been expressly decided." We believe reason supports the rule that, when a pleading that has been withdrawn or superseded is offered in evidence, the admissions contained therein should be construed in connection with the qualifying statements, if any, and that it is for the jury, and not for the court, to determine from an inspection of the entire pleading the intent of the party who interposed it. As supporting this view see, Jones, Ev. § 296; Granite Gold Mining Co. v. Maginness, 118 Cal. 131, 50 Pac. 269; Mott v. Consumers' Ice Co., 73 N. Y. 543; Gildersleeve v. Landon, 73 N. Y. 609.

An observance of the rules thus announced would have required the court, under proper instructions, to submit to the jury the amended answer, and also to have given the charge requested, in failing to do which errors were committed necessitating a reversal of the judgment and the granting of a new trial, which are ordered.

(51 Or. 45)

HORNEFIUS v. WILKINSON.

(Supreme Court of Oregon. Feb. 4, 1908.)

1. ASSUMPSIT, ACTION OF—PLEADING.

Where the complaint in an action of assumpsit for money had and received fails to allege that the money intrusted to defendant was the property of plaintiff, or that there was any consideration for the transaction, and the absence of such averment is supplied by the answer, from which it can be clearly inferred that the money was the property of plaintiff, the defect will be cured by a verdict for plaintiff.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 5, Assumpsit, Action of, § 129.]

2. ACTION—WAIVER OF TORT.

In an action for money received for money given to defendant to invest with his own, with which he purchased a mortgage, selling the mortgage without accounting to plaintiff for the proceeds, the claim in tort can be waived, and the action brought on implied contract.

3. ASSUMPSIT, ACTION OF—GROUNDS.

In assumpsit for money received and converted by defendant, although it is claimed that the proof merely shows defendant to have been plaintiff's agent, and that the action should have been ex delicto and not ex contractu, the right to elect to proceed on the contract and to waive the tort is the privilege of plaintiff, and not of defendant, and having so elected she is entitled to have the verdict construed to support the judgment, if possible.

4. EVIDENCE—DOCUMENTARY EVIDENCE—LETTERS—ALTERATIONS.

Letters with alterations in immaterial parts are admissible in evidence without accounting for the alterations under B. & C. Comp. § 800, providing that a party introducing a writing altered as to a material part shall account therefor.

5. APPEAL—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR—EVIDENCE.

In assumpsit for money had and received, the error of admitting in evidence a draft for $125 sent to plaintiff and containing the initials of defendant's name, without further identification to show a payment of the amount of the draft, was harmless, where defendant admitted the payment to plaintiff of that amount.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, §§ 4161-4170.]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Umatilla County; H. J. Bean, Judge.

Action by Louisa Hornefius against William J. Wilkinson. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

D. W. Bailey and W. M. Peterson, for appellant. G. W. Phelps, for respondent.

KING, C. This is an action to recover $1,500, with interest, alleged to have been delivered and intrusted to defendant by plaintiff under an express and implied contract of repayment on demand, on which contract it is averred that defendant on January 1, 1902, acknowledged $1,800 to be due plaintiff, which he then and there agreed to pay, but had, after repeated requests, neglected and refused to do. The complaint is in the usual form for money had and received; failing, however, to allege that it was the property of plaintiff, and that there was any consideration for the transaction. The answer admits the receipt of the money referred to, and asserts that it was received by defendant for the purpose of loaning it for plaintiff with money of his own, the profits from which were to be divided between them in proportion to their respective interests; and that in response to her request from time to time for current expense money he had advanced various sums to plaintiff, aggregating $710; that the funds were loaned as requested and in the manner agreed, but that, through no fault of defendant, but owing to unfortunate investments, the money of both was lost, on account of which his liability is denied. A reply being filed placing the cause at issue, trial was had resulting in a verdict and judgment as demanded.

Defendant assigns as error: (1) The admission of a certain check in evidence without sufficient identification; (2) the admission in evidence of certain letters offered, in which erasures appear without first accounting therefor; (3) the refusal of the court to grant defendant's motion for a nonsuit. The points named will be treated in their inverse order. Other questions were raised, both in the pleadings and at the trial, not indicated either in the foregoing synopsis of issues stated or errors suggested, which, not being before us, will pass unnoticed. Independent of the letters offered, an examination of the testimony discloses sufficient evidence in support of plaintiff's averments to be submitted to the jury. It appears from the testimony that plaintiff furnished the money as alleged, and that defendant purchased a mortgage with it which he afterwards sold, without accounting for the proceeds thereof. The receipt of the money is substantially admitted by the answer, and, as stated, the proof on the other points is sufficient to support the verdict.

It is insisted, however, that the complaint does not state sufficient facts to constitute a cause of action, nor to warrant a judgment under the testimony offered, in respect to which it is maintained that the complaint omits stating that the money intrusted and delivered to defendant was the property of the plaintiff, and that, in the absence of this averment, it must be presumed to be the property of defendant, making a sufficient consideration for its return an essential allegation. This contention overlooks the important feature that the absence of these averments, if considered otherwise necessary, is supplied by the answer, from which it can clearly be inferred that the money furnished was the property of plaintiff. And this is also sustained by testimony offered without objection to that effect, which, in the absence of a demurrer to the complaint and after verdict, is sufficient. Nicolai v. Krimbel, 29 Or. 76, 43 Pac. 865; Patterson v. Patterson, 40 Or. 500, 67 Pac. 664; Keene v. Eldridge, 47 Or. 179, 82 Pac. 802; Madden v. Welch, 48 Or. 199, 86 Pac. 2; Bade v. Hibbard (decided Jan. 21, 1908) 93 Pac. 364.

It is further maintained in this connection that the motion for nonsuit should have been allowed on the theory that the facts proved do not support the averments of the complaint, in support of which it is argued that the proof merely shows defendant to have been an agent of plaintiff, and that, if any cause of action is shown, it is ex delicto and not ex contractu, and our attention is directed to some authorities supporting this position; but we find the weight of authority supports the rule, and we believe it the better one, that in cases of this kind the claim in tort can be waived and the action brought upon an implied contract. Pomeroy's Code Rem. (3d Ed.) §§ 493, 571. This is certainly the settled rule in this state; and the question of the election is with the plaintiff, and not with the defendant. Miller v. Hirschberg, 27 Or. 522, 40 Pac. 506. It is immaterial whether defendant rightfully or wrongfully received the money, for, as announced in Peterson v. Foss, 12 Or. 81, 82, 6 Pac. 397, "whenever one person obtains possession of money which, ex sequo et bono, belongs to another, the latter may maintain an action to recover it." The defendant having received and wrongfully converted to his own use money to which it is practically conceded plaintiff is entitled, he cannot insist that plaintiff shall waive her contract and sue in tort for damages. She was entitled to adopt the form of action which she preferred, and, having elected to proceed in assumpsit, is entitled to have the verdict of the jury construed to support the judgment, if it can be done without violating the well-settled rules of law. See also, Crown Cycle Co. v. Brown, 39 Or. 285, 64 Pac. 451; Humbird v. Davis, 210 Pa. 311, 59 Atl. 1082; Hindmarch v.

Hoffman, 127 Pa. 284, 18 Atl. 14, 4 L. R. A. 368, 14 Am. St. Rep. 842.

It is maintained that the letters offered should not have been admitted in evidence, and that the court erred in submitting them to the jury with the erasures thereon. It appears from section 800, B. & C. Comp., and from the interpretation thereof by this court in Simpkins v. Windsor, 21 Or. 332, 28 Pac. 72, that the party producing an altered writing as genuine after its execution or making, in a part material to the dispute in question, shall account for the appearance or alteration, and further provides that it shall not be admitted in evidence unless the party producing it shows that the alteration was made by another without his concurrence, or was made with the consent of the parties affected by it, or that the alteration did not change the meaning or language of the instrument. With the exception of three or four words, the contents of the letters can be read with reasonable effort; and it is not only apparent from the letters themselves that the erasures were made merely for the purpose of omitting some of the immaterial matters in them, and connected only with matters not in dispute, but it is evident that the partially erased words consist of a part of only the immaterial portion thereof, which we think clearly comes with the rule intended by the statute.

The other error assigned relates to a certain draft for $125, sent to plaintiff by the bank of Athena, Or., containing the initials "W. J. W.," which it is insisted should not have been submitted to the jury without further identification. It is only claimed for this draft that it tends to prove a payment by defendant of the amount there indicated, and since he admits this payment, the proper identification thereof becomes immaterial, for it could not have in any way misled the jury, and the error, if it can be deemed such, was harmless.

The judgment of the court below should be affirmed.

ENOS et al. v. ANDERSON et al.

(Supreme Court of Colorado. July 1, 1907.)

1. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF—PROMISE TO ANSWER FOR DEBT OF ANOTHER—NATURE OF DEBT.

Defendants' oral agreement to pay certain notes given by plaintiffs, and secured by a deed of trust upon property conveyed by them to defendants, is not an agreement to answer for the debt of another within the statute of frauds, the statute referring only to the debt of some person other than the immediate parties to the contract of guaranty and owed to one of those parties.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 23, Frauds, Statute of, §§ 27, 31.]

2. SAME—AGREEMENT NOT TO BE PERFORMED WITHIN A YEAR—EFFECT OF PART PERFORMANCE.

Plaintiffs conveyed certain property to defendants in consideration for certain other property and defendants' oral promise to pay certain notes given by plaintiffs, and secured by a deed of trust upon the property conveyed to defendants. The notes were not due within a year. Held, that the contract being completely executed on one side was not within the statute of frauds, providing that agreements not to be performed within a year must be in writing.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 23, Frauds, Statute of, § 288.]

3. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS—COMPUTATION OF PERIOD OF LIMITATIONS—INSTRUMENTS FOR PAYMENT OF MONEY.

In consideration for certain property conveyed to them, defendants agreed to pay certain notes of plaintiffs. Defendants failed to keep their promise, and plaintiffs were compelled to pay the notes. Held, in an action to recover the amount so paid, that the statute of limitations did not begin to run until plaintiffs were required to pay the notes.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 33, Limitation of Actions, §§ 249, 261.]

4. DEEDS—CONSTRUCTION—MERGER OF PREVIOUS AGREEMENTS.

The rule applicable to all contracts that prior stipulations are merged in the final and formal contract executed by the parties applies to a deed based upon a contract to convey.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 16, Deeds, § 266.]

5. EVIDENCE—WEIGHT AND SUFFICIENCY—DEGREE OF PROOF IN GENERAL.

The quantity and quality of the proof required to establish parol agreements varying the terms of deeds is not the mere preponderance required in the ordinary civil action, but that degree of proof required to sustain a conviction in a criminal case.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 20, Evidence, § 2448.]

6. DEEDS—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—CONSIDERATION.

In an action for defendants' failure to pay plaintiffs' notes, which they orally promised to do in consideration for plaintiffs' conveyance to them by warranty deed of certain property, evidence examined, and held not to establish, beyond a reasonable doubt, so as to vary the terms of the deed by parol proof, that such promise was made.

7. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF—PROMISE TO ANSWER FOR DEBT OF ANOTHER.

Where the parties to a deed were dealing with each other regarding the grantee's assumption of certain notes as part consideration for the property, but failed to include in the deed the words which would make the grantee liable to pay such notes because the parties could not agree that such words should be included, and thereafter the grantor was compelled to pay the notes, he cannot recover from the grantee the amount so paid.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 23, Frauds, Statute of, §§ 27, 31.]

Appeal from District Court, City and County of Denver; F. T. Johnson, Judge.

Action by Isabel L. E. Anderson and another against Charles W. Enos and another. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Benedict & Phelps, for appellants. W. T. Rogers and John F. Mail, for appellees.

STEELE, C. J. On May 3, 1893, the plaintiffs (appellees here) executed and delivered to the defendants a warranty deed for the premises known as lots 23 and 24, block 3, Kettle's addition to the city of Denver. The consideration named in the deed is $12,000. This deed contains a covenant that the property is free and clear of all liens and incumbrances "except a certain deed of trust recorded in Book 888, March 7th, 1893, given to secure six thousand dollars at seven and one-half per cent. per annum." On September 25, 1894, the property was sold under the deed of trust for the sum of $2,600, and this amount, less the costs and expenses of the sale, was credited upon the notes secured by the deed of trust. Thereafter suit was brought against the plaintiffs (appellees here) to recover judgment against them for the balance due upon the notes, approximately $4,000. While the suit was pending, plaintiffs settled with the holders of the notes, and in December, 1897, or in 1898, paid $1,000 in full settlement of the demand against them. On May 27, 1902, this suit was brought; the plaintiffs alleging in their complaint that the defendants orally assumed the notes given by the plaintiffs and agreed to pay them; that the property conveyed to the defendants by the plaintiffs was of the value of $12,000; that the consideration for the conveyance of the property was the assumption of the $6,000 incumbrance and the conveyance by the defendants to the plaintiffs of property valued at $6,000; and they asked judgment against the defendants for the sum of $1,000 and interest, being the amount the plaintiffs paid to compromise the suit mentioned herein. The defendants deny that they assumed and agreed to pay the notes mentioned, and deny that the consideration for the conveyance to them was, in part, the assumption and agreement to pay the said notes. In other defenses they plead the statute of frauds and the statute of limitations, and in still others they allege, by way of cross-demand, damages sustained by reason of an alleged breach of the covenant of warranty. The court found in favor of the plaintiffs, and rendered judgment against the defendants in the sum of $1,326.65. From this judgment the defendants appealed to the court of appeals.

It is contended that the alleged contract is within that section of the statute of frauds which declares that every special promise to answer for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another shall be void unless such agreement or some note or memorandum thereof be in writing and subscribed by the party charged therewith. The agreement set out in the pleadings, and testified to by the plaintiffs, was not an agreement to answer for the debt of another person. The plaintiffs testified that the defendants agreed to assume and pay certain notes given by the plaintiffs, and secured by a deed of trust upon the property conveyed by them to the defendants. "The statute applies to promises to pay the debt of another; and this is construed by the courts of both countries to mean the debt of some person other than the immediate parties to the contract of guaranty and owed to one of those parties." Browne on the Statute of Frauds, § 183.

It is also claimed that the agreement was not to be performed within a year, and therefore came within the provisions of the statute of frauds. The case of Curtis v. Sage, 35 Ill. 22, holds, under a state of facts very similar to those shown in this case, that such a contract is not within the statute of frauds. Nor was the action barred by the statute of limitations. The alleged agreement was to pay the notes of the plaintiffs. The cause of action did not accrue to the plaintiffs until they were required to pay the notes. Within six years after they were required to make payment they brought this action, therefore it was not barred. "The rule applicable to all contracts that prior stipulations are merged in the final and formal contract executed by the parties applies, of course, to a deed based upon a contract to convey. When a deed is delivered and accepted as performance of a contract to convey, the contract is merged in the deed. Though the terms of the deed may vary from those contained in the contract, still the deed must be looked to alone to determine the rights of the parties." 2 Devlin on Deeds, § 850a. The courts have recognized various kinds of stipulations and agreements as not coming within the rule, and have permitted parties to show that a deed absolute on its face is not so in fact, and that the consideration named was not the real consideration. Whether the agreement alleged to have been made between the parties to this case could be proved and enforced as being within one of the exceptions to the rule stated, or could not be shown or enforced because within the rule, we shall not determine, but we shall assume that such an agreement can be proved and enforced. While courts have recognized parol agreements which vary the terms of deeds, the quantity and quality of the proof required to establish such agreements is not the mere preponderance required in the ordinary civil action, but that degree of proof required to sustain a conviction in a criminal case. Armor v. Spalding, 14 Colo. 302, 23 Pac. 789; Davis v. Hopkins, 18 Colo. 153, 32 Pac. 70.

There was a direct conflict in the testimony. The plaintiffs testified that the defendant Charles W. Enos agreed to pay the incumbrance on the property. He testified as positively that he refused to accept a conveyance binding him to become personally liable for the mortgage debt. He says that a deed was first prepared by the broker who acted as agent in the negotiations, containing a clause that the grantee assumed and agreed to pay the incumbrance, and that he refused to accept such a deed. One of the plaintiffs testified that he did not read the deed carefully, and that the deed was not made in accordance with his directions. He said: "I saw the deed, but I did not read it particularly over. I trusted to my real estate man, and he betrayed me." Question. "How so?" Answer. "The way you think; he made the deed out to read wrong." The court excluded any further testimony upon this subject.

The deed itself does not release the plaintiffs from personal liability on the notes, but merely excepts the deed of trust from the covenant against incumbrances. We can place no other construction upon the language of the plaintiff John Anderson than that he had instructed the broker to prepare a deed by which the defendants were to assume the mortgage debt and to pay it, and that he had failed to do so. The deed itself should be regarded as important evidence. It acknowledges the receipt of $12,000, simply conveys the property subject to the deed of trust, and contains no statement of assumption or agreement to pay the notes, and does not allege that the amount of the incumbrance was allowed to the defendants on account of purchase money. From the deed itself it would appear that the plaintiffs had received $12,000 from the defendants, in consideration of which they had conveyed the property to the defendants, and that they, and not the defendants, were to pay the incumbrance. The plaintiffs claim that of the consideration $6,000 was allowed defendants because they agreed to pay the incumbrance, and that the balance was made of items of cash paid and property transferred to plaintiffs by the defendants. To thus vary the terms of the deed by parol proof, it was incumbent upon plaintiffs to establish beyond a reasonable doubt that such agreement was made. This, we think, the plaintiffs have not done. We are not unmindful of the numerous decisions of this court holding that the findings of a trial court will not be disturbed where there is a conflict of testimony, but we are satisfied that the court must have based his decision upon the ground that the testimony preponderated in favor of the plaintiffs, and overlooked the rule which requires the establishment of such agreements beyond a reasonable doubt. Moreover, from the testimony of John Anderson, it appears that he instructed the broker to incorporate into the deed words by which the defendants assumed and agreed to pay the notes secured by the deed of trust; clearly establishing the fact that the subject of becoming personally liable for the incumbrance was the matter of negotiations between the parties. It also appears that Dr. Enos refused to accept such a deed, and if they were dealing with each other upon the subject, and failed to include in the deed the words which would make the defendants liable because the parties could not agree that such words should be included in the deed, the law will not permit plaintiffs to recover. Such was the holding in Nesmith v. Martin, 32 Colo. 77, 75 Pac. 590.

For the reasons given, the judgment is reversed.

CASWELL and MAXWELL, JJ., concur

(41 Colo. 345)

WICKHAM v. PEOPLE.(Supreme Court of Colorado. Nov. 4, 1907.
Rehearing Denied Feb. 3, 1908.)1. INFORMATION—AFFIDAVIT TO SUPPORT—SUFFICIENCY.

Under 3 Mills' Ann. St. Rev. Supp. § 1432h, authorizing a district attorney in certain cases to file an information upon affidavit of any person knowing of the commission of an offense, and who is a competent witness setting forth the offense, etc., an information is not defective because the party who verifies it did not have personal knowledge of the commission of the offense, where an affidavit in conformity to the statute was filed.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 27, Indictment and Information, § 168.]

2. CRIMINAL LAW—APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR.

3 Mills' Ann. St. Rev. Supp. § 1432b, requires the district attorney to indorse on an information the names of witnesses known to him at the time of filing and names of other witnesses becoming known to him before the trial, but provides that witnesses whose names or the materiality of whose testimony are first learned by the attorney upon the trial may be called. Held that, though the statute is mandatory, it was not reversible error to allow, on the day before the day a case was set for trial, the district attorney to indorse upon the information the names of additional witnesses said to have been known to him when the information was filed, where defendant did not apply for a continuance, nor make a showing of surprise or prejudice, and no such showing is made on appeal.

3. WITNESSES—LEADING QUESTIONS.

It was proper to allow the district attorney to ask a witness leading questions, where the witness had made a previous statement to him, a portion of which the witness was attempting to conceal to the district attorney's surprise, the questions objected to being asked to refresh the witness' recollection.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 50, Witnesses, § 848.]

4. CRIMINAL LAW—ORDER OF PROOF—WITHDRAWING EVIDENCE.

In a murder trial, it was proper for the court upon its own motion to withdraw from the jury testimony relating to decedent's reputation for peace, etc., where it was received upon the supposition that it would be made competent by subsequent testimony, and the subsequent testimony was not offered.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 14, Criminal Law, § 1612.]

5. CRIMINAL LAW—WITHDRAWING EVIDENCE ORALLY—PROPRIETY.

Where testimony has been received upon the supposition that it would be made competent by subsequent testimony, and the subsequent testimony is not offered, the court properly directs orally the withdrawal of the testimony given.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 14, Criminal Law, § 1612.]

6. HOMICIDE—MURDER—"COOLING TIME"—INSTRUCTION ON—PROPRIETY.

In a murder trial, it was proper to refuse to instruct respecting "cooling time," where accused went to a house and there discussed charges against him of immoral conduct said to have been made by decedent, and putting a gun in his pocket declared he was going to hunt decedent, an hour or more elapsing from the time he went to, until he left, the house, and where he met decedent a short distance from the house and struck him, and while decedent was retreating shot him, walked three blocks, talked with several persons, examined a cut in his neck inflicted by decedent, and 10 or 15 minutes later returned to where decedent lay and killed him.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 26, Homicide, §§ 62-64.]

7. SAME—QUESTION OF LAW.

In a murder trial, whether accused had sufficient "cooling time" after being provoked to heat of passion by, and before killing, decedent, is a question of law.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 26, Homicide, § 565.]

8. SAME—MURDER IN FIRST DEGREE—DELIBERATION—EXTENT.

If one actually forms the purpose maliciously to kill another, and deliberates and premeditates upon it, and then does the act, he commits murder in the first degree, no matter how short the time may have been, if but the time necessary for one thought to follow another between the purpose and its execution.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 26, Homicide, § 14.]

9. SAME—APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR—INSTRUCTIONS.

In a murder trial, error in an instruction taking from the jury the consideration of all degrees of murder, excepting the first, is not ground for reversing a conviction in the first degree and a sentence of life imprisonment, where the evidence warranted the conviction and the infliction of a death penalty, and if the jury had returned a verdict in the second degree the judge would have been in duty bound to impose a life sentence; the entire evidence, including accused's, excluding the idea of manslaughter.

Bailey and Caswell, JJ., dissenting.

En Banc. Error to District Court, City and County of Denver; El. B. Armour, Judge.

Peter Wickham was convicted of murder in the first degree, and he brings error. Affirmed.

Morrison & De Soto and Morrison & Bailey, for plaintiff in error. William H. Dickson, Atty. Gen., and Samuel H. Thompson, Jr., Asst. Atty. Gen., for the People.

MAXWELL, J. Under an information charging murder, plaintiff in error was convicted of murder of the first degree, and sentenced to the penitentiary for life.

1. The court overruled a motion to quash the information, based upon the ground that the information was not supported by the affidavit of any person having knowledge of the commission of the offense, as required by section 1432h, 3 Mills' Ann. St. Rev. Supp., the pertinent part of which is: "But if a preliminary examination has not been had or when upon such examination the accused has been discharged, or when the affidavit or complaint upon which the examination has been held has not been delivered to the clerk of the proper court, the district attorney may, upon affidavit of any person who has knowledge of the commission of an offense, and who is a competent witness to testify in the case, setting forth the offense and the name of the person or persons charged with the commission thereof, upon being furnished with the names of the witnesses for the prosecution, by leave of court first had, file an information, and process shall forthwith issue thereon." The affidavit was in conformity with the requirements of the statute. Where this is true, this court has held that an information cannot be attacked upon the ground that the party who verified it did not have personal knowledge of the commission of the offense charged. Holt v. People, 23 Colo. 1, 45 Pac. 374; Bergdahl v. People, 27 Colo. 302, 61 Pac. 228; Barr v. People, 30 Colo. 522, 71 Pac. 392; Overland C. M. Co. v. People, 32 Colo. 263, 75 Pac. 924, 105 Am. St. Rep. 74.

2. Over the objection of plaintiff in error, the day preceding the day the case was set for trial the district attorney by order of court was permitted to indorse upon the information the names of additional witnesses for the people. This is claimed to be error upon the ground that the witnesses whose names were so indorsed were known to the district attorney at and before the time the information was filed. Section 1432b, 3 Mills' Ann. St. Rev. Supp., referring to the duty of the district attorney in this behalf, provides: "He shall indorse thereon the names of such witnesses as are known to him at the time of filing the same, and shall also indorse upon such information the names of such other witnesses as may become known to him before the trial at such time as the court may, by rule or otherwise, prescribe; but this shall not preclude the calling of witnesses whose names or the materiality of whose testimony are first learned by the district attorney upon the trial." Three classes of witnesses are designated by the statute—those known to the district attorney at the time of filing the information, those who shall become known before the trial, and those whose names or the materiality of whose testimony are first learned upon the trial. That this statute is mandatory cannot be doubted. It is the duty of the district attorney to comply with it. Justice to the accused demands such compliance, so that he may be fully advised of those who will confront him as witnesses at the trial. No application for a continuance was made, and no showing of surprise or prejudice was made, by plaintiff in error, by reason of the action complained of, and there is no such contention here. Plaintiff in error may have been fully advised as to what the witnesses would testify to, their character, and all other matters desirable for him to know. Under this condition we cannot say that the action of the court was reversible error. Boydin v. People, 22 Colo. 496, 498, 45 Pac. 419.

3. It is urged that error was committed in allowing the district attorney to ask a witness leading questions. It appears that the witness had made a previous statement to the district attorney, a portion of which he was attempting to conceal, to the surprise of the district attorney. The questions to which objections were made were propounded for the purpose of refreshing the recollection of the witness. In Babcock v. People, 13 Colo. 515, 520, 22 Pac. 817, 819, in discussing this subject, it is said: "Under such circumstances, where a party is really taken by surprise at the conduct of his own witness, it is in the discretion, and is often the duty, of the trial court to allow a party to put leading questions to his own witness, as the only means of preventing an unwilling witness from concealing the truth by unsatisfactory or evasive answers; and in extreme cases, where it is apparent that a witness is giving testimony contrary to the reasonable expectation of the party calling him, such party should be allowed to cross-examine such witness for the purpose of refreshing his recollection, with the view of modifying his testimony or of revealing his real animus in the case." In Hickory v. U. S., 151 U. S. 303, 14 Sup. Ct. 334, 38 L. Ed. 170, the court said: "When a party is taken by surprise by the evidence of his witness, the latter may be interrogated as to inconsistent statements previously made by him for the purpose of refreshing his recollection and inducing him to correct his testimony." The court committed no error in overruling the objections to the questions.

4. At the close of all the testimony, upon his own motion, the court withdrew from the consideration of the jury testimony relating to the reputation of the deceased for peace and good order, stating that such testimony was received upon the supposition that it would be rendered material and competent by testimony offered later in the case, and that such later testimony was not forthcoming. Davidson v. People, 4 Colo. 145, and Babcock v. People, 13 Colo. 515, 22 Pac. 817, are cited in support of this assignment of error. Neither case cited supports the contention of counsel. In both evidence of uncommunicated threats made by the deceased against the accused immediately before the killing was excluded. This was held to be error. In the case at bar there is no evidence in the record to justify the admission of testimony as to the reputation of deceased for peace and good order. There was no error in excluding the testimony under consideration. The above ruling was made by the court orally. It was objected to upon this ground. It does not come within the rule which applies to oral instructions. An instruction is thus defined: "An instruction is an exposition of the principles of law applicable to a case, or to some branch or phase of a case, which the jury are bound to apply in order to render the verdict establishing the rights of the parties in accordance with the facts proved." 11 Ency. P. & F. 56. The ruling was one which had been reserved upon the question of the admissibility of certain testimony, which had been admitted upon the statement of counsel that testimony to be subsequently offered would render it material. To hold that a ruling upon the admission or rejection of testimony, made during the progress of a trial, must be reduced to writing, would be an innovation. This is the ultimate result of counsels' contention. There is no merit in the assignment of error.

5. Plaintiff in error requested a number of instructions, many, if not all of which, were refused. Counsel for plaintiff in error, in their printed brief and upon oral argument, discussed only those assignments of error based upon the refusal of the court to give requested instructions relative to "cooling time," and we shall confine our examination to such assignments. A discussion of this assignment of error and others which are to follow necessitates a statement of the evidence in the case. Between 8 and 9 o'clock of the evening of April 21, 1906, Wickham, plaintiff in error, having put a gun in his hip pocket, left a hotel at Elyria in this city, and went to the house of Mrs. Erickson, where he met his wife, who was temporarily stopping with Mrs. Erickson, having recently left the County Hospital. Some conversation took place between Wickham, his wife, Mrs. Erickson, and others present, relating to remarks which Tom Darling, the deceased, is said to have made to Wickham's wife to the effect that Wickham had had improper relations with another woman. Wickham's wife said to plaintiff in error that she was only fooling in what she told him, and that he ought to have no feeling against Darling. Wickham took his gun out of his hip pocket, made threats against Darling, put the gun into his coat pocket, and said that he was going out to hunt Darling. Mrs. Wickham, Mrs. Erickson, and others tried to dissuade him from having any trouble with Darling, and Mrs. Erickson told her daughters to hunt up Darling, warn him that Wickham was after him, and tell him to get away. It appears that an hour or more elapsed from the time when Wickham came to Mrs. Erickson's house and when he left. Wickham left the house, and within a few feet thereof met Darling coming towards the house with three others, accosted him, charged him with telling stories to his wife, struck him with his left fist, and knocked him down. Darling arose, and was knocked down by Wickham three times in succession. Wickham testified that he knocked Darling down once, and that he (Darling) fell down twice. Five witnesses for the prosecution testified that Wickham knocked Darling down three times, and that when Darling arose the third time Wickham pulled his gun out of his coat pocket and began to beat Darling over the head with it. Wickham testified that he did not pull his gun until after he had discovered that he had been cut. Witnesses for the prosecution testified that Wickham did not discover that he had been cut until after he had beaten Darling with the gun, and that Darling was retreating on the run when Wickham followed him along the sidewalk to the line of a vacant lot, where Darling dropped to his hands and knees, and Wickham fell over him. Darling arose and started to run across the vacant lot, when Wickham called to him to halt, which Darling did, and turned part way around, and Wickham shot him in the side. Darling fell in his tracks, and Wickham started to walk up the street, cut across a vacant lot to Forty-Seventh street, distant about half a block, walked along this street two blocks and a half to a barber shop, which he entered. On his way to the barber shop he stopped and talked to two or three different parties whom he met. After entering the barber shop he walked up to a mirror and examined the cut on the side of his neck. Wickham testified: "I says: 'Good God, fellows, I believe I am going to die.' I says: 'He has cut my juglar vein.' With that I walked out of the shop." A witness for the prosecution, who was in the barber shop, testified, in answer to the question, "Was there anything else said there?" as follows: "Why, there was nothing any more than after he had seen himself in the glass, and says: '——— has got me.' He says: 'I am going back and finish him, or something like that.'" Another witness for the prosecution, who was in the barber shop, testified: "He pulled out a gun, and he says: 'I have got one more shot in there, and I will fix him,' and out he went." A witness for the defense, who was in the barber shop, testified: "He said something about he had fixed him, the fellow had got him, and he had fixed the other fellow. At that he turned, and he pulled his gun and pointed it towards me, and I walked out." As to what took place after plaintiff in error left the barber shop, he testified: "I walked down the street, and I met another fellow. He says: 'Pete,' he says, 'why don't you go to a doctor?' I says: 'I don't know where I can find one.' Well, after that I walked down, and come across the lot. I says: 'He has—' 'If he got me,' I says, 'I will get him.' I walked down through the vacant lot again and through the alley. I got around in the vacant lot where he was. He seen me, and I seen him. He says: 'Never mind, you ——, I will get you yet.' At that I pulled away, and shot him again. Q. What did you have in your mind at the time you left that barber shop with the gun in your hand, if you had it in your hand? A. Well, after I seen I was bleeding so, and after they said I would bleed to death if I didn't get that blood stopped, why, I would bleed to death, and I thought then that when this Darling dropped he dropped just for a stall like he did on the sidewalk, and I thought as long as I was going to die, why, I thought I would get him. Q. And then you intended to kill him at the time you started from the barber shop. Isn't that true? A. Well, I didn't exactly intend to kill him—no, sir—until he made this remark: 'You dirty ——, I will get you yet.' Q. What did you go back to that vacant lot for if you didn't intend to kill him on that occasion?

A. I don't know, sir. * * * Q. Now, if you had it in your mind and in your intention to let him go, why did you leave the barber shop and go back to that vacant lot? A. I couldn't tell, sir. * * * Well, I knowed that after that he would kill me if I didn't kill him. Q. But you were up at the barber shop, two or three and a half blocks away from him. There was no danger of his killing you. * * * A. Not at the time. Q. Is that the only reason you have to give why you went back to the vacant lot from the barber shop? A. I didn't have no reasons. Only I knowed if I hadn't hit him the first shot, I knowed he would kill me. Q. You knew that if you hadn't hit him with the first shot he was probably alive yet? A. Yes, sir. Q. And you went back there to kill him? A. Yes, sir; he has made threats on me before." Five witnesses for the prosecution testified that when Wickham came back to where Darling was lying on the ground he put his foot under Darling's head, turned it over, and said: "You — — — —, haven't you got enough yet?" put his gun close to Darling's head, and shot him the second time, the shot blowing his brains out. Powder marks were found on the left side of Darling's head, showing that he could not have been looking in the direction of Wickham when the last shot was fired. The interval of time between the first and second shot was from 10 to 15 minutes.

Going back to the request for instructions as to "cooling time," it is not clear from the brief or argument of counsel whether they mean "cooling time" between the time Wickham made the threats against Darling in Mrs. Erickson's house, or the time between the first and second shots. In either case we do not believe that under the evidence in this case error was committed in refusing the request for an instruction relating to "cooling time." While there is some conflict in the authorities, the weight of authority and the better doctrine seems to be that "cooling time" is a question of law for the court, and not a question for the jury. "Ordinarily the sufficiency the cooling time, and the sufficiency of the provocation, are respectively deemed questions of law, not of fact. But the time required to cool, for example, is sometimes, it is believed with great propriety, submitted to the jury." 2 Bishop's New Criminal Law, § 713. "It is well settled that the question of cooling time is a question of law to be decided by the court, and not a question for the jury. But if such question is left to the jury, and they decide it as the court should, it will be but harmless error." Hughes, Criminal Law, § 4. "The court may, as a matter of law, instruct that the defendant had sufficient cooling time after being provoked to a heat of passion, where the evidence clearly warrants the instruction, and that in such case an unlawful killing would not be reduced to manslaughter." Hughes, Instructions to Jurors, § 254. Numerous cases are cited by the authorities above quoted, many of which we have examined, and believe that the weight of authority is with the doctrine announced by the text-writers above quoted from. Upon this subject, as a part of instruction 4 given by the court, the jury were told: "If one actually forms the purpose maliciously to kill a human being, and deliberates and premeditates upon it before performing the act, and then performs it, he is guilty of murder in the first degree, no matter how short the time may have been, if but the time necessary for one thought to follow another between the purpose and its execution." The above-quoted portion of the instruction is the basis of one of the assignments of error urged. This instruction is warranted by what this court said in Van Houton v. People, 22 Colo. 53, 66, 43 Pac. 137. Under the evidence in this case there was no error in refusing the instructions requested, or the instruction given, above quoted.

6. The seventeenth instruction related to the law of self-defense. It is criticised by counsel upon the ground, as they say, that it totally ignores the distinction between an assault committed with felonious intent, and an assault committed with the intention to inflict a beating only. We do not think the instruction is subject to the criticism made, but, on the contrary, believe that it correctly states the law applicable to the facts of this case.

7. The eighteenth instruction was: "You are instructed that, if you believe from the evidence in this case, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the defendant was informed that deceased had stated to defendant's wife that the defendant had had or was having improper relations with some other woman, and that thereupon he sought out the deceased and assaulted him only with the intention of giving him a beating, and if you still further believe from the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the defendant did assault the deceased by beating him and knocking him down, and while so doing was resisted and wounded by the deceased with a knife or in some other manner, and that then and thereupon the defendant shot and killed the deceased, you should find the defendant guilty as charged in the information, notwithstanding any wounds, however serious, that he may have received at the hands of the deceased." The instruction is objected to upon the ground that it took from the jury the consideration of all degrees of murder except the first. The court had fully, correctly, and fairly instructed the jury as to the several degrees of murder and manslaughter, and had instructed them that in arriving at their verdict the instructions were to be considered as a whole. With the exception of this instruction, the charge as a whole was without error. An indictment or information for murder in the first degree includes also murder in the second degree and manslaughter, and as the court had defined the several degrees of murder and manslaughter the jury could have returned any verdict they believed the evidence justified. The instruction is faulty, and should not have been given. As an abstract proposition of law, it is entirely indefensible. As applied to the evidence in this case, it incorrectly states the facts, and cannot be defended as a correct statement of the law, applicable to cases upon facts similar to those stated in the instruction. There is nothing in the evidence to show that the accused sought out the deceased and assaulted him only with the intention of giving him a beating. On the contrary there is abundant evidence to justify the conclusion that it was the deliberate and premeditated intention of the accused to seek the defendant and kill him. This intention was manifest from the brutal and heartless conduct of the accused from the moment he assaulted the deceased until he blew his brains out, while he was lying in a dying condition upon the ground; and every act of accused showed an abandoned and malignant heart, bent on murder, from the time he left the house in search of his victim until he fired the last shot. Again, the entire evidence, except that of the accused, showed the deceased was at all times trying to protect himself against the assault of the accused, and finally to escape his assailant; that deceased did not cut the accused until after he had been beaten over the head with a gun in the hands of the accused; that thereupon he endeavored to make his escape by flight, and after he had started to run, and was at a distance of 50 feet from the accused, he halted, at the command of the accused, and received the first bullet (which was necessarily fatal, according to the testimony of the doctor who performed the autopsy), so that the statement in the instruction to the effect that deceased resisted and wounded the accused at the time of his being knocked down and beaten was contrary to the evidence in the case.

The language of this court in Van Houton v. People, 22 Colo., 53, 66, 43 Pac. 137, 142, we think is peculiarly applicable to the facts shown by the evidence in this case: "The entire evidence, excepting only that of the accused, negatives the conclusion that this was a case of mutual combat, and thereby excludes the idea of manslaughter. So, also, the plea of self-defense is not within our consideration, and it is negatived by all the evidence except that of the defendant, and was resolved against him by the jury. The crime of murder alone remains. This the statute divides into two degrees, i. e., murder of the first degree, and murder of the second degree. Murder being established, the law in its humanity declares it to be murder of the second degree in the absence of circumstances showing it to have been murder of the first degree." The entire evidence in this case, including that of the accused, excludes the idea of manslaughter. A verdict of manslaughter would have been a gross miscarriage of justice. The punishment imposed by statute for murder of the second degree is imprisonment in the penitentiary for a term of not less than 10 years, and may be extended to life. If the jury had returned a verdict of murder of the second degree, under the testimony in this case, including that of the accused, the judge who presided at the trial would have been recreant and remiss in the discharge of his duty, had he failed to have sentenced the accused to the penitentiary for life. The jury, in the exercise of the discretion, mercy, and humanity vested in them by the law, by their verdict, sentenced the plaintiff in error to imprisonment in the penitentiary for life, whereas, the evidence in this case, in our judgment, would have warranted the infliction of the death penalty. When a case is entirely free from doubt, and it affirmatively appears that the defendant was not and could not have been prejudiced by error in the instructions, error in the charge is not ground for reversal. Mackey v. People, 2 Colo. 13; Clare v. People, 9 Colo. 122, 125, 10 Pac. 799; In People v. Donahue, 45 Cal. 321, it is said: "The rule is that judgments will be reversed for alleged errors in instructions only when, looking at the testimony, we can see that the jury may have been misled by them to the prejudice of the defendant, or when, in the absence of the testimony, it is apparent that the instructions would be improper under any possible condition of the evidence." We believe that the rule announced in the cases last cited is a wholesome one, and should be applied in this case. There is no pretense that the evidence is not sufficient to sustain the verdict. Our conclusion is that, while the eighteenth instruction, for the reasons above stated, should not have been given, the same was without prejudice to the accused.

8. The nineteenth instruction given by the court is assigned as error. This instruction relates to the second shot fired by the accused, and is objected to upon substantially the same grounds as those urged to instruction No. 18. The instruction is not in any wise open to the objections urged against it. It correctly stated the facts as shown by all the evidence in the case, and is a correct statement of the law applicable to such facts.

There being no prejudicial error in the record, the judgment will be affirmed.

Affirmed.

BAILEY, J., dissents, for the reason that the eighteenth instruction given by the court to the jury was erroneous in that it took from the jury the consideration of all degrees of murder except the first degree. No matter what the facts and circumstances of the killing were, and even though they pointed conclusively to the guilt of the defendant of murder in the first degree, still the degree of guilt was a question to be determined by the jury, and the court did not have the power or authority to relieve the jury of that duty. The error is not cured by the fact that in other instructions the jury was informed as to the several degrees of murder and manslaughter. The giving of three correct instructions does not dissipate the evil effect of one incorrect one. Neither the trial court nor this court can determine what influence the eighteenth instruction had upon the minds of the jury. By that instruction the jury was practically told that, if it believed the contention made by the defense, it should, nevertheless, find the defendant guilty of murder in the first degree.

CASWELL, J., joins in the above dissent.

LOWER LATHAM DITCH CO. et al. v.
BIJOU IRRIGATION CO.

(Supreme Court of Colorado. Nov. 4, 1907.
Rehearing Denied Feb. 3, 1908.)

1. WATERS AND WATER COURSES—IRRIGATION—CHANGE IN PLACE OF DIVERSION—PROCEED-INGS—ABANDONMENT.

Sess. Laws 1899, p. 235, c. 105, relating to irrigation, provides for changes of the point of diversion where an adjudication of relative priorities has been had under the statutes enacted for that purpose, but does not contemplate the determination of the question of abandonment, and the presumption is that such rights continue in existence until a court of competent jurisdiction in an appropriate proceeding has otherwise determined.

2. SAME—DEFENSES.

In a proceeding to change the point of diversion of water from an irrigation ditch, it is no defense that consumers in another district, who are not parties to the proceeding, would be injured by the change.

3. SAME—RIGHT TO CHANGE POINT OF DIVERSION AN INCIDENT OF OWNERSHIP.

The right to change the point of diversion or place of use of water, which has been obtained as the result of an appropriation, is one of the incidents of ownership, independent of statute, and the only limitation upon it is that the rights of others be not infringed.

4. SAME—STATUTES—REMEDIAL STATUTES—IRRIGATION.

Sess. Laws 1899, p. 235, c. 105, providing for a change of the point of diversion of water from an irrigation ditch, is purely remedial, and one of its objects is to prevent a multiplicity of suits, and not to allow a change to be made until all persons who might be affected thereby are notified and given an opportunity to be heard.

5. SAME.

Before the passage of Sess. Laws 1899, p. 235, c. 105, providing for a change of the point of diversion of water from an irrigation ditch, the owner of a right to use water from any of the streams of the state for irrigation might in equity sue one respondent alone, and have determined as against him the right to change the point of diversion, and the right was not limited to any particular territory, or confined to any arbitrary diversion of the stream.

6. SAME—JURISDICTION OF DISTRICT COURT.

Under Sess. Laws 1899, p. 235, c. 105, providing for a change of the point of diversion of water from an irrigation ditch, the district court has jurisdiction to render a decree permitting a change in the point of diversion from one water district to another.

Appeal from District Court, City and County of Denver; F. T. Johnson, Judge.

Petition by the Bijou Irrigation Company against the Lower Latham Ditch Company and others to obtain a change in the point of diversion of water from an irrigation ditch. Judgment for petitioner, and certain respondents appeal. Affirmed.

H. N. Haynes and Goudy & Twitchell, for appellants. James W. McCreery, for appellee.

CAMPBELL, J. This proceeding by appellee, as petitioner below, was under "an act in relation to irrigation" (Sess. Laws 1899, p. 235, c. 105), and the object was to obtain a decree permitting a change of the point of diversion of the right to the use of water for irrigation originally decreed to the Frederick Bros. ditch, which is situate in water district No. 2, and now owned by petitioner, to the head gate of the Bijou ditch, also owned by petitioner, and situate in water district No. 1. The cause was referred to a referee to take evidence and make findings of fact and report a decree. The court, with some modifications and corrections, approved of the referee's findings, and entered a decree in favor of the petitioner as prayed for. Some of the respondents appealed, and rely for reversal upon four grounds: (1) That the priority in question had been totally abandoned prior to its acquisition by the petitioner; (2) that a partial abandonment thereof occurred; (3) that the change, if allowed, would injuriously affect the vested rights of the respondents; (4) that the district court was without jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the petition.

The first two contentions are at rest in this jurisdiction. Trial and decision of the pending cause was had, and briefs were filed here before publication of the opinion of this court in Wadsworth Ditch Co. v. Brown (Colo.) 88 Pac. 1060. We decided there that the statute under which such proceedings are conducted does not contemplate the determination of the question of abandonment. The statute provides for changes of the point of diversion where an adjudication of relative priorities has been had under the statutes enacted for that purpose. The presumption is that such rights continue in existence until a court of competent jurisdiction in an appropriate proceeding has otherwise determined, and no such determination has been had of this priority. We adhere to, and approve of, the former decision.

The record shows that appellants' claim of injury was, though not entirely, yet largely, based upon the assumption that the Frederick Bros.' priority had been abandoned in whole or in part, and thereafter appropriated and used by respondents. Since the issue of abandonment could not be herein determined, it necessarily follows that, in so far as appellants' claim of injury grows out of, or depends upon, a resolution of that issue in their favor, it cannot be upheld here.

We have examined with care the further claim that the evidence, aside from that concerning the issue of abandonment, proves that the desired change in the point of diversion, if made, would injuriously affect the vested rights of appellants. We think the finding of the referee, which was approved by the court, that appellants are not injuriously affected, is abundantly sustained by the evidence. It would serve no useful purpose to examine this evidence in detail; for decision of such issues depends so largely upon the facts of each particular case that determination in one cause is of little or no value in another.

Counsel for appellants vigorously argues that vested rights of water consumers in district No. 1, which is farther down the natural stream than district No. 2, would necessarily be infringed by the contemplated change in the point of diversion from the original headgate of the Frederick Bros.' ditch in district No. 2 to the headgate of the Bijou ditch in district No. 1. If that be true, and we express no opinion about it, certainly appellants would not be affected thereby, for they own neither land nor water rights in district No. 1. They are concerned only as to the effect the change may have upon their own rights, as appropriators of water in district No. 2, and may not interpose an objection that consumers other than themselves would be hurt. Crippen v. Glasgow (Colo.) 87 Pac. 1073.

The only important or fairly debatable question in the case is that of jurisdiction. Appellants say that changes in the point of diversion from one water district to another are not within the purview of this statute. This is said to be so because the remedial statute requires proof that all parties who may be affected by such change have been duly notified of the proceeding, and the practice and procedure thereunder is the same as if the petition were for an original decree; and if a decree is rendered permitting the change, only the water commissioner of the water district in which the original headgate, or point of diversion, is situate, is required to be notified thereof, so as to allot the priority in accordance with such change. These requirements, together with the provision of the statutes under which such original decrees are rendered, that notice is to be given only to persons thereby affected, and who live within the same water district, and not to those outside, demonstrate, says counsel, that the changes contemplated are to be restricted to one water district. The fundamental error in the contention that under this statute changes cannot be made from one water district to another lies in the erroneous assumption that the right to a change is conferred by the statute. It is a pre-existing right, and the only limitation to its enjoyment and enforcement is that the rights of others be not thereby infringed. The statute is purely remedial, as we have held in New Cache la Poudre Irr. Co. v. Water S. & S. Co., 29 Colo. 469, 68 Pac. 781, and other subsequent cases. The right to change the point of diversion, or place of use, of water which has been obtained as the result of an appropriation, is one of the incidents of ownership, and existed and was exercised in this state long before this remedial statute was enacted. Wadsworth Ditch Co. Case, supra. In Strickler v. Colo. Springs Co., 16 Colo. 61, 26 Pac. 313, 25 Am. St. Rep. 245, a change in the point of diversion was made where there was only one party respondent. True it is that there both points of diversion were within the same water district; but before this statute was passed the owner of a right to use water from any of the streams of this state for irrigation might bring an equitable action against one respondent alone, and have determined as against him the right to change the point of diversion. Such right was not limited to any particular territory, or confined to any arbitrary division of the stream.

One of the objects of the remedial statute under which this proceeding is being conducted was to put a stop to a multiplicity of actions, and not to allow such changes to be made until all persons who might be affected thereby are notified and given an opportunity to be heard. It must be admitted that the prescribed procedure will not fully effectuate that object. But the statute prescribes that the practice and procedure as to notice, etc., thereunder, shall be the same as if the petition were for an original decree, and therewith petitioner and the court have fully complied. This court more than once has expressed regret that our General Assembly did not include in one water district the principal stream and all its tributaries, so that a decree therein, when pronounced, should absolutely bind all the users of water therefrom. Notwithstanding this, our courts have proceeded to adjudications thereunder, and this court has held that the resulting decrees are conclusive and binding upon all those within the same water district, and prima facie correct, as between different water districts. Ind. Ditch Co. v. Agri. Ditch Co., 22 Colo. 513, 528, 45 Pac. 444, 55 Am. St. Rep. 149. And in Ft. Lyon Canal Co. v. Arkansas Valley S. B. & I. L. Co. (Colo.) 90 Pac. 1023, it was held that they become binding upon all consumers from the same source of supply, both within and beyond the district, when not questioned within the time limited therefor by the statute. We may also say here that it is unfortunate that this remedial statute did not contain a provision for giving notice to those outside the particular water district when a change from one district to another is sought, and that it lacked the specific directions for giving effect to the decree which the curative act (Sess. Laws 1903, p. 278, c. 124) contains. But these omissions and defects do not destroy the property right of a water-right owner to have his point of diversion changed from one water district to another, though it may affect the conclusiveness of the decree which permits him to make such change, in accordance with the decisions just cited.

The objection which appellants now interpose to the jurisdiction of the district court to render a decree authorizing a change in the point of diversion from one water district to another is just as applicable to the jurisdiction of the district court to enter the original decrees, and such objection has repeatedly been held not good. Our conclusion is that the district court had jurisdiction under the act of 1899, upon a compliance by petitioner and the court with the practice as to notice, etc., therein prescribed, which was observed in this case, to render a decree permitting a change in the point of diversion from one water district to another.

The judgment of the district court must be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

SEVEN LAKES RESERVOIR CO. v. NEW LOVELAND & GREELEY IRRIGATION & LAND CO.

(Supreme Court of Colorado. July 1, 1907.

On Rehearing, Nov. 4, 1907.)

1. WATERS AND WATER COURSES—IRRIGATION—PRIORITY—USE.

A priority to the use of water is a property right, which is the subject of purchase and sale, and in its character and method of use may be changed, provided such change does not injuriously affect the rights of others.

2. SAME—STORAGE OF WATER—QUANTITY.

The owner of a priority for direct irrigation is entitled to store, during the direct irrigation season, the quantity of water, measured by volume and time, which it would be entitled to divert during that period for the purpose of direct irrigation, and to use the same later in the same season for irrigating crops requiring irrigation at that time, when the direct supply would be insufficient.

On Rehearing.

3. APPEAL—REHEARING—QUESTIONS CONSIDERED.

Where on appeal from a judgment in an action to determine water rights it was not urged that the decree should not be entered until all the parties whose rights might be thereby affected were before the court, such question would not be considered on an application for a rehearing.

4. SAME.

Where, in an action to prevent a sole defendant from diverting the water represented by its purchase during the irrigation season for storage as against plaintiff, plaintiff could not on petition for rehearing of an appeal by defendant contend that the right sought to be determined as between the parties should not be adjudicated without the presence of other parties whose rights might be affected by the adjudication.

Steele, C. J., and Campbell and Caswell, JJ., dissenting.

Appeal from District Court, Boulder County; Christian A. Bennett, Judge.

Action by the New Loveland & Greeley Irrigation & Land Company against the Seven Lakes Reservoir Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

The question presented by this appeal is the right of the owner of a priority for direct irrigation to store the water thereby represented for use later in the season. Appellant is a corporation, organized under the laws of this state for the purpose of acquiring and maintaining reservoirs for the storage of water to supplement the water supply of its stockholders obtained through the Loveland & Greeley ditch to irrigate lands belonging to them under this ditch. Pursuant to this purpose it acquired reservoir sites, and purchased 84 shares of the Loudon Irrigation Canal Company and 50 inches in the Barnes ditch. The priorities belonging to these ditches were awarded for direct irrigation purposes. The water represented by these purchases it did not apply to lands directly, but, during the irrigating season, stored in one or more of its reservoirs for use upon lands later to mature crops, like beets and potatoes, which it is not necessary to irrigate in the early part of the season, but which do require water about August, and later, when the direct supply belonging to its stockholders in the Loveland & Greeley ditch was insufficient for this purpose. The several ditches named derive their respective supply from the same general source. Appellee, the owner of priorities supplied from this same source, brought a suit against appellant, the object of which was to prevent the appellant from diverting the water represented by its purchases during the irrigation season for storage. To the complaint filed the appellant filed a cross-complaint, claiming the right to divert the water represented by its purchases for storage purposes, based substantially upon the grounds above stated. There was no dispute with respect to the dates and amounts of the respective priorities of the parties to the action involved in this appeal; it being the contention on the part of plaintiff that, although the defendant was entitled to divert the water represented by its purchases for the purpose of direct irrigation when needed, and that these priorities for this purpose were superior to any claimed by plaintiff, the defendant could not abandon the use of the rights purchased by it for direct irrigation during the irrigating season, and store the water thereby represented for future use in irrigating crops. The judgment of the court was in favor of the contention of the plaintiff, and the defendant brings the case here for review on appeal.

H. N. Haynes, for appellant. James W. McCreery, for appellee.

GABBERT, J. (after stating the facts as above). The particular question presented by this appeal has not been determined in the concrete by any previous decision of this court; but it is by no means a new one, because it merely involves the application of principles which have been announced in numerous cases. A priority to the use of water is a property right, which is the subject of purchase and sale, and its character and method of use may be changed, provided such change does not injuriously affect the rights of others. Fuller v. Swan River P. M. Co., 12 Colo. 12, 19 Pac. 836; Strickler v. Colo. Springs, 16 Colo. 61, 26 Pac. 313, 25 Am. St. Rep. 245; Cache la Poudre I. Co. v. Larimer & Weld R. Co., 25 Colo. 144, 53 Pac. 318, 71 Am. St. Rep. 123.

Appellant owns certain rights to the use of water, which, prior to its purchase, had been directly applied to the irrigation of lands. Instead of continuing to so use this water, it has ceased its direct application during the period it was theretofore applied, and stores the water which it would have the right to thus apply for use later in the same season. This change is in no manner detrimental to the rights of the appellee. It is not thereby deprived of any water which it would have the right to divert and apply to lands during the irrigating season as against the rights of the appellant. By the change no greater burden is imposed upon the common source of supply of the respective ditches. It must therefore logically follow that the appellant is entitled to divert the water represented by its purchase, and store for use later in irrigating crops, measured by volume and time, which it would have the right to apply directly to lands for purposes of irrigation at the time of such diversion.

The case presented is not one, as seems to have been the view of the trial court, where appellant seeks to convert a junior reservoir right to a senior appropriation for storage, but merely involves the right of appellant to utilize a priority for irrigation by using it at a later period. It appears from the record that the stockholders of appellant, instead of planting crops which require irrigation during the early part of the season, utilize their lands by growing crops which do not require irrigation until about August, when the direct supply through the ditches is not sufficient to furnish the volume of water necessary to irrigate such crops. And so, instead of applying the water to which they are entitled for direct irrigation in the early part of the season, they store this water for use later to mature crops, like beets and potatoes, which do not require irrigation until about the month of August. It would be unfortunate indeed if the law were such that it could not be adapted to changed conditions resulting from the character of crops grown by those engaged in agricultural pursuits. If water for direct irrigation can only be utilized for that purpose, the result would be to retard agricultural progress, and limit the growth of agricultural products to those which can be matured by means of direct irrigation early in the season. If the judgment of the trial court should be sustained upon the theory that one owning a priority for direct irrigation may not cease to utilize it for that purpose upon crops in May, June, and July, and store it for use during the same season thereafter, the result would be to take from the owner of such a priority his rights and confer them upon others growing crops of a different nature. Such a rule would make the right to the use of water dependent upon the character of crops grown instead of upon the right to utilize it in any manner which does not injuriously affect the vested rights of others. In principle the case is no different from that of Strickler v. Colorado Springs, supra, wherein the right to change the use of water from agricultural to domestic purposes was recognized. If the right to change from agricultural to domestic, and from mining to agricultural, uses, and vice versa, is legal, certainly no good reason can be advanced why the change from one agricultural use to another may not be allowed.

The trial court seems in a measure to have been guided in rendering the judgment it did by section 2270, 1 Mills' Ann. St., which provides that persons desiring to divert water for storage may take "from any of the natural streams of the state and store away any unappropriated water not needed for immediate use for domestic or irrigating purposes." We do not think this section is involved, because appellant is not asserting any right to the water in controversy by virtue of any appropriation for reservoir purposes, but is merely seeking to utilize priorities which it is conceded it is entitled to for direct irrigation purposes by storing the volume to which it is thus entitled for use at a later period. We are of the opinion that the appellant is entitled to so utilize these priorities, that is to say, entitled to store, during the direct irrigation season, the quantity of water, measured by volume and time, which it would be entitled to divert during that period for the purpose of direct irrigation.

The judgment of the district court, in so far as it involved the rights of the parties to this appeal to the water represented by the stock purchased by appellant in the Loudon Irrigation Canal Company, and the purchase of water in the Barnes ditch, is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the trial court to enter a judgment in favor of appellant with respect to these matters in accordance with the views expressed in this opinion.

Judgment reversed.

STEELE, C. J., and CAMPBELL and CASWELL, JJ., dissent.

On Petition for Rehearing.

GABBERT, J. The arguments of counsel for appellee, and amici curiae in support of the petition for rehearing of appellee, are evidently based upon an erroneous assumption of what has been determined in this case. It is contended that adjudication decrees are disturbed, and that appellant, by the decree directed, will be awarded an enlarged use of water represented by its purchases, both in quantity and time. It must be borne in mind that this decision is based upon the fact, which is undisputed, that the stockholders of appellant are growing crops which do not, from their nature, require irrigation during the early part of the season, but do later, and that they desire to utilize the water in controversy for this purpose. Based upon these facts we have declared, what has time and again been decided by this court, that the character and method of use of a priority to the use of water may be changed, provided such change does not injuriously affect the rights of others, and that appellant is entitled to divert and store the water represented by the priorities purchased for the use of its stockholders for application to crops later, but in no greater quantity and at no other or different time than could be diverted and applied to land directly to nourish crops requiring irrigation at the time of such diversion; or, otherwise expressed, appellant is permitted to divert and store the water in controversy, but this right is measured and fixed by the limitations which the law would impose upon its use for diversion and application to crops requiring irrigation at the time of such diversion. This does not conflict with any previous decisions of this court; but, on the contrary, is sustained by Colo. M. & E. Co. v. Larimer & Weld I. Co., 28 Colo. 47, 56 Pac. 185. See, also, Mills' Irrigation Manual, § 56. This does not enlarge the use of the priorities of appellant, either in time or quantity; neither does it confer upon it the right to divert and store the water represented by its priorities every day during the irrigation season, or to convert such priorities into a storage right during the nonirrigating season, as contended by counsel, but limits its rights strictly to the diversion of water, both as to volume and time, to the same quantity and the same time we have indicated. Thus it is apparent that no rights are infringed, that no one is deprived of water to which he is entitled by reason of the change in the method of use, and that to supply appellant with the water which it will be entitled to store under the decree directed there cannot possibly be any greater burden imposed upon the common source of supply of the respective ditches owned or controlled by the parties to this appeal. Neither are any priorities disturbed; but, on the contrary, the decree directed leaves the relative rights of the parties to this appeal precisely as they were, whereas, if the judgment of the lower court should be affirmed, the result would be, where an appropriator had no use for water represented by his priorities in the early part of the season because of the fact that he was growing crops of a character which did not require irrigation during that period, and he could not store it at that time for use upon these crops, when later it was necessary to irrigate them, to take from him and give to another.

It is contended by counsel that the decision in this case is contrary to New Loveland & Greeley I. & L. Co. v. Consolidated Home Supply Ditch Co., 27 Colo. 525, 62 Pac. 366, 52 L. R. A. 266, and Fort Lyon Canal Co. v. Chew, 33 Colo. 392, 81 Pac. 37. In the New Loveland Case it was determined that the appropriation of water for the irrigation of lands during the irrigation season gave the appropriator no priority of right to store water during the nonirrigating season for future use. This does not conflict with the opinion in the case at bar. No right to store water during the nonirrigating season is conferred. The gist of the decision in the Chew Case is that the owner of a water right would not be permitted to make it do double duty. When he had applied it for the purpose for which it was appropriated, he could not loan or lease it to another for irrigation purposes; but that is not this case. The stockholders of appellant do not at once apply the water diverted; but appellant is allowed to divert and store for their use the volume of the priorities in question, which it would be entitled to divert for application by its stockholders to land directly, to mature crops requiring water at the time of such diversion, so that but one use of the appropriations in question is made, and that use does not, under the limitations we have specified, result in any greater draft upon the river than if the water had been directly applied to land at the time of diversion.

It is also urged that no decree of the character directed should be entered until all the parties whose rights might be affected thereby are before the court. No question of that character was suggested at the original hearing, and it will not be considered on an application for a rehearing. Besides we do not believe appellee is in a position to urge that question. Appellee instituted the action from which this appeal was prosecuted, making the appellant the only party. The purpose of the action was to prevent the appellant from diverting the water represented by its purchase during the irrigation season for storage as against the appellee, and hence it is not in a position to now contend that the rights which it now seeks to have determined as between the appellant and itself should not be adjudicated without the presence of other parties whose rights might be affected by such adjudication. Counsel amici curiæ also say, quoting from their brief: "Many members of the legal profession, and many irrigators, contend that this decision enables the holder of old decrees for excessive priorities—decrees obtained in the early days, when water rights were not so valuable as now, nor so carefully guarded—to successfully assert that the full amount of water decreed may be now used, notwithstanding that but a portion of it has ever been heretofore used. They maintain that the old priorities, whether used or not, are recognized by this decision to such an extent that the owners of those priorities are, as against even subsequent appropriators who have used the water for years, entitled to now utilize it upon lands described in the decree, or other lands owned by them."

Such a case is not before us; but we can only say that we fail to comprehend wherein the opinion is susceptible of such a construction. It would be impossible, in any one opinion, to determine all the questions which may arise with respect to water rights. Each case of this character must depend upon its own particular facts.

A majority of the court is of opinion that the petition for rehearing should be denied, and it is so ordered.

Rehearing denied.

EDWARD MALLEY CO. v. LONDONER.

(Supreme Court of Colorado. Dec. 2, 1908.

Rehearing Denied Feb. 3, 1908.)

1. CORPORATIONS—FOREIGN CORPORATIONS—SALES—ACTION FOR PRICE—DEFENSES.

In an action to recover for goods furnished defendant's son in 1899, the failure of plaintiff corporation to comply with Laws 1901, pp. 118, 121, c. 52, §§ 4, 10, and Laws 1901, p. 273, c. 94, § 70b, requiring the payment of certain fees, and the filing of certain papers by foreign corporations, was not a good defense, since these statutes were not retroactive.

2. PLEADING—ANSWER—DEMURRER TO PLEADING GOOD IN PART.

In an action by plaintiff corporation for goods furnished defendant's minor son, where defendant's answer, in addition to alleging facts not constituting a good defense, also denied the corporate existence of plaintiff, a demurrer to the answer as a whole was properly overruled, the proper manner of reaching the immaterial allegations being by motion.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 39, Pleading, §§ 436-490.]

3. SAME—DEMURRER.

Though a demurrer to an answer alleging immaterial facts, in addition to denying plaintiff's corporate existence, was properly overruled, it was error to give judgment for defendant on such demurrer, since the issue of plaintiff's incorporation remained to be tried.

4. APPEAL—OBJECTIONS NOT RAISED BELOW—DEFECTIVE COMPLAINT—FAILURE TO STATE CAUSE OF ACTION.

Though the failure of a complaint to state facts constituting a cause of action may be raised after appeal, if it is apparent from the complaint that the defects were passed over when they might have been cured by amendment during trial, the parties will not be permitted to take advantage of them on appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 2, Appeal and Error, §§ 1226-1240.]

5. SAME.

An objection made for the first time on appeal is not favored, though it is one which may be properly raised at any time during the case.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 2, Appeal and Error, §§ 1141-1100.]

6. APPEAL—BILLS OF EXCEPTIONS—NECESSITY.

Under the direct provisions of Mills' Ann. Code, § 387, a bill of exceptions need not be taken to a decision overruling a demurrer to a pleading.

7. COURTS—SUPREME COURT—CASES TRANSFERRED FROM COURT OF APPEALS—AMOUNT INVOLVED.

While an action involving less than $100 may not be appealed to this court, the Court of Appeals, to which a judgment involving any amount could be taken, being in existence when this appeal was taken, and the cases pending therein having been transferred to this court upon their consolidation, it properly has jurisdiction of the present case, though the amount involved is less than $100.

Appeal from District Court, City and County of Denver; Samuel L. Carpenter, Judge.

Action by the Edward Malley Company against Wolfe Londoner. From a judgment in favor of defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Van Clise & Grant, for appellant. Joshua Grozler, for appellee.

BAILEY, J. In November, 1901, the appellant filed its complaint against appellee, wherein it was alleged that the plaintiff was a corporation, organized and doing business under the laws of the state of Connecticut; that defendant was the father of Herman W. Londoner; that while said Herman W. Londoner was attending the Yale University in Connecticut during the year 1899 he purchased from plaintiff wearing apparel and other merchandise necessary to his maintenance of the value of $44.36; "that at the time of the purchase by defendant of plaintiff of the merchandise above referred to he, said defendant, was a minor, and supported by and at the expense of the defendant herein"; and that the indebtedness had not been paid. The answer of the defendant consisted of four alleged defenses, the first being an admission that the defendant was the father of H. W. Londoner, and a denial of all other allegations in the complaint. The second defense was a denial that the plaintiff was a corporation existing under the laws of any state, and further that if it was a corporation it had failed to comply with the provisions of section 4 of an act of the Legislature relating to corporations prescribing certain fees to be paid by corporations, passed by the General Assembly during the year 1901. Laws 1901, p. 118, c. 52. The third defense was that, if the plaintiff was a corporation, which the defendant denied, it had failed to comply with section 10 of said act; and the fourth defense was that, if the plaintiff was a corporation, which the defendant denied, it had failed to comply with section 70b of an act in relation to public revenues and repealing all previous acts in relation thereto. This act was passed in 1901. Laws 1901, p. 273, c. 94. The plaintiff demurred to the second, third, and fourth defenses. Plaintiff elected to stand by its de-murrey, and judgment was rendered against plaintiff for costs. An appeal was taken to the Court of Appeals.

The demurrers were properly overruled. Notwithstanding that, as we shall presently see, the court erred in rendering judgment against the plaintiff, so far as the allegations of the second, third, and fourth defenses, which relate to the failure of the plaintiff to comply with the statutes of 1901, are concerned. They did not constitute a defense to the cause of action set forth in plaintiff's complaint, for the reason that the complaint avers that the goods were purchased in October, November, and December, 1899. The act pleaded by the defendant in relation to corporations was passed April 6, 1901, and the act pleaded by defendant in relation to revenue was passed April 5, 1901. We have already held that these statutes are not retroactive, and do not affect contracts made previous to their adoption. Stone v. Victor Elec. Co., 36 Colo. 370, 85 Pac. 327. If these several defenses alleged nothing further than the allegation that plaintiff had failed to comply with these acts of the Legislature, the demurrer should have been sustained; but each of these several defenses contained a denial of the corporate existence of plaintiff. A denial to a material allegation contained in the complaint cannot be demurred to, and where an answer puts in issue some of the material averments of the complaint, a demurrer thereto as a whole should be overruled. Wellington v. Beck, 30 Colo. 409, 70 Pac. 687. So that, while the affirmative allegation in the several defenses did not constitute a defense to plaintiff's cause of action, that defect should have been reached by motion because of the denial of a material allegation in the complaint, which was included in each of these defenses. The averments of the failure of plaintiff to comply with the provisions of the act of 1901 being insufficient to prevent it from maintaining this action, the overruling of the demurrer to this defense and the election of the plaintiff to stand by its demurrer still left the matter in controversy to be tried upon the allegations of plaintiff's complaint and the denials contained in the answer, so that the court erred in rendering judgment against the plaintiff for costs; but the appellee says that notwithstanding all this plaintiff's demurrer searches the record, and that the complaint is defective because it fails to state that the defendant had refused to supply his minor son with the necessaries which were sold to said son by the plaintiff, and because of the allegations of the complaint hereinbefore set forth that at the time of the purchase by defendant he, the said defendant, was a minor, and supported by and at the expense of the defendant herein, the contention being that the allegation should be that at the time of the purchase the son was a minor. Neither of these objections were raised below, and were raised here for the first time just before the matter was heard upon oral argument. The rule is that, where a complaint fails to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, the matter may be raised at any time even after appeal is taken. The same rule prevails where it is apparent upon the face of the complaint that the court is without jurisdiction, but this rule is subject to some exceptions. If from the nature of the complaint it is apparent that the defects therein might be cured by amendment, the matter should be called to the attention of the court below so that opportunity be given the parties to amend their complaint if they so elect. As was said in the case of Frue v. Houghton, 6 Colo. 318, where the question of jurisdiction of the court was raised for the first time in this court: "It could not have been the intention of the framers of the Code, that, where a case is being tried in a court having jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action, and competent to administer either equitable or legal relief, as the case may warrant, an objection of this nature may be silently reserved and afterwards raised for the first time in the appellate court, whereas, if seasonably made at the hearing, might have saved the labor and expense incident to a new trial." Parties will not be permitted to allow a case to be prosecuted to judgment, and then bring the matter to this court upon appeal, and here call attention for the first time to a failure upon the part of plaintiff to make some necessary averment in the complaint, when, if attention had been called to the matter previous to or during the trial, the complaint could have been amended by the interlineation of a few words. An objection made for the first time in the appellate court is viewed with disfavor, even though it be one which may be raised at any time in such case. Mulock v. Wilson, 19 Colo. 296, 35 Pac. 532.

Appellee contends that the proceedings should be dismissed because of the absence of a bill of exceptions. In cases of this character a bill of exceptions is not necessary. Section 387, Code Civ. Proc. (Mills' Ann. Code). We express no opinion as to whether or not it is necessary to allege in the complaint that the father had refused to supply the necessaries for his son, which it is contended the plaintiff furnished, because it does not appear to be necessary in the determination of the matters herein involved.

It is also contended that the appeal should be dismissed for the reason that the amount involved is less than $100, and this court has no jurisdiction to entertain the matter upon appeal. At the time the appeal was taken the Court of Appeals was in existence, and any judgment might be appealed from to that court irrespective of the amount involved. Upon the consolidation of the two courts all cases which had been appealed to the Court of Appeals were properly transferred to the Supreme Court, and if the Court of Appeals had jurisdiction, then this court will also entertain jurisdiction.

While the judgment of the trial court in overruling the demurrer was proper, for the reasons above stated, it erred in rendering judgment for the defendant, because there were issues still to be tried. The cause will therefore be reversed and remanded, with leave given to the parties to amend their pleadings as they shall be advised.

Reversed and remanded.

GLASS v. LAWLOR, Judge.

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 3, 1908.)
COURTS—APPELLATE JURISDICTION—DISTRICT COURT OF APPEAL.

Code Civ. Proc. § 652, and Pen. Code, § 1174, providing for proving exceptions, being merely incidental to appeals, fall within the provision of Const. art. 6, § 4, providing that existing statutes as to appeals to the Supreme Court shall apply to appeals to the District Court of Appeal so far as consistent with that article, and hence the District Court of Appeal may take cognizance of a proceeding to prove an exception without an order from the Supreme Court transferring the matter to it for decision.

In Bank. Original application to the Supreme Court by Louis Glass for an order transferring to the District Court of Appeal for the First District a proceeding to prove an exception improperly disallowed by the superior court for use on his appeal to the District Court of Appeal from a conviction in the superior court.

BEATTY, C. J. The petitioner having been convicted in the superior court upon a criminal charge, has appealed to the District Court of Appeal for the First District, which, in his case, is the proper court of review on direct appeal. For the purpose of the appeal he desires to prove an exception which he alleges the trial court has wrongfully refused to allow. For this purpose he has filed a petition in said District Court of Appeal, but the justices of that court being doubtful of their authority to grant the relief prayed without an order of this court transferring the matter to them for hearing and decision, he has made application here for such an order.

We do not deem it necessary to make any special order of transfer, as we think the District Court of Appeal has been given authority to act in such matters by the recent amendment to article 6 of the Constitution by which the court was created and its jurisdiction defined. By section 4 of that article it is provided: "All statutes now in force allowing, providing for, or regulating appeals to the Supreme Court shall apply to appeals to the District Courts of Appeal so far as such statutes are not inconsistent with this article and until the Legislature shall otherwise provide."

We are of the opinion that the provisions for proving exceptions (Code Civ. Proc. § 652; Pen. Code, § 1174), and for obtaining certificates of probable cause for appeal (Pen. Code, § 1243), being merely incidental to appeals, fall within the meaning of this clause of the Constitution, and that petitions under these sections, and all others relating to the mode of presenting appeals or stay of proceedings pending appeal, are properly cognizable in the "District Court of Appeal having jurisdiction under the Constitution of the particular cause by direct appeal from the trial court."

The petition is returned to the District Court of Appeal for such action as is proper in the premises.

CITY OF SOUTH PASADENA v. PASADENA LAND & WATER CO.
(L. A. 1,793.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 2, 1908.)

1. WATERS AND WATER COURSES — WATER COMPANIES—FRANCHISES AND PROPERTY—TRANSFERS.

A quasi public corporation, engaged in supplying water for public use, cannot, without legislative sanction, transfer to another the entire property devoted to such service and the business of carrying it on.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 48, Waters and Water Courses, § 287.]

2. CORPORATIONS — TRANSFER OF PROPERTY — LEGISLATIVE AUTHORITY.

In the absence of legislative restrictions, an ordinary commercial corporation, not doing a public service business, can alienate its entire property whenever it is necessary or proper to do so for the best interests of its stockholders and creditors.

3. WATERS AND WATER COURSES — WATER COMPANIES—TRANSFER OF PROPERTY AND FRANCHISE—STATUTES.

Civ. Code, § 361a, providing that no transfer of the business, franchise, and property, as a whole, of any corporation, shall be valid without the consent of two-thirds of the stockholders thereof, etc., embodied in the part of the Code devoted to provisions concerning corporations, expresses a consent to a transfer in the manner prescribed, prohibits a transfer in any other mode, deprives ordinary business corporations of the power previously possessed of alienating its entire property, and confers on quasi public corporations authority to transfer their entire property, franchises, and business as a whole, and a public service corporation engaged in supplying water for public use may transfer its property, franchise, and business as a whole.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 48, Waters and Water Courses, § 287.]

4. SAME—FRANCHISES.

The right of a quasi public corporation, engaged in supplying water for public use, resulting from its laying and using water pipes in the streets of a city, as authorized by Const. art. 11, § 19, is a species of real property, properly designated as a franchise, and is transferable, under Civ. Code, § 361a, relating to the transfer of the business, franchise, and property of a corporation.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 48, Waters and Water Courses, § 287.]

5. SAME.

A transfer by a quasi public corporation engaged in supplying water for public use of its business, franchise, and property as a whole, as authorized by Civ. Code, § 361a, does not relieve the franchise or any property held under it or for its operation from any liability, and the transfer is not prohibited by Const. art. 12, § 10, providing that the Legislature shall not pass laws permitting the alienation of any franchise, so as to release the franchise or property held thereunder from the liabilities of the grantor.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 48, Waters and Water Courses, § 287.]

6. MANDAMUS — WATER COMPANIES — PERFORMANCE OF OBLIGATIONS.

Persons to whose use water is appropriated or dedicated by a quasi public corporation engaged in supplying water for public use, whether the water is supplied for use on land for irrigation, or for personal use, to all persons within a specified territory, are vested, under Const. art. 14, § 1, and Civ. Code, §§ 549-552, relating to the use of water appropriated for sale or distribution, etc., with a right to have the supply continued by whosoever may be in control of the corporation, which right is enforceable by mandamus.

7. CORPORATIONS—TRANSFERS OF PROPERTY.

A transfer of property used in public service from one corporation to another is invalid unless the transferee has power to accept the property and continue the use to which it has been devoted.

8. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — ACQUISITION OF WATER SYSTEM—STATUTES.

Under St. 1891, p. 102, c. 96, authorizing any city to acquire water rights, etc., for supplying its inhabitants with water, and under the charter of the city of Pasadena [St. 1901, pp. 888-890, c. 11, and St. 1905, pp. 1019, 1021, c. 19] authorizing the city to maintain waterworks for supplying its inhabitants with water, and to purchase property both within and without its limits, etc., the city has authority to acquire and carry on a water system outside the city, so far as it may be necessary or convenient to accomplish the main purpose of furnishing water to it and its inhabitants.

9. SAME.

A mere grant of power to a city to provide and supply water to its inhabitants gives power to acquire for that purpose water supplies without the city.

10. SAME — POWERS INCIDENT TO THOSE GRANTED.

The powers of a municipal corporation include not only those expressly named in the grant of powers, but also the authority to do such acts as are incidental and necessary to the exercise of the powers specifically granted.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 36, Municipal Corporations, § 149.]

11. EVIDENCE—JUDICIAL NOTICE.

The court will take judicial notice that designated cities are situated in an arid region where there is little, if any, water not already applied to some valuable public or private use, and that the water sources in that vicinity are in great demand.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 20, Evidence, §§ 9, 10.]

12. WATERS — PUBLIC WATER SUPPLY — ACQUISITION OF WATERWORKS SYSTEM.

A city acquiring the property, franchise, and business of a quasi public corporation engaged in supplying water to a municipality subject to the power of the municipality to fix the rates for water supplied, and to control the manner of laying pipes in its streets, acts in a proprietary capacity in carrying on the obligations of the quasi public corporation to supply water to the municipality, and the powers of the city and the municipality are separate and distinct, and the city is under the obligation and possesses the rights of the quasi public corporation.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 48, Waters and Water Courses, § 278.]

13. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — POWERS — "MUNICIPAL AFFAIR."

The supplying of water by a city to outside territory, when incidental to the main purpose of supplying water to its own inhabitants is a "municipal affair" of the city, within Const. art. 11, § 6, providing that the charters of cities "except in municipal affairs" shall be controlled by general laws, and the charter of the city prevails over the general legislation embodied in Act March 27, 1897, St. 1897, p. 182, c. 121, authorizing a city, having in its supply more water than is necessary for its inhabitants, to sell the surplus, etc.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 5, p. 4619; vol. 8, p. 7726.]

14. SAME.

Where a quasi public corporation engaged in supplying water to the inhabitants of a municipality transfers its property, franchise, and business to a city, empowered to acquire a waterworks system, the city acquires the property, franchise, and business of the corporation, subject to the obligation to furnish water to the inhabitants of the municipality, which obligation it must perform.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 48, Waters and Water Courses, § 278.]

15. WATERS—PUBLIC WATER SUPPLY—RIGHTS IN STREETS—"CORPORATION DULY INCORPORATED."

Where a city, pursuant to its authority to acquire a waterworks system to supply water to its inhabitants, purchases the property, franchise, and business of a corporation engaged in supplying water to the inhabitants of a municipality, and the city possesses as an incident to its power to supply water to its inhabitants power to furnish water to others, the city is a "corporation duly incorporated" within Const. art. 11, § 19, providing that in any city, where there are no municipal waterworks, any "corporation duly incorporated for such purpose" may lay mains in the streets for supplying water.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 48, Waters and Water Courses, § 279.]

16. EQUITY—ADEQUACY OF LEGAL REMEDY.

Where the remedy by mandamus is adequate, a suit in equity cannot be maintained.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 19, Equity, §§ 151, 152.]

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; D. K. Trask, Judge.

Action by the city of South Pasadena against the Pasadena Land & Water Company. From a judgment for defendant rendered after sustaining a general demurrer to the complaint, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

John E. Carson and Lynn Helm, for appellant. Anderson & Anderson, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The defendant is a corporation engaged in supplying water to certain parts of the cities of Pasadena and South Pasadena, respectively, for the use of the respective inhabitants thereof within said territories, and to the said cities, respectively, for sprinkling of streets. The territory thus supplied within South Pasadena embraces from one-half to two-thirds of its area. This suit is to enjoin the defendant from selling and transferring to the city of Pasadena its water, water rights, water plant or system, and all franchises and property of any and every description heretofore used by the defendant in so supplying said water to the plaintiff and its inhabitants, as aforesaid. It appears that the defendant is about to make such transfer, so far as it has the lawful power to do so. A general demurrer to the complaint was sustained, and thereupon judgment was given for the defendant, from which the plaintiff appeals. The record further shows that an answer was filed with the demurrer, that plaintiff demurred to the answer and moved to strike out certain parts thereof, and that this demurrer was overruled, and the motion denied. As we have concluded that the demurrer to the complaint was properly sustained, the other orders are immaterial to the disposition of the appeal.

It is proper to say here that two other cases, namely, Graham v. Pasadena Land & Water Company (L. A. No. 1,957) 93 Pac. 498, and Orcutt et al. v. Pasadena Land & Water Company and the City of Pasadena (L. A. No. 1,958) 93 Pac. 497, the latter begun by residents of South Pasadena, entitled to water from the defendant water company, and the former by a stockholder of the defendant herein, to obtain similar relief were submitted with this case, and that, as requested by counsel, the briefs in those cases have been considered in this case, so far as applicable.

The appellant presents for our determination four questions: First. Has the Pasadena Land & Water Company, while it continues to exist as a going corporation and without the assent of the state, power or authority to transfer its entire property, privileges, and franchises, and thereby discharge itself of the duty and deprive itself of the ability to continue the public service of supplying water to the plaintiff and its people? Second. Has the state consented to such transfer? Third. Has the city of Pasadena, to which the transfer is to be made, power to accept said property, privileges, and franchises and to perform the duties to the plaintiff and its people hitherto imposed upon and performed by the Pasadena Land & Water Company, and which constitute a charge upon the property to be transferred? Fourth. If such power is possessed by the respective corporations, as aforesaid, can the subsequent performance of such duties by the city of Pasadena be enforced by the city of South Pasadena and its inhabitants entitled to the water, or only by the grantor, the Pasadena Land & Water Company? The first, second, and fourth of these propositions will be considered together.

1. The respondent is a quasi public corporation, engaged in supplying water for public use. This is admitted, and it is also conceded that corporations of that character cannot, without legislative sanction, transfer to another the entire property devoted to such service and the business of carrying it on. This appears to be settled by the authorities. Visalla Gas, etc., Co. v. Sims, 104 Cal. 328, 37 Pac. 1042, 43 Am. St. Rep. 105; Thomas v. Railroad Co., 101 U. S. 82, 25 L. Ed. 950; Central T. Co. v. Pullman P. P. Co., 139 U. S. 48, 11 Sup. Ct. 478, 35 L. Ed. 55; Oregon Ry. Co. v. Oregonian Ry. Co., 130 U. S. 1, 9 Sup. Ct. 409, 32 L. Ed. 837; York, etc., Ry. Co. v. Winans, 17 How. (U. S.) 30, 15 L. Ed. 27; Green Bay, etc., Co. v. Union S. B. Co., 107 U. S. 98, 2 Sup. Ct. 221, 27 L. Ed. 413; Cumberland T. & T. Co. v. Evansville (C. C.) 127 Fed. 187; Morawetz on Cor. §§ 565, 1114, 1115, 1129; 1 Clark & Marshall on Cor. § 162. In 1903 the Legislature enacted section 361a of the Civil Code, which reads as follows: "No sale, lease, assignment, transfer, or conveyance, of the business, franchises and property, as a whole, of any corporation now existing, or hereafter to be formed in this state, shall be valid without the consent of the stockholders thereof, holding of record at least two-thirds of the issued capital stock of such corporation; such consent to be either expressed in writing executed and acknowledged by such stockholders, and attached to such sale, lease, assignment, transfer, or conveyance, or by a vote at a stockholders' meeting of such corporation, called for that purpose; but with such assent, so expressed, such sale, lease, assignment, transfer, or conveyance shall be valid; provided however, that nothing herein contained shall be construed to limit the power of the directors of such corporation to make sales, leases, assignments, transfers, or conveyances of corporate property other than those hereinabove set forth." This enactment is not, on its face, a mere negative or prohibitive statute, forbidding that which before was permitted. It is both affirmative and negative in its terms. Its affirmative provisions may be paraphrased thus: "With the consent of the stockholders thereof, holding of record at least two-thirds of its issued capital stock (expressed in the prescribed manner), any corporation in this state may make a valid sale, lease, assignment, transfer or conveyance of its business, franchises and property, as a whole." It expresses a consent to such transfer in the manner prescribed, as well as a prohibition against such transfer in any other mode.

In the absence of legislative restrictions, it is the law in this state that an ordinary commercial corporation, not doing a public service business, can alienate its entire property whenever it is necessary or proper to do so for the best interests of its stockholders and creditors. Miner's Ditch Co. v. Zellerbach, 37 Cal. 588-592, 99 Am. Dec. 300. And it would seem that the stockholders and creditors, alone, would have the right to object to such a transfer by a corporation of that character (Oakland R. R. v. Oakland, etc., R. R. Co., 45 Cal. 379, 13 Am. Rep. 181; Illinois Bank v. Pacific Railway Co., 117 Cal. 332, 49 Pac.

197), though we presume the state could maintain an action to forfeit the corporate franchise for nonuser or misuser. In the case first cited, the Miner's Ditch Company, which had transferred its entire property, was, in fact, a water company selling water upon the market to miners for their use. But this was before the Constitution of 1879 had declared the use of water for sale, rental, or distribution, to be a public use. The opinion distinctly declares it to be a matter of private concern only, and the decision is expressly based on that fact, distinguishing that class of corporations from quasi public corporations. The effect of this statute is, therefore, twofold. It deprives ordinary private business corporations of the power they previously possessed to dispose of their entire property, franchises, and business, as a whole, at the will of a mere majority of the stockholders, or of less than two-thirds of them, and it confers upon quasi public corporations the power to make such dispositions with the consent of two-thirds of the stockholders expressed in the mode fixed, a power which such corporations did not have before. The words of the section expressly apply to "any corporation" then existing or thereafter to be formed. It constitutes a part of the Code devoted to general provisions concerning all corporations, except those of a public nature, such as cities, counties, school districts, and the like. There is nothing in the context of the Code which requires, or would justify, an interpretation limiting its meaning so as to exclude quasi public corporations. The words are express—positive—not at all ambiguous in this particular, and the intent is clear. There is no occasion for resorting to implication to give them an effect not expressly declared, nor for applying the rules restricting the meaning of ambiguous statutes affecting public interests. It is suggested that, if taken literally, it would give power to transfer the corporate franchise, the right to be a corporation and do business in that capacity. We do not perceive that this is important in this case, even if it were true, for it is not alleged that the defendant is attempting to transfer any franchise of that character. The Legislature doubtless had in mind the fact that there are many quasi public corporations doing business in the state, and possessing rights and privileges, properly termed "franchises," which they had acquired and possessed after they became incorporated, and which they had devoted to the public service in which they were engaged, and which, therefore, could not be disposed of without legislative assent, and the word "franchise" was aptly used to describe this class of property and leave no doubt as to what was intended. The transfer of all its property would not work a dissolution of the corporation, nor operate as a transfer of the corporate franchise. Miner's Ditch Co. v. Zellerbach, supra, page 590 of 37 Cal. (99 Am. Dec. 300).

The defendant company had laid its water pipes in the streets of the cities of Pasadena and South Pasadena, was using those streets as a way through which to transmit water to the users, and had the right to make this use of the streets under the provisions of article 11, § 19, of the Constitution. This right, when made available by actual possession and use, is a species of real property, appropriately designated as a franchise. Stockton, etc., Co. v. San Joaquin Co., 148 Cal. 313, 83 Pac. 54, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 174. The appellant argues that this right, or franchise, is not in its nature, transmissible, or alienable, unless the precise mode of transfer is fixed by statute, and a means provided for the enforcement of the use against the transferee, and that section 361a is inadequate in these respects. In this connection counsel cite section 10 of article 12 of the Constitution, which is as follows: "The Legislature shall not pass any laws permitting the leasing or alienation of any franchise, so as to release the franchise or property held thereunder from the liabilities of the lessor or grantor, lessee or grantee, contracted or incurred in the operation, use or enjoyment of such franchise, or any of its privileges."

It is urged that the effect of a transfer, such as that here proposed, would relieve the defendant corporation of its duty to continue the service of supplying water, which is imposed upon it by reason of its control of the water and its enjoyment of the constitutional franchise to use the streets for its pipe lines, and that there would be no corresponding transfer of the duty to the transferee of the property, the city of Pasadena, nor any means of enforcing from said city the performance of that duty. The section does not forbid the transfer of a franchise so as to relieve the previous owner thereof, or the grantee or lessee, personally, from liability incurred in the operation of the franchise, if such a thing were possible. It merely forbids the transfer of a franchise "so as to relieve the franchise, or property held thereunder," from liabilities so incurred or contracted. The Code section (361a) authorizes a transfer of such franchise, or of all the interest the possessor may have in it, but it does not purport to relieve the franchise itself, or any property held under it or for its operation, from any liability or charge imposed, or to be imposed, upon it. If the proposed transfer provided that the property and franchise should be free from any such liability existing against it, or thereafter to arise from its possession and use, or attempted to transfer it so as to free it therefrom in the hands of the transferee, the transaction would be, to that extent, void, and the transferee would take the franchise and property pertaining to it subject to all the burdens of this nature, and, so long as it held it, would be obliged to continue the performance of the public service to which the property and franchise had been dedicated, or to allow others to do so in its behalf. Fellows v. Los Angeles (Cal.

Sup.) 90 Pac. 141. This is the purpose and effect of the constitutional provision above given. The transfer will have the effect of divesting the defendant company of the property, and as, according to the admitted allegations, there is no other water supply available, it will then have neither the means nor the ability to continue the performance of the public duty of supplying water for public use. It could not directly abnegate this personal duty without the consent of the proper public authority, and, of course, it could not do it indirectly by the device of transferring to another the only means whereby the duty could be performed. The effect of the statute (section 361a) is to give this consent, in pursuance whereof the public agent in charge of the use and property will be changed, and the effect of the constitutional provision is that the new agent must continue to devote the property to the same use as before. There does not appear to be anything unlawful, unconstitutional, or improper in a change so made.

The contention that no remedy exists to compel performance by the successor in interest, is without force. In case of the establishment of a water system of this character, all the persons to whose use the water is appropriated or dedicated are vested with a right to have the supply continued by whomsoever may be in control thereof. Const., art. 14, § 1; Civ. Code, §§ 549-552; Crow v. San Joaquin, etc., Co., 130 Cal. 309, 62 Pac. 562, 1058; McCrary v. Beaudry, 67 Cal. 120, 7 Pac. 264; Price v. Riverside, etc., Co., 56 Cal. 432. If the water is supplied for use upon land for its benefit, as for irrigation, the right to receive and use it becomes in the nature of an appurtenance to the land. If it is supplied for personal use to all persons within a certain territory or to all of a certain class within the territory, the right to its use is personal to the inhabitants of the territory, or to the members of the class, as the case may be, so long as they remain such. In either case the right may be enforced against the person in control of the supply and the works by which it is distributed, regardless of the title, by means of an action in mandamus to compel the continuance of the distribution, in the usual and proper manner, to those entitled. Price v. Riverside, etc., Co., page 434 of 56 Cal.; Merrill v. South Side Irr. Co., 112 Cal. 426, 44 Pac. 720; Fellows v. Los Angeles, supra.

Our conclusion is that all of the objections to the validity of section 361a, and all of the reasons advanced for giving it a meaning different from its literal import, are untenable, and that it gives authority to the defendant to make the transfer of its business, franchises, and property, as a whole, in the manner prescribed and as here proposed. It is admitted that the statutory manner of making the transfer has been and will be followed.

2. It is settled law that a transfer of property used in a public service, from one corporation to another, although made by a corporation having power to convey, is invalid unless the transferee has the power to accept the property, and continue the use to which it has been devoted. If such power is wanting in the transferee, the transfer is not binding on the grantor or lessor. Central Transportation Co. v. Pullman P. P. Co., supra; Thomas v. Railroad Co., supra; Oregon Ry. Co. v. Oregonian Ry. Co., supra; Pennsylvania R. R. Co. v. St. Louis R. R. Co., 118 U. S. 307, 6 Sup. Ct. 1094, 30 L. Ed. 83. For the purposes of the case we may concede that the plaintiff, or any private party, has sufficient interest to raise this question.

We are of the opinion that the city of Pasadena has the power to accept the transfer in question, and to undertake and perform the public service of supplying the water to the cities of Pasadena and South Pasadena and the respective inhabitants thereof, as it has been heretofore supplied, which is the duty attached to the property and imposed upon the possessor thereof. The statute of 1891 on this subject is broad and comprehensive. It is as follows: "Any incorporated city in this state may acquire by gift, purchase, or condemnation proceeding under the power of eminent domain, water, water rights, reservoir sites, rights of way for pipes, aqueducts, flumes, or other conduits, and all other property and appliances suitable and proper for supplying such city and its inhabitants with water." St. 1891, p. 102, c. 96. The special charter of the city of Pasadena gives the city power, "to construct and maintain water works, pipes, pipe lines, aqueducts and hydrants for supplying the city and its inhabitants with water, and the right to supply water to persons who live without the city limits." Subdivision 8, § 3, art. 1, St. 1905, p. 1021, c. 19. It further provides for a board of water commissioners of five members, which board is given "control and management of all water and waterworks that now belong, or may hereafter be acquired by the city," and for a "water fund" which may be applied to the "purchase of necessary lands, water rights, and other property" for the improvement of the water system. Subdivision 2, § 6, art. 6½, St. 1905, p. 1019. Subdivision 4 of section 3, art. 1, gives the city power "to purchase, receive, have, take, hold, lease, use and enjoy property of every kind and description, both within and without the limits of said city and control and dispose of the same for the common benefit." By subdivision 16 of the same section power is given to create a bonded debt, equal to 15 per cent. of the assessed value of the property, to pay the cost of public utilities, and under subdivision 23 it may exercise the right of eminent domain to acquire "water, water rights and waterworks, within or without the corporate limits, necessary or convenient for the use of said city and its inhabitants." St. 1901, pp. 888-890, c. 11.

These provisions are ample to confer power to acquire and carry on a water system outside the city, so far as it may be necessary or convenient to do so in order to accomplish the main purpose of furnishing water to the city and its inhabitants. Indeed, it is so seldom that a water supply can be obtained within the limits of a city, especially in this state, that a mere grant of power to provide and supply water to the city and its inhabitants would be construed to give power to acquire for that purpose water supplies without the city. The powers of a municipal corporation include not only those expressly named in the grant, but also "the authority to do such subsidiary acts as are incidental and necessary to the exercise of" the powers specifically described. Von Schmidt v. Widber, 105 Cal. 157, 38 Pac. 682. Or, as stated by Mr. Dillon, they include "those necessarily or fairly implied in or incident to the powers expressly granted." 1 Dill. Mun. Cor. (4th Ed.) § 89; Hammond v. San Leandro, 135 Cal. 452, 67 Pac. 692. Under powers much less comprehensive in terms it has been held that a municipal or public corporation may carry on a system and supply water to persons outside its limits, whenever it becomes necessary or convenient to do so in order to accomplish the main purpose of supplying waters to those within. In Fellows v. Los Angeles, supra, in considering a provision merely giving that city power to acquire water and water rights within or without the city for the use of its inhabitants, it is said: "In the exercise of this power, it would have the right to buy from any corporation or person, engaged in supplying water for public use outside the city, any surplus water which such person might possess. If it were necessary, in order to obtain such surplus, the city might, under this power, purchase the entire water supply of such person or corporation and the water plant or system used in connection with it, so that, after operating the system and supplying the persons entitled to use the water, it could devote the surplus to the use of the inhabitants of the city." In Hewitt v. San Jacinto Irr. Dist., 124 Cal. 192, 56 Pac. 893, it was held that an irrigation district, under its general power to acquire and hold such water, water rights, and other property as should be necessary to supply water to irrigate the lands within the district, had power to purchase and hold water already in part used on lands outside the district, to take it subject to such use, and to continue to furnish the water to such outside lands as it had been furnished before. These authorities would seem sufficient to settle the question in favor of the respondent. The ingenuity of counsel for appellant has, however, suggested many objections to the rule stated and difficulties which he fears may arise in its application, and, in view of the importance of the question, we deem it proper to discuss them at more length.

In considering what powers are necessary, incidental, or fairly to be implied from the powers expressly given to the city of Pasadena by the foregoing provisions, it is proper to look to the conditions surrounding the city at the time. The court will take judicial notice that the two cities interested are situated in a comparatively arid region where there is little, if any, water not already applied to some extremely valuable public or private use, and that water sources in that vicinity are in great demand, and command a high price where they can be purchased at all. It appears from the complaint that for many years the defendant company has been supplying water to portions of the two cities, precisely as it does now, the area supplied in South Pasadena being about two-thirds of its territory, that more than 300 families are now supplied therein from this source, and that if they are now deprived thereof there is no other known source from which it can be replaced, and they would be without water for any purpose. It may well be assumed that Pasadena could obtain no sufficient quantity of water for a municipal water system, except by buying or condemning that portion of the water of the defendant company now distributed to its inhabitants, or some other supply already devoted to use outside the city. It would be bad public policy under these conditions, to require a city, desiring to obtain water for its inhabitants, to take water in use by others for similar purposes outside its limits, where the effect would be to devastate and depopulate such outside territory. To condemn the individual right of each member of the outside community would be impracticable, and even if it could legally be done it would probably prove too costly for the resources of the city. To separate the supply, and endeavor to control, manage, and, if necessary, develop and increase the supply from time to time, in concert or partnership with some other corporation, would probably cause many complications, and render the successful administration of the municipal system much more difficult and doubtful. In order to accomplish the purpose for which these powers were given it is reasonably certain that it would be advisable, and it might be necessary, for the city to take over a supply already partly in use outside, and continue the service to the outside territory, while supplying the remainder to the use of its own people. These probabilities, and the conditions we have stated, must have been well known to the framers of the charter, to the people of Pasadena, and to the Legislature, when the charter was prepared, adopted and ratified. In view of all the circumstances, we may reasonably believe that the clause adopted in 1905, giving the "right to supply water to persons who live without the city limits," was intended to authorize a plan such as that here under consideration. If not designed to authorize some similar plan it might as well never have been enacted at all.

Under the Constitution South Pasadena has power to fix the rates to be charged for water supplied to its inhabitants, and to control the manner of laying and repairing pipes in its streets for that purpose. Necessarily, it has this power as against another city engaged in supplying such water, as well as when an individual or water corporation does so. It is suggested that the two cities each represent the sovereign power, and would have equal authority in all municipal affairs, that a conflict would ensue, and that such consequences cannot be considered as intended, unless the intention is expressly and unmistakably declared. In this connection the rule is invoked that there cannot be two municipalities exercising the same powers at the same time within the same territory. But the two cities would not be of equal authority with respect to the use of water in South Pasadena in such a case. South Pasadena would have the power above stated, under the Constitution, and Pasadena, so far as that service is concerned, would be subject to those powers to the same extent as the Pasadena Land & Water Company is now subject thereto. In the carrying on of the water service to the people of South Pasadena the city of Pasadena will not be acting in its political, public, or governmental capacity as an agent of the sovereign power equal in all respects to the city within which it operates. In administering a public utility, such as a water system, even within its own limits, a city does not act in its governmental capacity, but in a proprietary and only quasi public capacity. Davoust v. Alameda, 149 Cal. 70, 84 Pac. 700, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 536; Illinois, etc., Bank v. Arkansas City, 76 Fed. 271, 22 C. C. A. 171, 34 L. R. A. 518; Esberg Cigar Co. v. Portland, 34 Or. 282, 55 Pac. 961, 43 L. R. A. 435, 75 Am. St. Rep. 651. Having taken over the whole system subject to the burden of supplying a part of the water to inhabitants of South Pasadena, the city of Pasadena will have no greater rights or powers, respecting that part of the service, than its grantor previously had. It will be under the same obligation as its grantor to continue the service and supply the water to all persons who may become entitled to it in the future, so long as it retains possession and control of the property so charged. Fellows v. Los Angeles, supra. The powers of the two cities in regard to this water service will be separate and distinct, one will be subordinate to the other, and, hence, there will not be two cities exercising the same powers in the same territory at the same time. South Pasadena, within its own limits, will be the sole representative of sovereignty in the fixing of rates, and in the supervision of the streets, and Pasadena will be subject thereto, as a private person. If, by fixing too low rates, South Pasadena should attempt to compel the service to be made at a loss, Pasadena would have the same remedies, and no greater, in the courts, than a quasi public corporation or natural person would have in the same circumstances. The fact that the outside service is within another city does not appear to be a significant factor in the question of the power. If it were in a rural community, the rates charged would be subject to judicial control to make them reasonable. Being in another city, the serving city has a right to demand reasonable rates, and may enforce them if not granted. The limitations would not affect the power in one case more than in the other.

The act of March 27, 1897 (St. 1897, p. 182, c. 121), authorizes a city having in its supply more water than is necessary for its inhabitants, to sell the surplus, but provides that contracts for such sales shall not run for a period longer than one year. It is contended that the service of water to outside communities is not a "municipal affair," within the meaning of that phrase in section 6, art. 11, of the Constitution, that it is therefore subject to general laws, and that, under the above-mentioned statute, the city cannot undertake, as it proposes to do, to render a perpetual water service to the inhabitants of outside territory, which, it is claimed, will be equivalent to a contract to sell to them its surplus water for a period longer than one year. There are two answers to this contention. The supplying of water to outside territory, being necessarily a matter incidental to the main purpose of supplying water to its own inhabitants, is as much a municipal affair of Pasadena as is the main purpose, which is conceded to be such, and therefore the charter provisions relating thereto prevail over general laws, if inconsistent therewith. In truth, however, the city will not be selling its surplus in the sense intended by the statute. The right to the use of the required quantity of this water is now vested in the city of South Pasadena and its inhabitants within the portion of its territory where it is to be served and the city of Pasadena does not propose to take away this right. It is about to buy only the right of the Pasadena Land & Water Company to the water, which did not include the use. It will be obliged to put it to the same use as fully as that company is now compelled to do so. Water which is in this manner dedicated to the use of an outside community, cannot be at the same time surplus water subject to sale to others. The sale is already, in effect, accomplished. The city of Pasadena, with respect to this part of the water, will hold title as a mere trustee, bound to apply it to the use of those beneficially interested.

Section 19, art. 11, of the Constitution, provides that, in any city where there are no municipal waterworks for the supply of its inhabitants, "any individual, or any corporation duly incorporated for such purpose," may lay mains in the streets for supplying such water. This grant clearly does not, in terms, extend to a municipal corporation. It is contended that it, in effect, forbids the exercise of such privilege by another city. The provision is intended to further the interest of the public and facilitate the supply of water to the inhabitants of the city, and it should be liberally construed to effect that purpose. When the state gives such power to a city that, as an incident to supplying water to its own people, it may furnish water to the inhabitants of another city to whose use a part of the water is dedicated, the city having such incidental powers should be considered as a "corporation duly incorporated for such purpose." A city is duly incorporated for all purposes to which its powers extend. There is nothing incongruous, or particularly unusual in such an arrangement. In other states similar powers have been upheld. Mayo v. Dover, etc., Co., 96 Me. 539, 53 Atl. 62; Cooper v. Brooklyn, 11 App. Div. 71, 42 N. Y. Supp. 762; Hartford v. Hartford W. Co., 68 Conn. 323, 36 Atl. 786; People v. Briggs, 50 N. Y. 553; Pittsburgh v. Brace, 158 Pa. 174, 27 Atl. 854.

It is alleged that the city of Pasadena threatens and intends, when it has acquired the water system of the defendant corporation, to cut off the supply of water to South Pasadena and its inhabitants, that it is acquiring the water for its own inhabitants, whose needs will be so great that the entire water supply will be required therefor, that, in order to carry out its purpose, it will be compelled to refuse to continue supplying water to outside persons, and that it will deprive the plaintiff and its inhabitants of water unless the proposed sale is enjoined. It sufficiently appears from what has been said that, if the other allegations of the complaint are true, this could not be lawfully be done. We have shown that if it is attempted the persons injured will have a remedy by a suit in mandamus. There will therefore be an adequate remedy at law, and a suit in equity to enjoin the threatened transfer cannot be maintained.

The court below properly held that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

The judgment is affirmed.

ORCUTT et al. v. PASADENA LAND & WATER CO. et al. (L. A. 1,958.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 2, 1908.)

1. WATERS AND WATER COURSES—INJUNCTION—RIGHT TO WATER SUPPLY.

A city which acquires the water system of a quasi public corporation, engaged in supplying water for public use, does so as a corporation engaged in supplying a public use, and on its refusal to furnish water to those entitled thereto the remedy is by mandamus and not by injunction.

2. SAME — INJUNCTION — GROUNDS — PROBABILITY OF INJURY.

Where the general allegations in a complaint that a city acquiring the water system of a public water supply company intends to divert the whole water supply to the use of its own inhabitants, are mere conclusions, based on the theory that the city has no power to continue serving persons outside of its limits, and that it has the right to change the use to which the water had been appropriated without the consent of the persons beneficially interested, and are insufficient to authorize an injunction on the ground that the rights of persons entitled to water are in danger of injury.

3. WATERS AND WATER COURSES—MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — ACQUISITION OF WATER SUPPLY—PERSONS ENTITLED TO QUESTION AUTHORITY.

Where the law and charter of a city giving it power to acquire the water system of a quasi public corporation, engaged in supplying water for public use, do not require that the purchase, when made, shall be approved by the voters of the city, it is immaterial so far as the purchase is concerned whether the voters on being asked to vote for the issuance of bonds to buy the system were informed that the system was burdened with the duty of supplying water to individuals, and collateral inquiry on behalf of persons not taxpayers or residents of the city into the validity of the purchase cannot be made on that ground nor on the ground that the bonds issued are invalid.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Monroe, Judge.

Action by O. W. Orcutt and others against the Pasadena Land & Water Company and another. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Lynn Helm and John E. Carson, for appellants. Anderson & Anderson, Porter, Sutton & Cruickshank, John C. Fitz Gerald, Fitz Gerald & Barry, J. P. Wood, City Atty., and Works, Lee & Works, for respondents.

SHAW, J. The transaction attacked in this case is the same that was considered in South Pasadena v. Pasadena Land & Water Company (L. A. 1,793) 93 Pac. 490. We refer to that case for a more detailed statement of the facts, which, with the exceptions to be mentioned, are substantially the same as the facts involved here. A general demurrer to the amended complaint was sustained, without leave to amend further, and from the judgment thereon given the plaintiffs appeal.

The plaintiffs are residents of the portion of South Pasadena supplied with water by the defendant company, and owners of land therein, and it is alleged that a certain share of said water is appurtenant to the respective tracts of land for irrigation and domestic use thereon. They sue on behalf of themselves and of others having similar rights. The fact that the right to receive the water is appurtenant to the land and is a private right of property, and not a mere right as one of a class entitled to share in a public use, does not in any way materially distinguish the case from South Pasadena v. Pasadena Land & Water Company, supra. If the city of Pasadena should acquire the water system of the defendant water company, it would do so as a corporation engaged in supplying a public use, and the right to mandamus, if it should refuse to furnish water to those who were entitled thereto, would be as clear in such a case as if the water right was not a private right or an appurtenance to real estate, but was a right to share in a public service of water, such as that considered in the former case. There would therefore be an adequate remedy at law, and the right to an injunction was properly denied. Furthermore, it does not clearly appear that the rights of the plaintiffs are in any immediate danger of injury. There are general allegations that the city of Pasadena threatens and intends to divert the whole water supply to the use of its own inhabitants, if it should require the same, and will, in that event, deprive the plaintiffs of any share thereof. But the context shows that these are obviously mere conclusions, based on the theory that that city has no power to continue serving persons outside of its limits, and that it would have the right to change the use to which the water had been appropriated without the consent of the persons beneficially interested. It is not claimed that the city is about to do this, but that it will do so in the future, if the necessities of its own inhabitants demand it. It is not to be presumed that this will be done, in the face of a decision of this court declaring that it would be unlawful. Anything short of a reasonable probability of injury is insufficient to warrant the issuance of an injunction against the act which it is claimed will cause such injury. Lorenz v. Waldron, 96 Cal. 249, 31 Pac. 54. The appellants do not argue this point, and have apparently abandoned it. We think it is without merit.

The complaint alleges that the city of Pasadena has declared that the cost of the water system it proposes to buy is too great to be paid out of the ordinary revenues of the city, and that, in pursuance of proceedings in that behalf, its citizens have voted bonds whereon to raise sufficient money to pay the price agreed to be paid therefor. It is further claimed that the proceedings to issue bonds are defective to such an extent that the bonds are void, and from this it is argued that the city has no power to buy the property. The particular objection alleged is that the voters were asked to vote for the issuance of these bonds to buy the water system, but that they were not informed by resolution, notice, or otherwise that the system was burdened with the duty of supplying water to plaintiffs and to a large part of the city of South Pasadena, and was to be acquired subject to that burden. It is not necessary to pass on the merits of this objection to the validity of the bonds. The provisions of law and of the city charter giving the city of Pasadena power to take this property and continue the outside service are set forth and fully considered in the opinion above mentioned. These provisions do not require that the purchase, when made by the city of Pasadena, shall be approved by the voters of the city. It is immaterial, so far as the purchase is concerned, whether the voters knew of the incumbrance on the property or not. Collateral inquiry on behalf of persons not taxpayers or residents of the city of Pasadena into the validity of the purchase cannot be made on that ground, nor on the ground that the bonds are invalid and that consequently the city cannot buy the property. The plaintiffs have no interest in these questions. If the Pasadena Land & Water Company is satisfied on the score of price and of the ability of the city to pay, other persons cannot revise its decision, in the absence of any showing that they are interested as stockholders and will suffer injury. The validity or invalidity of the bonds is immaterial. Purchasers thereof may be found, and if they take them it is sufficient. If none are sold, the proposed transfer to the city may fail, in which case plaintiffs should be satisfied with the result. The other points urged in this case are considered and disposed of in the opinion in South Pasadena v. Pasadena Land & Water Co., supra.

The judgment is affirmed.

GRAHAM v. PASADENA LAND & WATER CO. (L. A. 1957.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 2, 1908.)

1. WATERS AND WATER COURSES—IRRIGATION—WATER RIGHTS.

A corporation owning a water supply for land conveyed the land to a purchaser, and subsequently transferred the supply with its water system to a third person. The by-laws of the corporation provided that the water should be supplied to the land to be used thereon. Held, that the right to receive water for the land was an easement appurtenant thereto within Civ. Code, §§ 552, 801, defining the rights of purchasers to use water for irrigation, etc.

2. APPEAL—ERRONEOUS FINDINGS—PREJUDICIAL ERROR.

Where the court held that owners of land had the right to receive water for their lands, and that the right was a continuing one, in effect running with the land for its benefit, an erroneous finding that the right was not an easement appurtenant to the land was not cause for reversal.

3. WATERS AND WATER COURSES—SALE OF WATER COMPANY—RIGHTS OF USERS OF WATER.

Where a water company, bound to supply water to land as an easement appurtenant thereto, sought to transfer its system, subject to the rights of the owners of the land as consumers and users of the water, and the transferee sought to purchase, subject to the rights of the owners which it would protect, an owner of such land could not maintain a suit to restrain the transfer on the ground that by it he would be deprived of his rights.

4. CORPORATIONS—TRANSFERS OF PROPERTY—DISSENTING STOCKHOLDERS.

A stockholder of a quasi public corporation, engaged in supplying water for public use, is bound by the action of the holders of two-thirds of the stock and the directors consenting to a transfer of the property, franchise, and business of the corporation.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Monroe, Judge.

Action by Margaret C. Graham against the Pasadena Land & Water Company. From a judgment for defendant and from an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Lynn Helm, John E. Carson, and William Collier, for appellant. Porter, Sutton & Cruickshank and Anderson & Anderson, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The record presents appeals by the plaintiff on a judgment in favor of the defendant and from an order denying her motion for a new trial. The transaction involved in the case, the validity of which is attacked by the plaintiff, is the same as that which was considered and held valid by us in the companion case entitled City of South Pasadena v. Pasadena Land & Water Co. (L. A. No. 1,793) 93 Pac. 490. The facts are fully stated in the opinion in that case, so far as they correspond with the facts here. In this case a trial was had and findings made which present some different questions. We will, in this opinion, consider only these questions, so far as they are presented in the argument.

The plaintiff owns land on which she resides. It is situated within the district served with water by the defendant, in the city of South Pasadena. She is also a stockholder in the defendant company. She sues on behalf of herself and of other stockholders similarly situated and having similar rights. It is specifically alleged that the water furnished for use on the land is an easement appurtenant to the land. The court found that this allegation was not true. It is admitted by the pleadings, however, that the plaintiff had bought the land from the San Gabriel Orange Grove Association, a corporation which then owned the water supply in question, and which afterwards transferred the said supply together with this water system to the defendant, that the by-laws of said association provided that the water should be supplied to the lands which it sold to be used thereon, and that always thereafter said water was supplied to said land for such use in accordance with the original understanding. It is clear that the finding is not warranted by the admitted facts of the case, and we think it was not sustained by the evidence introduced. Under the facts stated, the right to receive water from the supply under the control of the defendant is clearly appurtenant to the land of the plaintiff. Civ. Code, §§ 552, 801. The finding, however, is a mere conclusion of law, and, besides, we think it is entirely immaterial. The record shows that it was assumed throughout the case that the plaintiff and others similarly interested have the right to receive of the waters in controversy for use on their respective tracts of land a sufficient quantity for the need thereof, if there is enough for that purpose, and, if not, then their due share of the water available, and that this is a continuing right and still remains vested in them. This being the case, it is immaterial whether the court below understood that this right came within the legal definition of an easement appurtenant to the land or not. Taking the view apparently held by that court, the right would run with the land for its benefit, and the owner of the land would have the same right to enforce the delivery of the water as if it were an easement and appurtenance as claimed. An erroneous finding upon an immaterial issue is not cause for a reversal.

The court further found that it was the intention of the defendant company to transfer its water plant and system to the city of Pasadena, subject to all the rights of the plaintiff as a consumer and user of the water; that the city has offered to buy all the defendant's water, subject to the obligations of the defendant to its consumers; and that the company has duly accepted said offer and authorized a conveyance thereof to be made on its behalf, subject to the condition that all users and consumers of the water, outside of the city of Pasadena, shall be fully protected in their rights as they now exist, and in the use of water as now enjoyed. This finding is not challenged by the specifications. It sufficiently appears therefrom that the defendant is not purporting to transfer its property so as to deprive the plaintiff or those in her situation of the water rights they now enjoy, and hence she is not entitled to an injunction on that ground.

So far as her rights as a stockholder of the defendant are concerned, she is bound by the action of the holders of two-thirds of the stock consenting to the transfer proposed and the action of the directors in accordance therewith. It is not claimed that there is any fraud in the transaction. The right of the defendant company to make this transfer and all other questions presented by the record, not mentioned above, are fully considered and decided in South Pasadena v. Pasadena Land & Water Company, above referred to. No injurious error appears in the record.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. NAPOLI. (Cr. 104.)

(Court of Appeal, First District, California, Dec. 4, 1907. Rehearing Denied Jan. 2, 1908; Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 27, 1908.)

CRIMINAL LAW — NEW TRIAL — STATUTORY PROVISIONS—CONSTRUCTION.

Laws 1907, p. 998, c. 537, providing that, when any bill of exceptions, etc., on motion for new trial, is lost or destroyed by fire or other public calamity, and no other record of the proceedings on the trial can be obtained, and the action is subject to review by motion for new trial pending, and it is "by the court in which such action or proceeding is pending" deemed impossible to restore the proceedings, etc., the court shall have power to grant a new trial, has reference to a trial court, and does not apply where an accused has appealed after a motion for new trial is denied.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Carroll Cook, Judge

Angelo Napoli was convicted of murder in the second degree, and from a denial of a motion for a new trial, made pending an appeal from the conviction and denial of a former motion for new trial, he appeals. Affirmed.

Daniel O'Connell, for appellant. Attorney General Webb, for the People.

COOPER, P. J. Defendant was convicted in the superior court of the crime of murder in the second degree. He made a motion for a new trial, which was denied, and he appealed to this court from the order and judgment of conviction, which appeal has never been disposed of. After the said appeals had been perfected, and before the defendant's bill of exceptions had been allowed and settled by the trial court, all the records of the proceedings in said cause were destroyed by the fire of April 18, 1906, and the record has never been restored. The defendant, in May, 1907, made a second motion for a new trial, under an act entitled "An act providing for the disposition of actions and proceedings in which bills of exceptions and statements on motion for a new trial have been lost or destroyed by conflagration or other public calamity," approved March 25, 1907. St. 1907, p. 998, c. 537. The court denied the said second motion, and this appeal is from the latter order.

The act provides: "When any proposed bill of exceptions, or statement of the case on motion for a new trial, in action or proceedings, is lost or destroyed by reason of conflagration or other public calamity, and no other record of the proceedings upon the trial thereof can be obtained, and such action or proceeding is subject to review by motion for new trial, pending at the time of such loss or destruction, and it is by the court in which such action or proceeding is pending, deemed impossible or impracticable to restore such proceedings (and to settle a bill of exceptions or statement of the case containing such proceedings) so as to enable the court to review the judgment or order therein by motion for new trial, the court may grant a new trial of such action or proceeding if at the time of such loss or destruction a motion for new trial be pending therein, and such action or proceeding shall thereupon be tried anew. In order to grant such new trial, it shall be unnecessary to have any bill of exceptions or statement of the case settled, but upon the facts above recited being shown to the satisfaction of the court by affidavit or otherwise, the court shall have power in its discretion to grant such new trial." The act has reference to a trial court in which the "action or proceeding is pending." It is therein provided that "the court may grant a new trial of such action or proceeding if at the time of such loss or destruction a motion for a new trial be pending therein, and such action or proceeding shall thereupon be tried anew. After the superior court had denied the motion for a new trial, and the defendant had appealed, the motion was no longer pending in that court. That court had lost jurisdiction, and the action was then in the appellate court for review on questions of law. Peycke v. Keefe, 114 Cal. 218, 46 Pac. 78; Vosburg v. Vosburg, 137 Cal. 493, 70 Pac. 473. It is not necessary to decide the question as to whether or not the act applies to civil cases only. It is sufficient to say that in this case the order of the trial court was correct, and must be affirmed.

So ordered.

KIRMAN v. JOHNSON et al. (No. 1,085.)

(Supreme Court of Nevada. Jan. 31, 1908.)

APPEAL—AFFIRMANCE—ON MOTION—DEFECTIVE RECORD.

Supreme Court rule 8 (73 Pac. xiii) provides that objection to the transcript or statement on appeal or any technical objection to the record must be made before argument. Comp. Laws, §§ 3862, 3863, provides that, if an appellant elect to have the original papers certified as the record on appeal, they shall be attached together and the pages numbered, and shall be certified by the clerk to be such originals and to constitute the record. Section 3431 provides that a copy of the statement shall be annexed to a copy of the judgment roll, if the appeal be from the judgment, or to a copy of the order, if from an order. Section 327 of the Civil Practice Act (Comp. Laws, § 3422) authorizes the Supreme Court to review judgments, etc., from which appeals may be taken as "prescribed by law, and not otherwise." On appeal on the original papers they were neither numbered nor indexed, and the certificate of the clerk was not attached to anything, and though the notice of appeal stated that it was from the judgment and order denying a new trial, the papers failed to show any order with reference to such motion on any copy thereof, nor did the certificate of the clerk mention such order. The statement appeared to have been filed as a statement for a new trial, and the record contained no stipulation that it might be considered as a statement on appeal. Held, that the defects were jurisdictional, and hence the judgment would be affirmed, though objection was not made as required by rule 8 (73 Pac. xiii).

Appeal from District Court, Ormsby County. Action by Richard Kirman against J. M. Johnson, a bankrupt, and another as his trustee in bankruptcy. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

J. Ponjade, for appellants. Mack & Farington, for respondent.

NORCROSS, J. This was an action brought by respondent in the first judicial district court in and for Ormsby county to foreclose a chattel mortgage upon a stock of merchandise in Carson City. A judgment was entered in favor of respondent. The notice of appeal, appearing among the papers sent up from the court below, states that the appeal is taken from the judgment, and decree rendered in favor of the plaintiff, and against said defendant H. Harris, trustee, "and also from the order entered in said district court in said action on the 10th day of June, 1905, denying said defendant H. Harris' (trustee's) motion for a new trial."

The record upon appeal in this cause was filed in this court on the 7th day of September, 1905. By consent of counsel the case came on for oral argument before this court on the 23d day of April, 1907, and thereafter time was taken to file briefs in addition to those previously filed. At the time of the oral argument counsel for respondent made and filed a motion to dismiss the appeal, and to strike out all the papers filed therein upon the following grounds: "First, that there is no record whatever in said case before the Supreme Court, none having been certified to this court by the clerk of the lower court; second, that the papers, documents, and exhibits that were used on the motion for a new trial in the lower court have not been certified to by the judge of the lower court, nor by the clerk thereof, as having been used upon said motion for a new trial, nor have the same or any of them been certified to this court by the clerk of the district court; third, that there is no notice of appeal or undertaking on appeal in this case, and the same have not been certified to this court if any exists; fourth, there is no record of any kind or character before the court or certified to this court upon which this court can base any action or opinion or judgment; fifth, there is no stipulation of the attorneys or agreement of the attorneys sending up or submitting said appeal to the Supreme Court." The motion to dismiss and to strike out was heard, subject to the objection of counsel for appellant that the motion was not made in accordance with the rules of this court.

Rule 8 of this court provides: "Exceptions or objections to the transcript, statement, the undertaking on appeal, notice of appeal, or to its service or proof of service, or any technical exception or objection to the record affecting the right of the appellant to be heard on the points of error assigned, which might be cured on suggestion of diminution of the record, must be taken at the first term after the transcript is filed, and must be noted in the written or the printed points of the respondent, and filed at least one day before the argument, or they will not be regarded." 73 Pac. xiii. Had the motion been made in accordance with the provisions of the rule, we would have been compelled to grant it, unless application had been made to correct the transcript as provided for in rule 7 (73 Pac. xiii), for the transcript upon appeal in this case shows little pretense of complying with either the statutes or rules of this court governing the same. As the motion was not made in accordance with the provisions of the rule quoted, the respondent is deemed to have waived objections to the transcript that are not jurisdictional. The record in this case is in a more objectionable condition than that in the case of Linville v. Scheeline (recently decided by this court) 93 Pac. 225. Referring to the transcript in the latter case, we took occasion to say: "It is a serious question whether appeals presenting transcripts of this character ought not to be dismissed without consideration, or else the appellant be required to reform his record before it would be considered." The record in this case is made up of the original papers from the court below. "An Act regulating appeals to the Supreme Court," approved March 13, 1895 (Comp. Laws, §§ 3862-3863), leaves it in the discretion of the appellant to have the original papers sent up. Section 1 of the act provides, among other things, that, "in case he shall elect to have the original papers certified they shall be attached together and the pages numbered and indexed the same as transcripts on appeal, and shall be certified by the clerk of the district court or by the respective parties or their attorneys to be such originals, and to constitute in whole or in part the record on appeal and the clerk shall then transmit them to the clerk of the Supreme Court; provided, that where it would not be convenient to attach maps or exhibits to the other papers, they may be sent separately, properly identified and certified." In this case the papers are neither attached together, numbered, nor indexed. It would seem that the clerk had bundled up all the papers filed in the lower court and sent them to the clerk of this court. Many of the papers have no proper place in this record upon appeal, even if the record was otherwise unobjectionable. The only certificate of clerk in the so-called record is upon a separate sheet of paper, and was never attached to anything. It is manifest that this is not a proper certificate. Holmes v. Iowa Mining Co., 23 Nev. 23, 41 Pac. 762. It may be contended that it was the fault of the clerk in sending up a record of this kind; but, even if that be so in the strict sense of the law, nevertheless it would be better for counsel to see that clerks send up proper transcripts. While we are referring to the provisions of this act we deem it expedient to say that the conditions which occasioned the passage of this act, authorizing the bringing up of original papers have ceased to exist, and that an early repeal of the act will be advantageous, not only to this court, but to counsel and litigants.

"The method of procedure in taking appeals is regulated by statute. Section 327 of the Civil Practice Act (Comp. Laws, § 3422) in direct terms confers authority upon this court to review judgments and orders from which appeals can be taken in the manner prescribed by the act, 'and not otherwise.'" Marx v. Lewis, 24 Nev. 306, 53 Pac. 600. Section 336 of the Civil Practice Act (Comp. Laws, § 3431) provides: "A copy of the statement shall be annexed to a copy of the judgment roll, if the appeal be from the judgment; if the appeal be from an order, to a copy of such order." An examination of the papers appearing to have been sent up in this case fails to disclose any order in reference to the motion for a new trial or a copy thereof, nor does the certificate of the clerk mention any such order. So far as the record shows there may never have been such an order made. In the case of Kalmes v. Gerish, 7 Nev. 31, 35, this court, by Garber, J., said: "The appeal purports to be from the judgment, and from an order overruling the motion for a new trial. The record fails to show that the motion has yet been disposed of, or acted upon by the district court. The appeal from the order is therefore premature, and is dismissed."

While counsel by failing to interpose a proper objection to the record may waive all technical objections thereto, they cannot waive the essentials of a record necessary to give this court jurisdiction, such as the entire absence of an order overruling a motion for new trial, if such order were ever made. Corbett v. Job, 5 Nev. 201; Irwin v. Sampson, 10 Nev. 282; Greeley v. Holland, 14 Nev. 320; Marx v. Lewis, 24 Nev. 306, 53 Pac. 600; Hart v. Spencer, 29 Nev. —, 80 Pac. 289. As was said by this court in Sherman v. Shaw, 9 Nev. 152, "It is as unsatisfactory to the court as it is to counsel and litigants to have cases disposed of upon mere questions of practice. But it must be remembered that the rules of practice are as obligatory upon us as upon the parties to a suit; and, if attorneys desire to have their cases examined upon the merits, they must comply with the plain provisions of the statute and the rules of practice, as established by the court." In this case counsel have at great labor prepared and filed exhaustive briefs upon the merits, and it is especially regrettable that the record is not in such shape to empower this court to determine the questions so ably presented. The record does not contain a stipulation of counsel that the statement on motion for a new trial may be considered also as a statement on appeal. The statement appears to have been filed exclusively as a statement on motion for a new trial. This court has repeatedly held that such a statement, in the absence of stipulation of counsel, cannot be considered as a statement on appeal. Williams v. Rice, 13 Nev. 234; Nesbitt v. Chisholm, 16 Nev. 39; Robinson v. Benson, 19 Nev. 331, 10 Pac. 441.

While the judgment roll in this case contains papers not authorized to be included therein, it does contain all the essentials. Although it is not certified to otherwise than as hereinbefore stated, in the absence of proper objection, it may be conceded as being before us for consideration. Where there is nothing before the court but the judgment roll, we can only consider any alleged errors which may appear upon the face thereof. In the present case we find no error so appearing, and it becomes our duty to affirm the judgment, and it is so ordered.

STROSNIDER v. TURNER. (No. 1,743.)

(Supreme Court of Nevada. Jan. 31, 1908.)

1. ELECTIONS — BALLOTS — INDICATION OF CHOICE BY VOTER—DISTINGUISHING MARKS.

Under St. 1901, p. 112, c. 100, providing that a voter shall prepare his ballot by stamping a cross in the square, and in no other place, after the name of the person for whom he intends to vote for each office, ballots containing three crosses opposite the name of a candidate, two within and one without the square, or two crosses in the square, or two crosses outside the square, or on which none of the crosses are stamped, but which are marked with a lead pencil or by using a corner of a stamp as a pencil, or containing two rectangular marks in squares opposite the names of two candidates, or containing crosses stamped between the name of the candidate and the party designation, or containing an indescrutable mark opposite the name of a candidate and a double cross opposite the name of another candidate, must be rejected.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 18, Elections, §§ 166, 167.]

2. SAME.

A ballot having the appearance of an attempt to make a second impression of the stamp to make it clearer, or to rectify some defect, is valid, though the second stamping does not exactly cover the first.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 18, Elections, §§ 166, 167.]

3. SAME.

A ballot was first marked with a cross with a corner of the stamp. The voter, on discovering his error, made a proper stamp beside the illegal one. Held, that the ballot was illegal.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 18, Elections, §§ 166, 167.]

4. SAME—PREPARATION OF BALLOT BY VOTER.

A voter, on discovering his mistake in marking his ballot, should, instead of trying to rectify it himself, return the ballot to the election officers, and obtain a new one.

5. SAME.

A voter, while preparing his ballot, used a stamp containing very little ink on it, and he did not thereafter apply the stamp to the ink pad before completing the marking of the ballot. The first few crosses stamped were fairly distinct, and all the remaining marks were made by the stamp properly applied. Held, that the ballot was valid, though a number of the marks on it had little, if any, resemblance to a cross.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 18, Elections, §§ 166, 167.]

6. SAME.

A small portion of the cross marked on a ballot projected over the line dividing the squares opposite the names of two candidates. The main portion of the cross was opposite the name of one of the candidates. Held, that the voter intended to cast his vote for the latter.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 18, Elections, §§ 151–155.]

7. SAME.

A ballot is unobjectionable, though some of the crosses stamped on it are imperfect.

Appeal from District Court, Lyon County.

Election contest by I. A. Strosnider against C. C. Turner. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed, and remanded for new trial.

C. E. Mack, for appellant. Alfred Chartz, for respondent.

NORCROSS, J. This is the second appeal of this cause. Action was brought by appellant to contest the election of respondent to the office of short term commissioner of Lyon county. Upon the first trial of the case the lower court found that the plaintiff, Strosnider, had received 276, and defendant, Turner, 275, lawful ballots. Upon the first appeal we held that the court had rejected certain ballots cast for respondent, which were lawful, and should have been counted. Upon the second trial of this cause the lower court found that the plaintiff had received 277, and the defendant 278, lawful ballots. This appeal again presents for consideration the rulings of the court upon the admission and rejection of certain ballots.

Plaintiff's Exhibit No. 11 was properly rejected, there appearing upon the face of the ballot three crosses stamped opposite the name of George Springmeyer, candidate for Attorney General, two within, and one without, the square.

Plaintiff's Exhibits Nos. 3 and 10 were properly rejected, none of the crosses appearing thereon being stamped. Apparently they were made by using one corner of the stamp as a pencil would be used. Section 20 of the act of the Legislature, known as the "Australian Ballot Law," as amended March 21, 1901, provides, among other things, that: "On receiving his ballot the voter shall immediately retire alone to one of the places, booth or compartments. He shall prepare his ballot by stamping a cross or X in the square, and in no other place, after the name of the person for whom he intends to vote for each office. In case of a constitutional amendment or other question submitted to the voters, the cross or X shall be placed after the answer which he desires to give. Such stamping shall be done only with a stamp in black ink, which stamp, ink and ink pad shall be furnished in sufficient number by the county clerk for each election precinct in the county." St. 1901, p. 112, c. 100.

Plaintiff's Exhibit No. 9 was properly rejected. The ballot contains two rectangular marks or blotches in squares opposite the names of two candidates. Marks of this kind were fully considered upon the former appeal.

Plaintiff's Exhibit No. 8 was properly rejected. The ballot contains two distinct crosses deliberately stamped in the square opposite the name of J. A. Carter, candidate for justice of the peace. Ballots so marked have repeatedly been held illegal by this court.

Error is assigned in the court's refusal to reject ballot marked "Plaintiff's Exhibit No. 7." Objection was made upon the ground that in the squares opposite the names of two candidates there appears double crosses. We think these marks can hardly be considered double crosses in the sense that they would be regarded as distinguishing marks. They have the appearance of an attempt to make a second impression of the stamp in order to make it clearer, or to rectify some defect. The second stamping did not exactly cover the first. The resulting mark is in character similar to that held to be valid in the case of State v. Sadler, 25 Nev. 131, 179, 58 Pac. 284, 59 Pac. 546, 63 Pac. 128, and therein referred to as "the so-called double crosses, where it is apparent the voter had attempted to retrace the lines composing the cross."

Ballot marked "Plaintiff's Exhibit No. 6" was objected to upon the ground that in the square opposite the name of George A. Bartlett, candidate for member of Congress, there appears a double cross. We think the court erred in overruling this objection. The voter evidently first marked a cross with one corner of the stamp as plaintiff's Exhibit Nos. 3 and 10, supra, were marked. Upon discovering his error he made a proper stamp beside the illegal one. The voter, when he discovered his mistake, instead of trying himself to rectify it, should have returned his ballot to the election officers and obtained a new one, as the law prescribes. To hold a ballot of this kind to be legal would open the way for the secrecy of the ballot to be evaded, the prevention of which is one of the main purposes of the law.

Error is assigned in not rejecting ballot marked "Plaintiff's Exhibit No. 5." This ballot is similar to Exhibit No. 7, and the court, we think, did not err in counting it.

Ballot marked "Exhibit No. 4" was not stamped as required by law, but was marked with a lead pencil throughout, and was properly rejected.

Ballot marked "Exhibit No. 2" was erroneously counted over plaintiff's objection.

All of the crosses were stamped between the name of the candidate and the party designation, instead of in the square after the name of the person for whom he intended to vote, as required by the statute. Ballots so marked were held to be legal in State v. Sadler, supra. That case, however, was decided before the amendment of 1901, supra, which changed the law in respect to the place prescribed for marking the ballot. The law now requires the cross to be stamped "in the square, and in no other place, after the name of the person for whom he intends to vote for each office." The printed ballots provide a square within which it is the intention of the law the stamp should be placed.

Ballot marked "Exhibit No. 1" is objected to upon the ground that a distinguishing mark appears after the name of O. A. Brooks, candidate for member of Assembly. The mark in question is a blurred cross. The cross is plainly visible, and the defect apparently was occasioned by too much ink upon the stamp, or from some other accidental cause.

Appellant assigns error in the counting of three ballots, the legality of which we determined upon the former appeal. Such assignments require no further consideration.

The record in this case contains certain ballots, admitted and counted for appellant over respondent's objections. As we held upon the former appeal, following the case of Dennis v. Caughlin, 22 Nev. 453,¹ these ballots are not strictly before us. However, as their validity has been argued, we deem it advantageous to express our views upon them in order that the case may reach a final determination at the earliest possible date.

Ballot marked "Plaintiff's Exhibit No. 12" was objected to "upon the ground that there appear indescribable and distinguishing marks from which the ballot could be identified opposite nearly all the names." It is apparent that the person who prepared this ballot used a stamp containing very little ink upon it to begin with, and did not thereafter apply it to the ink pad before completing the marking of the ballot. While one may readily conclude, from the fact that the first few crosses stamped were fairly distinct, that all the remaining marks were made by the stamp properly applied, it must be admitted that a number of the resultant marks have little, if any, resemblance to a cross, and taken alone would not be recognized as such. However, this ballot should have been rejected for the reason that two crosses appear to have been deliberately stamped opposite the name of Robert Raffice, candidate for State Controller. It would seem quite probable from this ballot that the voter, having first stamped a cross in the square opposite the name of J. C. Knust, Socialist Party candidate for State Controller, placed two opposite that of Raffice, possibly to impress the fact that Raffice was the one for whom he intended to vote.

Ballot marked "Defendant's Exhibit No. 2"

was admitted and counted for appellant over respondent's objection, as follows: "That opposite the name of Orris Ring there is an indescribable mark, and opposite the name of D. W. Melarkey there is a double cross." We think the objection is well taken, and the ballot should have been excluded.

Ballot marked "Defendant's Exhibit No. 1" was admitted, and counted for appellant over the following objection of respondent: "That, taking the ballot as a whole, it is impossible to determine for whom the voter intended to vote for county commissioner." So far as the objection made is concerned, we think it is not well taken. A small portion of the cross projects over the line dividing the squares opposite the names of appellant and respondent. The main portion of the cross, however, is opposite the name of appellant, and we think, "taking the ballot as a whole," it was the voter's intention to cast his vote for appellant.

Ballot marked "Defendant's Exhibit No. 3" was objected to upon the grounds: "That there appears a distinguishing mark after the name of D. P. Randall," etc. Without determining whether the ballot is subject to other objections noted, it is sufficient to say that it contains a cross deliberately stamped outside the square provided for such purpose, and in the blank space immediately below the words "Silver Party," thus rendering the ballot invalid.

Ballot marked "Defendant's Exhibit No. 4" is unobjectionable. The most that can be said against this ballot is that some of the crosses stamped are imperfect. The ballot is clearly admissible under the rule laid down in the case of State v. Sadler, supra.

If all of the ballots contained in the record were properly before us, we should affirm the judgment. However, as our action must find its basis upon some error assigned, and as we have determined that the court admitted and counted for respondent, over appellant's objection, three ballots which we think should have been excluded, we are obliged to reverse the judgment and remand the cause for a new trial, which is ordered.

BANK OF COMMERCE, Limited, v. BALDWIN et al.

(Supreme Court of Idaho. Jan. 13, 1908.)

1. HUSBAND AND WIFE—LIABILITY OF WIFE—SEPARATE ESTATE.

Under the provisions of section 2 of the act of the Legislature approved March 9, 1903 (Sess. Laws 1903, p. 346), construed in connection with the other provisions of the Code, a married woman cannot bind herself personally for the payment of a debt that was not contracted for her own use or benefit, or for the use or benefit of her separate estate, or in connection with the control and management thereof, or in carrying on or conducting business therewith, unless the contract and obligation is made so as to create a lien or incumbrance on her separate estate, or some portion thereof, as security for the payment of the debt.

2. SAME—LIABILITY AS SURETY.

Under the provisions of section 2, Act March 9, 1903, p. 346, which transfers to the wife the management, control, and absolute right of disposition of her separate property, and confers upon her all the privileges of contracting in relation thereto, and all the rights or privileges necessary to the complete enjoyment and power of disposition thereof, a married woman has no authority to become surety or guarantor for the debts of others; such right and the concurrent obligations thereof not being necessary or essential to the complete enjoyment of her separate estate.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 26, Husband and Wife, §§ 348-352.]

3. SAME—CONTRACTS.

The power to contract with reference to her separate property is not an absolute and unlimited right of contract on all matters, but on the contrary confines that right to those contracts that "have reference to her separate estate."

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 26, Husband and Wife, §§ 317-326, 597.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from District Court, Ada County; George H. Stewart, Judge.

Action by the Bank of Commerce against George E. Baldwin and Sarah A. Bowers. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

See 85 Pac. 497.

Action by plaintiff on a promissory note executed by the defendants jointly, where the debt was contracted for the use and benefit of Baldwin, and the money was received by him for his individual use and benefit, and no part thereof was received by Mrs. Bowers. Judgment for defendant Bowers.

Edwin Snow and Carl A. Davis, for appellant. N. M. Bulck, for respondents.

AILSHIE, C. J. This is an appeal from the judgment and an order striking a proposed statement from the files and refusing to settle the same. The trial court had made an order extending the time for preparing the statement to June 7, 1906. Thereafter a further order was made, but the second order was not made until after the expiration of the time allowed by the first order. When the statement was presented for settlement, on motion of the adverse party the same was stricken from the files, and the court refused to settle it on the ground that it had not been presented in time, and that the court had lost jurisdiction to settle or allow it. The action of the court was clearly correct, and in conformity with the repeated decisions of this court. Lydon v. Piper, 5 Idaho, 541, 51 Pac. 101; Hoehnan v. New York Dry Goods Co., 8 Idaho, 66, 67 Pac. 796; Swartz v. Davis, 9 Idaho, 238, 74 Pac. 800; Sandstrom v. Smith, 11 Idaho, 779, 84 Pac. 1060.

On the appeal from the judgment the only question presented for our consideration is: Can a married woman be held for the payment of a promissory note, executed by her as a co-maker, with a person not her husband, where the debt was not contracted for her own use, or for the use or benefit of her separate estate, or in connection with the control and management of her separate estate, or in carrying on or conducting business with her separate estate? It is admitted that under the repeated decisions of this court she would not be liable for this debt, if the party for whose benefit the debt was incurred had been her husband. Indeed it has been repeatedly so held by this court. See Dernham & Kaufman v. Rowley, 4 Idaho, 753, 44 Pac. 643; Jaeckel v. Pease, 6 Idaho, 131, 53 Pac. 399; Strode v. Miller, 7 Idaho, 16, 59 Pac. 803; Holt v. Gridley, 7 Idaho, 416, 63 Pac. 188. This case was here once before (Bank of Commerce v. Baldwin, 12 Idaho, 202, 85 Pac. 497), and on that appeal the court held that "a married woman cannot bind herself personally for the payment of a debt that was not contracted for her own use, or for the use and benefit of her separate estate, or in connection with the control and management thereof, or in carrying on or conducting business therewith." We might rest our decision upon the opinion in the last appeal as being the law of the case; but, since the question squarely arises on this appeal as to the liability of the wife as a surety or guarantor for the debt of a stranger, we have thought it best to pass on that point. The findings of fact upon which our decision and conclusion must necessarily rest in this consideration are as follows: "That the defendant Sarah A. Bowers at the time she signed the said note was a married woman, and at the date of the execution of said note was living with her husband as husband and wife in Ada county, Idaho, and that the said note was not made or signed by her as a charge upon her separate estate, nor for her own use or benefit. That the said note was not made in or about the carrying on of any trade or business by the defendant Sarah A. Bowers, or for her use, or for her benefit, or for the use or benefit of her separate property." The act of March 9, 1903, repealed sections 2498 and 2499 of the Revised Statutes of 1887, with reference to a married woman, which sections had previously given the husband the management and control of her separate property, and had also provided for her becoming a sole trader, and instead thereof section 2 of the amendatory act provides that, "during the continuance of the marriage a wife has the management, control and absolute power of disposing of her separate property, and may bargain, sell and convey her real and personal property, and may enter into any contract with reference to the same in the same manner and to the same extent and with like effect as a married man may in relation to real and personal property." Sees. Laws 1903, p. 346. It is argued by counsel for appellant that any and all contracts that a married woman can possibly enter into necessarily have reference to "her separate property," and that she may therefore enter into any contract that could be entered into by a feme sole. It is further argued that no contract can be entered into but what has reference to property, and that, therefore, a contract by a married woman which has reference to "her separate property" will comprehend any and all contracts she might enter into. That position appears to be supported by the Supreme Court of Kansas in Deering v. Boyle, 8 Kan. 525, 12 Am. Rep. 480, wherein the Supreme Court in considering the liability of a married woman on a promissory note executed for the debt of her husband, and in construing a statute identical with ours, said: "It must be equally clear that such a contract as the note sued on has reference, more or less remote, to the general property of the person signing the contract. If it has not such reference, then it has no reference to anything whatever, but is totally and absolutely void."

In both North and South Dakota the statute provides that "either husband or wife may enter into any engagement or transaction with the other, or with any other person, respecting property, which either might, if unmarried, subject, in transactions between themselves, to the general rules which control the actions of persons occupying confidential relations with each other, as defined by the title on trusts." The Supreme Court of North Dakota, in Colonial & U. S. Mtg. Co. v. Stevens, 3 N. D. 265, 55 N. W. 578, in considering their statute and the liability of a married woman as surety on a promissory note for her husband, said: "This statute is very broad in its language. It is true that the contract must be one respecting property; but we cannot assent to the view that it must relate to the married woman's separate property. It would have been easy to have said so in express terms had such been the purpose of the lawmaking power. When the Legislature has established the single and simple test that the contract must be one respecting property generally, we have no right to amend the law, and thereby inject into the act a further limitation which will exclude many contracts respecting property." It will be seen from the foregoing quotation that the North Dakota court practically conceded that, if the statute read "with reference to her separate property" as does our statute, the action could not have been maintained. A like statute was under consideration later by the Supreme Court of South Dakota in Colonial & U. S. Mtg. Co. v. Bradley, 4 S. D. 158, 55 N. W. 1108, and the court cited Mortgage Co. v. Stevens, supra, with approval, and in commenting on this statute, said: "The learned counsel for the respondents contends that, the authority of a married woman to enter into contracts being limited to contracts 'respecting property,' this limitation should be construed to mean her separate property; but to so construe the limitation would require us to interpolate into the section terms that are not found in the section, which this court would not be authorized to do. It must be presumed that, if the Legislature intended to so limit the authority of married women to contract, it would have inserted such qualifying words into the section." The statute of California has been for many years the same as that quoted from North and South Dakota, and the California court has held that it authorized a contract of the character of the one under consideration here. Marlow v. Barlew, 53 Cal. 456; Goad v. Moulton, 67 Cal. 536, 8 Pac. 63; Farmers' Bank v. DeShorb, 137 Cal. 685, 70 Pac. 771. The same is true in Nevada. See Cartan v. David, 18 Nev. 310, 4 Pac. 61. In view of the material essential in which our statute differs from the statutes in California, Nevada, and the Dakotas, we feel that the decisions from those courts are not in point in this consideration further than the general reasoning of the cases might appeal to the court as throwing light upon the legislative intent. The two Dakota cases, however, admit that, if their statutes read the same as ours, their decisions would probably have been different.

It is insisted by counsel that our amendatory statute must have been taken from the statute of Kansas, and that with it we necessarily adopted the Kansas construction as embodied in Deering v. Boyle, supra. Shoshone County v. Proffitt, 11 Idaho, 772, 84 Pac. 712; Stein v. Morrison, 9 Idaho, 426, 75 Pac. 246. If it were conceded that the amended statute (section 2, p. 346, Act March 9, 1903) had been taken from the Kansas Code, still there would be this objection to the adoption of the Kansas construction thereof. The Supreme Court of this state has, through a continuous line of decisions for nearly 12 years, held that, "in order to charge the separate property of the wife, and render it liable to levy and sale, it must be alleged in the complaint and proven that the debt was incurred for the use and benefit of her separate property, or for her own use or benefit." Section 2504, Rev. St. 1897, has lent a great deal of force to that conclusion, and that section stands to this day without amendment. Notwithstanding this interpretation of the statute as it has existed in this state, the Legislature, although meeting biennially, never attempted in any way to change the rule or announced a different legislative intent until the act of March 9, 1903. When it did make a change, it simply abrogated the statute providing for a married woman becoming a sole trader, and transferred the management and control and right of disposing of her separate property from her husband to her; and that transfer of management, control, and right of disposition granted a concurrent and commensurate power and authority to dispose of the same and contract in reference thereto. It is evident to us that, had the Legislature desired to change the rule as previously announced by this court, and grant the wife the right to become surety and guarantor aid to sign accommodation paper and go bail, it would have done so in clear and unmistakable terms. In other words, the Legislature would not have limited her right to contract to those instances merely which have "reference to her separate property." As it is, they have said in substance that, "with reference to the wife's separate property, she may enter into contracts in like manner and to the same effect as a married man may in relation to his property." When the Legislature said that the contracts the wife can enter into are those "with reference to her separate property," it evidently intended to grant her all the rights and privileges of contracting that are necessary or essential to the full and complete enjoyment of her separate property, and the right of management and control and disposition of the same. On the other hand, it clearly appears that by the use of this modifying phrase they did not mean to extend her liability on contracts beyond that which would be for her own use or benefit, or in reference to her separate estate.

It is argued, however, that the execution of a promissory note for a third party is a contract with reference to the wife's separate property for the reason that, if she should have to pay it, she could not do so except out of her separate estate. This as a highly attenuated theory may have some logic in it; but, on the contrary, it contains much fallacy. A promissory note does not become property until it is executed and delivered. When delivered, it is the property of the payee. It is to be paid by the makers out of whatever property they may have at the time of its maturity, or in case action is instituted for its collection out of such property as may be reached by execution. But at the time of the execution of the note the married woman might not have a single dollar's worth of property in existence, nor the expectation of anything but her daily earnings. Still the person taking the note might rely upon her honesty and earning capacity for its payment, and yet, contrary to expectations, she might not have a dollar when it becomes due, and might not thereafter have anything subject to execution. Now to say that this note was executed with reference to her separate property is too far-fetched to have much application to the consideration of this statute. Again, a married woman, who has not a dollar's worth of property, might execute a note in payment of her own debt, or for goods and wares furnished directly to her, or for the necessities of life, where the property was parted with on the faith of her promise to pay, and the contract would be a binding and valid contract against her; but it would not be binding merely because it was a contract "with reference to property," but because it is a contract to pay her own debt for her own use and benefit, and, if she failed to pay it, the creditor could collect it by execution, if she ever had property subject to execution that he could reach before the bar of the statute of limitations cut him off. Where, however, the debt is not hers, and she has received none of the consideration either for her own use or benefit or that of her separate estate, in order for the contract to be one "with reference to her separate property," within the purview of our statute, the obligation as to her must become one in rem whereby she creates a lien or incumbrance on her separate property for the payment of the debt. In such case the contract clearly becomes one with reference to her separate estate in so far as it obligates that estate, or any part thereof, for the payment of this specific obligation.

The case of Yale v. Dederer, 18 N. Y. 265, 72 Am. Dec. 503, has perhaps been more generally criticised than any other American case in reference to its holding on this specific point, and yet to us its reasoning seems more logical and sound than that contained in any of the opinions that have assumed to criticise it. Among other things, the court there says: "Can, then, the principle on which the liability depends be extended to cases of mere suretyship for the husband or a stranger? It seems to me it cannot. The obligation of a surety in all other cases is held to be stricti juris; and if his contract is void at law, there is no liability in equity founded on the consideration between the principal parties. * * * Why should a married woman be made an exception to this rule? We are to remember that her contract is absolutely void at law, and, when she is a mere surety, there is no equity springing out of the consideration. If the promise is on her own account, if she or her separate estate receive a benefit, equity will lay hold of these circumstances, and compel her property to respond to the engagement. Where these grounds of liability do not exist, there is no principle on which her estate can be made answerable. If we hold that the signing of a note as surety brings a charge upon her estate, we must go further and hold also that her guaranty, her indorsement, her accommodation acceptance, her bail bond, indeed, every conceivable instrument which she may be persuaded to sign, for her husband or others, although absolutely void at law, are so far binding in equity as to charge her property with its payment. This would be a doctrine sustained by no analogies, and opposed to the soundest policy. It would go far to withdraw those checks which are intended to preserve a wife from marital influences, which may be, and often are, unduly exerted, and yet baffle all detection. The doctrine that equity regards her as feme sole in respect to her separate estate only admits that she may dispose of such estate with or without a written consent of her husband, and without the solemnities which the law in other cases requires. But her mere promise to pay money, as we have seen, is not of itself such a disposition. Courts of equity, proceeding in rem, will take hold of her estate, and appropriate it to the payment of her debts, but when her obligation is one of suretyship merely, she owes no debt at law or in equity; if not at law, which is very clear, then quite as clearly not in equity."

It has been urged that a wife at common law would be liable for a debt like the one sued on here, and that since the statute does not specifically prohibit such a contract, she should be held liable. We would be reluctant to concede such a doctrine. Originally at common law the wife had no separate estate, and could not contract. Later the English Courts of Chancery, through the medium of trusts, began to recognize and allow separate estates to be settled upon married women. Following the allowance of such estates, the Courts of Chancery, irrespective of the feme covert's incapacity to contract, held that, where the promise was made with reference to her separate estate, and she had signified an intention or desire to obligate her estate for a debt where the benefit or consideration moved to her or her estate, the Courts of Chancery would decree the payment of the same out of the separate estate. Controversies, however, arose not infrequently as to whether such obligation should be paid out of the separate estate that the feme covert had at the time the debt was contracted and of the promise to pay, or whether it could be made out of estate coming to her after the obligation was incurred. Pike v. Fitzgibbon, and Martin v. Fitzgibbon, 6 Eng. Ruling Cases, 56. An examination of the English cases on this subject discloses that, with a very few exceptions, they were cases where the debt was contracted by the wife for her separate use and benefit, or her separate estate, or in reference thereto. It will also be seen on a perusal of those cases that there was no unanimity of opinion as to the true principle to be applied, and that such eminent English chancellors and jurists as Lords Hardwicke, Thurlow, Bathurst, Alvanley, Rosslyn, and Eldon frequently disagreed as to the true principle upon which such decrees rested and as to the facts under which that principle, whatever it was, should be applied. As late as 1873 in London Chartered Bank of Australia v. Lempriere, 21 Eng. Ruling Cases, 553, on an appeal from the Supreme Court of the colony of Victoria, the court had under consideration the character of the "engagement" for which a wife's separate property would be held in equity. The diversity of opinion as to the extent of such liability is disclosed by a quotation in the latter case from Johnson v. Gallagher, 30 L. J. Ch. 298, wherein the Lord Justice said: "I am not prepared, however, to go to the length of saying that the separate estate will, in all cases, be affected by a mere general engagement. The cases of Jones v. Harris and Agullar v. Agullar show that the engagement which, if the married woman was a feme sole, the law would create for repayment of the consideration of a void annuity, would not affect it. It seems to follow that, to affect the separate estate, there must be something more than the mere obligation which the law would create in the case of a single woman. What that something more may be must, I think, depend in each case upon the circumstances. What might affect the separate estate in the case of a married woman living separate from her husband might not, as I apprehend, affect it in the case of a married woman living with her husband. What might bind the separate estate, if the credit be given to the married woman, would not, as I conceive, bind it if the credit be not so given." The London Chartered Bank of Australia Case was cited and distinguished in Pike v. Fitzgibbon, supra, wherein it was expressly admitted that there could be no liability against a married woman at common law, and the relief there was granted upon the theory of a "promise" rather than that of a "contract." It will also be noticed that the principle which has been kept uppermost was that the wife received the consideration for the "promise," or that it inured to the use and benefit of her separate estate. In practically every instance where a decree has been allowed against her estate it has been upon the theory—if not express, then implied—that the obligation was one incurred "with reference to her separate estate or property." For interesting American reviews of the English authorities on this subject, see Ewing v. Smith, 3 Desaus. (S. C.) 417, 5 Am. Dec. 557; Jaques v. Trustees 1st Me. Episcopal Church, 17 Johns. (N. Y.) 548, 8 Am. Dec. 447; Yale v. Dederer, 18 N. Y. 265, 72 Am. Dec. 503; Yale v. Dederer, 22 N. Y. 450, 78 Am. Dec. 216; Cartan v. David, 18 Nev. 310, 4 Pac. 61.

We conclude that the action of the trial court in entering judgment in favor of the defendant Bowers, and in denying the motion, was correct, and the same is hereby affirmed, costs awarded in favor of respondent.

STEWART, J., concurs.

SULLIVAN, J. (concurring). I concur in the conclusion reached, for, as I view this case, the former opinion rendered by a divided court is the law of the case on the questions decided by my associates on this appeal. For that reason it is not necessary for me to express my views of the questions decided on this appeal.

UNION STOCKYARDS NAT. BANK OF
SOUTH OMAHA, NEB., v. BOLAN.

(Supreme Court of Idaho. Jan. 14, 1908.)

1. CORPORATIONS—FOREIGN CORPORATIONS—RIGHT TO DO BUSINESS.

Where the indorsee of a promissory note sues the maker thereof, and the defendant sets up as one of his defenses that the payee was a foreign corporation doing business in this state, and that it failed to comply with the Constitution and statutes of the state in designating an agent upon whom service of process could be made, and in filing copies of its articles of incorporation, it is error for the court to strike such defense from defendant's answer.

2. BILLS AND NOTES—"NEGOTIABLE PROMISSORY NOTE."

A promissory note containing a stipulation whereby the sureties, guarantors, indorsers, and makers waive notice of the granting of any extension of time for payment, and waive the right of defense on the ground that extension has been made without notice to them or either of them, is not a "negotiable promissory note," within the meaning and intent of the negotiable instrument law of this state. Sess. Laws 1903, p. 380.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 5, pp. 4770-4771.]

3. SAME — DEFENSES TO NONNEGOTIABLE NOTE.

The note sued upon in this case being a nonnegotiable promissory note is subject to all the defenses and equities in favor of the maker, while in the hands of the indorsee, to the same extent and effect as if in the hands of the payee named therein.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from District Court, Washington County; Frank J. Smith, Judge.

Action by the Union Stockyards National Bank of South Omaha, Neb., against J. H. Bolan. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Rhea & Son, for appellant. Harris & Smith, for respondent.

AILSHIE, C. J. This action was commenced by the respondent as the indorsee of a promissory note made and executed by the appellant in the following form:

"$900.00

No. 0187.

"Cambridge, Idaho, May 8, 1903.

"Six months after date, for value received, I, we, or either of us jointly and severally promise to pay to the order of Uinta Hereford Cattle Company the sum of nine hundred dollars, with interest at the rate of ten per centum per annum from date until paid.

"Payable at the office of the Peoples' Bank, Salubria, Idaho.

"Should this note be collected by suit, ten per cent. shall be allowed holder as attorney fee. The sureties, guarantors, and indorsers of this note severally waive presentation for payment, protest and notice of protest. No extension of time of payment with or without our knowledge by the receipt of interest or otherwise shall release us or either of us from the obligation of payment.

"J. H. Bolan."

The plaintiff alleged that it was a bona fide purchaser of this note for value before maturity, and received it in the due and ordinary course of business. Defendant answered, admitting the execution and delivery of the note, but denied that the plaintiff was a bona fide purchaser of the note for value and in the due course of business. He alleged as a defense to the action that the note was executed in payment for certain live stock purchased by him from the payee of the note, the Uinta Hereford Cattle Company, and that the stock purchased were not up to the guaranty furnished him by the company at the time of the sale, and he thereupon claimed damages in the sum of $1,000. He also alleged that the Uinta Hereford Cattle Company was a foreign corporation, organized and existing under the laws of the state of Nebraska, and that it was on the date of the execution of the note, and had been for a long time previous thereto, doing business in the state of Idaho, and that it had failed and neglected to comply with the laws of this state in filing certified copies of its articles of incorporation and the designation of an agent upon whom process could be served, and that it never at any time made any designation of an agent in any county of this state upon whom process might be served. Other matters were pleaded in defense and as counterclaims to plaintiff's cause of action. On motion of the plaintiff, the court struck from defendant's answer all the allegations with reference to the Uinta Hereford Cattle Company being a foreign corporation, and failing and neglecting to comply with the laws of this state in designating an agent upon whom service of process might be made, and filing a certified copy of its articles of incorporation. Defendant took an exception to the ruling of the court, and assigns the same as error. After the plaintiff had submitted its proofs at the trial the defendant moved for a nonsuit upon the grounds, among other things, that it appeared from the evidence introduced by the plaintiff that the Uinta Hereford Cattle Company was a foreign corporation, organized under the laws of the state of Nebraska, and that the plaintiff had failed to prove that such corporation had complied with section 10 of article 11 of the Constitution of the state of Idaho, and the act of the Legislature in reference to foreign corporations doing business in this state. The motion was denied by the court, whereupon the defendant asked leave to file an amended answer again setting up the facts as to the Uinta Hereford Cattle Company being a foreign corporation doing business within this state, and having failed and neglected to comply with the Constitution and statutes in reference to foreign corporations doing business within the state. Thereupon defendant offered to pay the actual costs that had been incurred, in the case, in the event it became necessary for a continuance over the term on account of such amendment. The motion and application were denied by the court, and the defendant excepted, and assigns the action of the court as error on this appeal.

It was clearly error on the part of the court to sustain plaintiff's motion and strike from defendant's answer that part of his defense setting up the failure of the Uinta Hereford Cattle Company to comply with the Constitution and statutes of this state in the designation of an agent on whom process could be served, and filing its articles of incorporation. He had an undoubted right to interpose such a defense. Katz v. Herrick, 12 Idaho, 1, 86 Pac. 873; Valley Lumber Co. v. Drlessel (Idaho) 93 Pac. 765; Valley Lumber Co. v. Nickerson (Idaho) 93 Pac. 24. It was also an abuse of discretion on the part of the court, after it had erroneously granted the motion to strike this defense from defendant's answer, to deny the defendant's motion and application to amend his answer setting up this defense.

On the trial of this case the most important and decisive question that arose was that as to whether the plaintiff, Union Stockyards National Bank of South Omaha, was a bona fide purchaser for value in due course of business, within the meaning of the law, so as to preclude the defendant from setting up equities that existed between him and the Uinta Hereford Cattle Company, the payee named in the note. The test to be applied, therefore, in this case is: Was the note sued on a negotiable instrument within the meaning of the statute of this state defining and governing such instruments? Sess. Laws 1903, p. 380. We may note in passing that the uniform negotiable instrument law is in substance merely a codification of the law-merchant on the subject. Appellant contends that since the note sued on contained an express waiver on the part of the sureties, guarantors, indorsers and maker of any and all rights of defense on account of extensions of time of payment of the note, it thereby rendered the note nonnegotiable. Subdivision 3 of section 1 of the negotiable instrument law requires that an instrument in order to be negotiable "must be payable on demand or at a fixed or determinable future time." Section 4 of the act provides as follows: "An instrument is payable at a determinable future time, within the meaning of this act, which is expressed to be payable: First, at a fixed rate period after date or sight; or, second, on or before a fixed or determinable future time specified therein, or, third, on or at a fixed period after the occurrence of a specified event, which is certain to happen, though the time of happening be uncertain. An instrument payable upon a contingency is not negotiable, and the happening of the event does not cure the defect."

Section 184 of the act defines a negotiable promissory note, and, among other requisites, provides that it must engage "to pay on demand or at a fixed or determinable future time a sum certain in money, to order or to bearer." The note sued on in this case cannot be said to comply with these provisions of the statute. Its closing sentence provides that, "No extension of time of payment, with or without our knowledge, by the receipt of interest or otherwise, shall release us or either of us from the obligation of payment." This is an express contract to the effect that the time of payment may be extended to any one or all of the sureties, guarantors, indorsers, or makers of the note without notice to all or any one of them. This undoubtedly renders the note nonnegotiable under all the authorities that have been brought to our attention on the subject. By section 52 of the act (Sess. Laws 1903, p. 389), in order to establish that one is "a holder in due course" of commercial paper, the instrument must be "complete and regular upon its face." In Matchett v. Anderson Foundry & Machine Works, 29 Ind. App. 207, 64 N. E. 229, 94 Am. St. Rep. 272, the note provided that "the drawers and indorsers severally waived presentment for payment, protest, and notice of protest, and on payment of this note, and all defenses on the ground of any extension of the time of its payment that may be given by the holder or holders to them or either of them." In that case the Indiana Court of Appeals held that the note was nonnegotiable, and was subject to defense on all the equities that the maker held against the payee. It will be noticed by comparison that the stipulation contained in that note is almost identical with the stipulation in the note at bar, and was to the same effect as the one here. For other cases in point, see Smith v. Van Blarcom, 45 Mich. 371, 8 N. W. 90; Citizens' National Bank v. Piolet, 126 Pa. 194, 7 Atl. 603, 4 L. R. A. 190, 12 Am. St. Rep. 800; Miller v. Poage, 56 Iowa, 96, 8 N. W. 799, 41 Am. Rep. 82; Woodbury v. Roberts, 59 Iowa, 348, 13 N. W. 312, 44 Am. Rep. 685; Gilden v. Henry, 104 Ind. 278, 1 N. E. 369, 54 Am. Rep. 316; Mitchell v. St. Mary, 148 Ind. 111, 47 N. E. 224; Second Nat. Bank of Richmond v. Wheeler, 75 Mich. 546, 42 N. W. 993.

The note is nonnegotiable, and the indorsee holds it subject to all the equities, counterclaims, and defenses that existed between the maker (Bolan) and the payee (Uinta Hereford Cattle Company). Eaton & Gilbert on Commercial Paper, § 71, p. 354, and cases cited; 2 A. & E. Ency. (2d Ed.) 253. As to the sufficiency or merit of the defense set up on the alleged guaranty of the live stock and damages claimed, we express no opinion as that question is not properly before us.

The conclusion we have reached on the foregoing questions renders it unnecessary for us to consider or pass upon any of the other assignments of error presented on this appeal. The judgment must be reversed, and it is so ordered, and the cause is remanded to the district court, with direction to permit the parties to amend their pleadings if they so desire, and to grant them a new trial; costs awarded in favor of appellant.

BACON v. RICE.

(Supreme Court of Idaho. Jan. 17, 1908.)

1. PLEADING—ANSWER—CROSS-COMPLAINT.

Under the provisions of section 4188 of the Revised Statutes of 1887 the defendant may, in addition to his answer, file a cross-complaint demanding affirmative relief affecting the property to which the action relates.

2. QUIETING TITLE—CROSS-COMPLAINT.

The sufficiency of a cross-complaint, in an action to quiet title, is determined by the same rules as the sufficiency of the complaint.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 41, Quieting Title, § 80.]

3. SAME.

In an action to quiet title, where a defendant relies upon title in himself, a cross-complaint is not necessary.

5. SAME.

In an action to quiet title, the defendant may put in issue the plaintiff's right to recover by denials alone; but, where he seeks affirmative relief, to have the title quieted in himself as against the plaintiff, it is necessary that he file a cross-complaint.

6. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—WAIVING CONSTITUTIONAL QUESTION—TAXATION—TAX SALE—DEED—IMPEACHMENT.

Where the defendant pleads title by reason of a tax sale and a tax deed issued thereon, and it appears that the law governing the assessment and sale of property for taxes has been substantially complied with, the original owner of the property cannot question the constitutionality of the law under which the sale was made, where he has not been misled, and had permitted the property to be sold for delinquent taxes, and the purchaser to take possession thereof, and pay taxes thereon for a period of 12 years, during which time he has taken no steps to call in question the validity of such sale, or the title acquired thereunder.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from District Court, Fremont County; J. M. Stevens, Judge.

Action by Lemuel J. Rice against Harvey M. Bacon. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Soule & Soule, for appellant. J. D. Millaps, for respondent.

STEWART, J. This is an action brought under the provisions of section 4538 of the Revised Statutes of 1887 of this state, which provides that "an action may be brought by any person against another who claims an estate or interest in real property adverse to him, for the purpose of determining such adverse claim." The complaint is in the ordinary form of an action to quiet title. The plaintiff alleges that for more than 15 years immediately preceding the commencement of the action he has been the owner and in possession of and claims title in fee to the land described; that the defendant claims some estate, right, title, or interest in or to the premises, the nature and extent of which is unknown to the plaintiff, unless it be that the defendant claims the title or interest through and by virtue of a quitclaim deed from one Bird H. Miller and Rose D. Miller, his wife, purporting to convey the premises to the defendant; and the plaintiff alleges that, if defendant claims title through said deed, said Bird H. Miller and Rose D. Miller had no title to said land conveyed or attempted to be conveyed by said quitclaim deed, and that the claim or claims of the defendant are without right or title. To this complaint the defendant answered, denying specifically the allegations of the complaint, except admitting that the defendant claims an estate and title to said premises, and admits that he claims title by virtue of a quitclaim deed from one Bird H. Miller, and denies that Miller had no title to said premises. And for cross-complaint the defendant alleges that said premises were sold at tax sale to the county of Fremont for nonpayment of taxes for the years 1895, 1896, 1897, 1898, 1899, 1900, 1901, 1902, and 1903, and that Fremont county assigned the certificates of tax sale to one Bird H. Miller; that on the 14th day of July, 1905, the assessor and ex officio tax collector of Fremont county made, executed, and delivered to said Bird H. Miller a tax deed to said premises for the delinquent taxes upon said property for the years 1895, 1896, and 1897, and on the same day executed another tax deed to said Bird H. Miller for said premises for the delinquent taxes for the year 1898, and on the 25th day of September, 1905, Bird H. Miller and wife conveyed said premises to this defendant by quitclaim deed. The defendant further alleges that he is the owner of said premises, and has been since the 3d day of October 1905, the date of the delivery of the deed from Bird H. Miller to this defendant, and since which date he has been in the possession, holding and claiming adversely to the plaintiff and adversely to all other persons, the lands and premises described in the pleadings and in the Miller deed; and that at the commencement of this suit the defendant and his grantors for more than five years had been in the quiet and peaceable possession, claiming the same under color of right and title open and notoriously to the plaintiff and all the world, and that defendant paid all the taxes assessed against said premises, and that the plaintiff has no right or title to the same, from which he prays that his title be quieted. To this cross-complaint the plaintiff filed a motion for an order requiring that the defendant make his cross-complaint on file more definite and certain by separating and stating the different causes of action set out, contending that, inasmuch as the cross-complaint sets up several tax-sale certificates and two separate tax deeds, each tax-sale certificate and tax deed constitutes a separate cause of action, and that the cross-complaint should plead a separate cause of action upon each tax certificate and tax deed. The plaintiff also filed a demurrer to the cross-complaint, setting forth practically the same grounds as the motion. Both the motion and the demurrer were overruled by the court.

The appellant assigns as error No. 1 the action of the court in denying the motion of the appellant to require the defendant to make his cross-complaint more definite and certain. Under the provisions of section 4188 of the Revised Statutes of 1887 the defendant may, in addition to his answer, file a cross-complaint demanding affirmative relief affecting the property to which the action relates. The defendant in his cross-complaint was required to state all, but no more, than the plaintiff was required to state in his complaint. The cross-complaint asked for the same relief as the complaint. Its sufficiency is to be determined by the same rules of pleading as the complaint. It was unnecessary in the cross-complaint to set forth the evidence by which the cross-complainant expected to prove his title. He might have contented himself by alleging ownership and possession, and, under such allegations, have proven his title, the same as the plaintiff could prove his title under similar allegations. The defendant has gone further than the law required him to do by stating the proof upon which he based his title. A cross-complaint must, like a complaint, state facts sufficient to entitle the pleader to affirmative relief. Like a complaint, it must itself contain all the requisite facts. Coulthurst v. Coulthurst, 58 Cal. 239; Collins v. Bartlett, 44 Cal. 371; Kreichbaum v. Melton, 49 Cal. 50. In an action to quiet title, where defendant relies upon title in himself, a cross-complaint is not necessary. Miller v. Luco, 80 Cal. 257, 22 Pac. 195; Mining Co. v. Mining Co., 83 Cal. 589, 23 Pac. 1102; Mills v. Fletcher, 100 Cal. 142, 34 Pac. 637. However, in an action to quiet title, where the defendant seeks to enforce an equitable title against the plaintiff as a holder of the legal title, a cross-complaint is proper. Winter v. McMillan, 87 Cal. 256, 25 Pac. 407, 22 Am. St. Rep. 243. In this case the defendant might have put in issue the plaintiff's right to recover by deeds alone. However, if the defendant desired to have title quieted in himself as against the plaintiff, it was necessary that he file a cross-complaint. In the cross-complaint he was not required to state facts any more elaborately than he would have been required to have stated such facts, had the defendant brought an action originally against the plaintiff to quiet title. It was therefore not necessary for the defendant to plead the several tax certificates and tax deeds which he set forth in his cross-complaint, as the same are muniments of title and need not be plead. The cause of action set forth in defendant's cross-complaint was his title or interest in the lands involved. The tax certificates and deeds were the evidence offered to support that interest or title. There was but one cause of action. The court committed no error in overruling the motion and demurrer.

The appellant assigns as error in specifications from 3 to 12, inclusive, the action of the court in admitting in evidence certain tax-sale certificates, contending that under the statute a tax-sale certificate is not admissible for the purpose of establishing title to land. This is correct. Under section 1547 of the Revised Statutes of 1887, as amended by Laws 1890, p. 267, and Laws 1901, p. 276, § 126, the tax-sale certificate vests in the purchaser only a lien for the sum paid. In this case the defendant having alleged in his cross-complaint the sale of the property in controversy for taxes, the issuing of certificates of sale therefor, and the acquisition of the interests covered by such certificates by this defendant, the defendant was entitled to introduce such certificates for the purpose of showing that the plaintiff was not entitled to have his title quieted as against this defendant, without first discharging such lien covered by such tax certificates, and upon that ground alone such tax certificates were admissible in evidence.

The plaintiff, however, contends that, inasmuch as the defendant has plead title under such issue, he could not prove a lien upon the premises in controversy. This contention is not sound. While the defendant alleges title in fee, yet, if in the trial of the case it should develop that he does not own a title in fee, but does own a lien upon the premises which has not been discharged by the plaintiff under the general issue, he could prove such fact, and thereby defeat the plaintiff's right to have his title quieted as against said lien. In this case the tax certificates clearly established a lien, and in no event could the plaintiff recover as against such liens without discharging the same. Brandt v. Thompson, 91 Cal. 458, 27 Pac. 703; De Cazara v. Orena, 80 Cal. 132, 22 Pac. 74.

Error No. 13 specifies the action of the court in admitting in evidence the assignment of the tax-sale certificate by the board of county commissioners of Fremont county to Bird H. Miller. Specifications 14 and 15 relate to the admission in evidence of the two tax deeds. We will discuss these three errors together. The appellant contends that the tax sales were void, therefore the county had no interest to assign to Bird H. Miller, the grantor of the defendant. This argument is based upon the contention that the tax-sale certificates for the years 1895, 1896, 1897, and 1898, and the tax deed issued thereon, show upon their face, first, that the county was a competitive bidder at each of said sales; second, that notice of sale was never published as required by law for either of said sales; third, that they do not show or recite when the purchaser will be entitled to a deed. The first contention is based upon the provisions of section 1539 of the Revised Statutes of 1887, as amended by Laws 1901, p. 274, § 118, which reads: "But in case there is no purchaser in good faith for a portion not less than the whole of the property embraced in any one separate description, the assessor may sell the whole thereof, and if there is then no purchaser on the first day that the property is offered for sale, then when the property is offered thereafter for sale, and there is no purchaser in good faith of the same, the whole amount of the property assessed in any or separate description shall be struck off to the county or the purchaser, and the duplicate certificate delivered to the county treasurer and filed by him in his office." The first tax certificate, which is common as to all, except as to dates, among other things, recites: "After due and legal notice as required by said chapter, on the 9th day of July, 1896, in accordance with law, offered for sale to pay said taxes at public auction, in front of the county courthouse of said county, that at said auction Fremont county was a bidder who was willing to take the least quantity or smallest portion of the interest in said land and pay the taxes, costs, etc., * * * and said property was by me, J. C. Brannan, assessor and tax collector, struck off to the said Fremont county, who paid the full amount of said taxes, etc." The tax deed recites, among other things, the time of publication of the delinquent tax list upon which said sale was based, and also: "And there was no purchaser for the same who was willing to take the least quantity or smallest part of said property and pay said taxes and costs as provided by law, therefore the whole amount of said property was by said assessor, at the proper time and place, struck off to Fremont county," and "that such property was sold subject to redemption within two years from the date of any one of said sales."

The argument of counsel is that under the provisions of section 1539, supra, as amended, the county should have offered said property for sale on one day, and if there was no bidder at such sale, to have waited until the next day before it was again offered or could be purchased by the county. To support this contention, we are cited to a statute of the state of Colorado construed by the Supreme Court of that state. There is a very wide difference between the statutes of Colorado and of this state upon this subject. Sess. Laws Colo. 1879, p. 155, reads: "If there shall be no bid for any tract offered, the treasurer shall pass it over for the time and shall re-offer it at the beginning of the sale next day, until all tracts are sold." The statute of this state, however, does not provide that it shall be first offered, and if not sold, that it may be offered on the next day, and the county may become the purchaser.

The statute of this state provides "that the assessor may sell the whole thereof, and if there is then no purchaser on the first day that the property is offered for sale, then when the property is offered thereafter for sale and there is no purchaser, the same may be struck off to the county." In other words, this statute requires the assessor to first offer the property generally, and if there is no offer to purchase, then he may again offer the property upon the same day or, at any time subsequent to the first offer, and if there be no purchaser, then the same may be struck off to the county. We think it sufficiently appears from the certificates of tax sale and the deed that this course was substantially pursued in the sales covered by said certificates, and that the county was not a competitive bidder.

The contention that the notice of sale for delinquent taxes, and that the certificates do not show when the purchaser will be entitled to a deed, may be considered together, and are based upon the contention that, while it is true, that the first tax sale was regular, and the certificate issued in accordance with the law, as it appeared upon the statute books, and that the deed was regular and made in accordance with the law as it appeared on the statute books, yet, inasmuch as the certificates and deed show upon their face that the sale was conducted, and such certificate and deed issued under the provision of section 1530 of the Revised Statutes of 1887 of this state, as amended by Laws 1895, p. 101, and Rev. St. 1887, § 1532, as amended by Laws 1891, p. 235, the charge is made that such amendatory acts have not been passed as required by the Constitution of this state, therefore the sale and deed are void, and the defendant acquired no title to said property.

Counsel also contends that the deeds are void for the reason that the property was sold subject to redemption within two years from date of sale, as provided by the amendment of section 1548, p. 101, Laws 1895, while the original section before amendment allows one year from the date of purchase for redemption, and that said amendment was not passed according to the requirements of the Constitution.

Rev. St. 1887, § 1544, provides: "After receiving the amount of the taxes and costs, the collector must make out in duplicate a certificate, dated on the day of sale, stating (when known) the name of the person assessed, a description of the land sold, the amount paid therefor, that it was sold for taxes, giving the amount and year of the assessment, and specifying the time when the purchaser will be entitled to a deed."

Rev. St. 1887, § 1555, provides: "The matters recited in the certificate of sale must be recited in the deed, and such deed, duly acknowledged or proved, is prima facie evidence that: (1) The property was assessed as required by law; (2) the property was equalized as required by law; (3) the taxes were levied in accordance with law; (4) the taxes were not paid; (5) at a proper time and place the property was sold as prescribed by law, and by the proper officer; (6) the property was not redeemed; (7) the person who executed the deed was the proper officer; (8) where the real estate was sold to pay taxes on personal property, that the real estate belonged to the person liable to pay the tax."

And Rev. St. 1887, § 1556, provides: "Such deed duly acknowledged or proved is (except as against actual fraud) conclusive evidence of the regularity of all other proceedings, from the assessment by the assessor, inclusive, up to the execution of the deed."

It will thus be seen that the tax certificate and tax deed to which objection is made recite facts which it was not necessary to recite in either. The statute makes certain matters in the deed prima facie evidence of certain facts, and conclusive evidence as to certain other facts, and requires the deed to recite the matters required to be recited in the certificate of sale. But, assuming that under the recitals in the tax certificate and deed the officers acted under the authority of the amendatory acts, which counsel claim are unconstitutional, yet we do not believe that the appellant is in a position to question the constitutionality of such acts. It will be observed that this property was assessed for taxes in the year 1895, and that it was sold in July, 1896, for the delinquent taxes for the year 1895. It was appellant's duty to bear his share of the burdens of taxation. He knew what the law was. He knew that his property was subject to taxation. He knew that taxes became delinquent once a year, yet from the year 1895 until after this action was commenced the appellant gave no attention whatever to the duty imposed upon him to discharge his share of the burdens of taxation. From the evidence it appears that he made no inquiry about the taxes, that he never offered any payment, and that he never ascertained whether the property had been sold. He permitted others to pay the taxes. He stood by and permitted a tax deed to be issued in 1905 for the delinquent taxes for the year 1895. From 1895 up until this suit was commenced, August 6, 1906, the plaintiff exercised no fixed, specific ownership over the property in controversy. His possession was casual and questionable, and after the execution of the tax deed in 1905 the defendant appears to have been in possession, and long before that the plaintiff's possession was divided with others.

Under all the facts in this case we are clearly of the opinion that the appellant is not in a position to raise the constitutionality of the acts in question. The appellant is certainly guilty of such laches in paying his taxes and asserting his right and ownership to this property that he should not now be permitted to come into a court of equity and ask that such silence be permitted to inure to his benefit. What constitutes laches depends upon the circumstances of each case. No arbitrary rule exists, and it is for the courts to determine from all the facts and circumstances surrounding each particular case whether or not the party is guilty of laches. 16 Cyc. 152. Sayers v. Burkhardt, 85 Fed. 246, 29 C. C. A. 137. As was said by the Supreme Court of Illinois in the case of Oakley v. Hurlbut, 100 Ill. 204, where the owner of property suffers the same to be sold for taxes, and the purchaser takes possession and pays taxes for the period of 12 years, the owner will not be heard to allege under such circumstances that he was injured in that way. In this case the respondent and his grantor have paid the taxes from 1895 to the commencement of this suit, and the appellant has never paid one cent of taxes. A person may by his own acts, or by his own omission to act, waive a right which he might otherwise have under the provisions of the Constitution. 8 Cyc. 791. The certificate of sale issued in July, 1896, for the delinquent taxes for the year 1895 is not void, and the deed made in April, 1905, upon said tax sale certificate, even though the tax deed covers sales for other years, would not for that reason be void. While it is true that after property has once been sold for delinquent taxes to the county, it cannot again be offered for sale during the period of redemption, still if the sale in 1896 was valid, and the deed issued thereon is valid, it is immaterial whether the subsequent sales are valid or not. The grantee's title would be complete under the sale made in 1896 for the delinquent taxes for the year 1895, and the deed issued thereon. In the case of the Co-operative Savings & Loan Ass'n v. Green, 5 Idaho, 660, 51 Pac. 770, this court, speaking through Justice Sullivan, says: "Substantial compliance with the requirements of the law in making assessment is all that is necessary. If property is subject to taxation, it cannot escape through some technical failure of the officer to perform his duty, unless it has actually misled the party to his injury."

The appellant not being in a position to question the regularity of the passage of the amendatory acts under which the tax sale was held and the certificate and deed issued, and the law having been substantially complied with, and it appearing that the appellant has in no way been misled, we are clearly of the opinion that he should not escape the provisions of the law as to the taxation of his property and the divestment of title thereunder. The law having been substantially complied with, and the sale of 1896 for the delinquent taxes for 1895 being valid, the court committed no error in holding that the plaintiff had been divested of his title to said property.

The judgment of the lower court will be affirmed with costs.

STATE ex rel. THOMPSON v. BOARD OF DENTAL EXAMINERS OF WASH-INGTON et al.

(Supreme Court of Washington. Jan. 15, 1908.)

PHYSICIANS AND SURGEONS — DENTISTRY — PRACTICE—REGULATIONS.

3 Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St. § 3025 [Pierce's Code, § 4467], requiring any person desiring to practice dentistry to take an examination before the state board of dental examiners, and providing that no person shall be eligible for such examination unless he presents a diploma from some dental college, is not invalid on the ground that the requirement for both diploma and examination is unreasonable, the right to determine what requirements must be met by an applicant being within the exclusive province of the Legislature.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 39, Physicians and Surgeons, § 1.]

Appeal from Superior Court, King County;
R. B. Albertson, Judge.

Mandamus by the state, on the relation of E. G. Thompson, against the Board of Dental Examiners of Washington and others, to compel the issuance of a license to practice dentistry in the event relator successfully passes an examination. From a judgment of dismissal, relator appeals. Affirmed.

John R. Parker and Edwin J. Brown, for appellant. Walter M. Harvey, for respondents.

CROW, J. E. G. Thompson, as relator, made application to the superior court of King county for a writ of mandamus to compel W. A. Fishburn, C. S. Irwin, F. R. Fisk, H. B. Brand, and E. B. Edgars, the State Board of Dental Examiners, to examine him touching his qualifications to practice dentistry in the state of Washington, and to further compel such board to issue to him a license to practice dentistry in the event that he successfully passes such examination. The defendants interposed a demurrer to his affidavit, which was sustained by the trial court. Thereupon the relator declined to plead further, and an order of dismissal was entered, from which he has appealed.

It is not necessary to state the allegations of the affidavit upon which the appellant based his application for the writ, as the only defect sought to be reached by the demurrer was appellant's failure to allege that when he filed his application, paid his fee, and presented himself for examination, he also presented to the respondents his diploma from some dental college in good standing, with satisfactory evidence of his rightful possession of the same. It is not contended by the respondents that appellant's affidavit is defective for the want of any other allegation, and for the purposes of this case it is conceded that he has no such diploma. Section 3025, 3 Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St. (section 4467, Pierce's Code), provides that: "Any person or persons seeking to practice dentistry in the state of Washington * * * after the passage of this act shall file his or her name, together with an application for examination, with the secretary of the State Board of Dental Examiners, and at the time of making such application shall pay to the secretary of the board a fee of twenty-five dollars, and to present him or herself at the first regular meeting thereafter of said board to undergo examination before that body. No persons shall be eligible for such examination unless he or she shall be of good moral character and shall present to said board his or her diploma from some dental college in good standing and shall give satisfactory evidence of his or her rightful possession of the same. * * *

The appellant's only contention is that the provision of the above section requiring him to present his diploma as a condition precedent to taking the examination is unconstitutional and void. He has alleged that he has sufficient skill, learning, and experience to enable him to pass any reasonable or proper examination and fit him for the practice of dentistry. He does not question the right of the state to regulate the practice of dentistry, and thereby protect the public from ignorant and incompetent persons who may wrongfully and fraudulently announce themselves as qualified and skillful practitioners. In fact, he substantially concedes that the Legislature may, by reasonable enactments, provide appropriate regulations under which only such persons as are competent may be authorized to practice. Appellant's apparent position is that, while a valid statute might be enacted requiring him to either pass an examination or present a diploma from some dental college in good standing, it cannot compel him to do both without invading his constitutional rights. In other words, he contends that, if he has, as admitted by the demurrer, sufficient skill and knowledge to fit him for the practice, and is able and willing to pass the examination, he cannot also be required to present a diploma to the board as a condition precedent to being permitted to take such examination. The statute makes the same requirements of all applicants for examination. No favored or preferred classes are created or recognized. An applicant who holds a diploma must also pass the examination. Rightful possession of his diploma does not of itself authorize him to practice, or entitle him to a license. The requirement for both diploma and examination as a test of knowledge and skill is not such an unreasonable or arbitrary one as to invalidate the statute. The right to determine what requirements must be met by an applicant is within the exclusive province of the Legislature. This statute was considered in the case of In re Thompson, 36 Wash. 377, 78 Pac. 899, in which it was attacked as unconstitutional, and sustained by this court. Without further discussion, we now adhere to the ruling then made. The appellant contends that case is not in point on the question now presented, but we fall to see any substantial distinction in the principles involved.

The judgment is affirmed.

2. MASTER AND SERVANT—INDEPENDENT CONTRACTOR—EXISTENCE OF RELATION.

Evidence held to support a finding that an individual was not an independent contractor and the employer was liable to an employé for injuries resulting from the individual's negligence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Skagit County; George A. Joiner, Judge.

Action by Gus Johnson against the Great Northern Lumber Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Kerr & McCord, for appellant.

FULLERTON, J. The respondent brought this action to recover for personal injuries, received by him while in the employ of the appellant, and which he alleges were caused by the negligent acts of persons for whose acts the appellant is responsible. The undisputed evidence is that the appellant was engaged in the operation of a sawmill, and that the respondent was one of its employes; that the appellant desired to enlarge its mill, and employed one Veratt to excavate some earth and rock that were in the way of the installation of some additional boilers; that Veratt undertook to remove the rock by blasting, and in so doing fired a blast without notice to respondent and while respondent was in the mill adjoining engaged in his usual occupation; that the blast threw great quantities of the broken rock into the air, some of which came down through the roof of the mill and struck the respondent, severely and permanently injuring him. The appellant defended on the ground, among others, that Veratt was an independent contractor, and that the negligence which caused the respondent's injury, if any negligence there was, was Veratt's negligence, for which Veratt alone is responsible, and for which the appellant is not liable. The appellant's superintendent testified that he made the contract for removing the rock with Veratt, and that the contract was to the effect that Veratt should do the work on his own responsibility, being responsible to the appellant only for its results. At the conclusion of the case the appellant challenged the sufficiency of the evidence, and moved the court to discharge the jury and enter judgment in favor of the appellant. The challenge and motion were denied, and the cause was submitted to the jury under an instruction to the effect that if they found that Veratt was an independent contractor the appellant was not responsible for any injury occurring because of his negligent acts. The jury returned a verdict in favor of the respondent for $3,000, on which judgment was afterwards entered, and this appeal was taken from the judgment so entered.

The appellant contends that there was no contradiction, either directly or indirectly, of the evidence on its part tending to show that Veratt was an independent contractor, and that in consequence the court erred in submitting the question to the determination of the jury, and that it is entitled for that reason to a reversal of the judgment by this court, with a direction to the court below to enter judgment in its favor. The appellant does not complain that there was any error in the court's instruction defining an independent contractor. On the contrary, it quotes the instruction in its brief in full, and expressly states in its comment thereon that it correctly states the law. It bases its claim of error entirely on the fact that its evidence on this particular point was wholly uncontradicted. But it seems to us that, if we concede that the appellant's witness did testify to facts sufficient to show that Veratt was an independent contractor, and that there is nothing on the face of the record that directly contradicts him, it still would be going too far for this court to reverse the cause, and direct a judgment in favor of the appellant.

There still remains the question of the credibility of the witness. This was a question peculiarly within the province of the lower court and the jury to determine. They had the witness before them. They could observe his conduct upon the witness stand, his apparent frankness or lack of frankness, and his demeanor generally. These matters are not depicted in the record, and this court is without opportunity to know how far the witness' credibility was affected by them. When, therefore, the trial judge and the jury both find that his evidence was not sufficient to overcome the case made by the respondent, this court ought not to interfere with their finding. But we think the record itself discloses matters that suggest, to say the least, the improbability of the witness' story. The contract as related by the witness was singularly incomplete. The contract provided that the appellant should furnish the powder, the tools, and such helpers as Veratt might require in the performance of the work at its own cost and expense, and fixed Veratt's compensation at a given sum, yet it placed no limitation whatever on the quantity of powder, the character of the tools, or the number of helpers Veratt might lawfully exact under it. It provided also that Veratt might hire and discharge his helpers, but was silent as to the wages he might lawfully contract on the appellant's behalf to pay them. It may be that in a contract of this nature a reasonable limitation would be implied as to the matters not expressly stipulated for, but this does not meet the point. The lack of agreement in matters so essential tends to impeach the good faith of the contract. It leads to the conclusion that it was either a mere subterfuge to avoid liability on the part of the appellant, or that it was an afterthought on the part of the witness. Veratt was dead at the time of the trial, but it is in the record that he had no very high regard of the obligation he assumed by virtue of the contract. He worked on the job at most only a day and a half before the accident, and quit the morning after.

But it is needless to discuss the matter further. The judgment should be affirmed, and it will be so ordered.

McCart v. RACINE WOOLEN MILLS, BLAKE & CO.

(Supreme Court of Washington. Jan. 17, 1908.)

APPEAL—CONTENTS OF RECORD—AFFIDAVITS.

An appeal from an order quashing service of summons, the order being based on conflicting affidavits, must be dismissed, where the affidavits are not taken to the Supreme Court by a bill of exceptions or a statement of facts as required by statute; it being insufficient to have the affidavits certified by the clerk as a part of the transcript and to procure a certificate of the judge below that the affidavits were presented to, and examined and passed upon, by the court at the hearing of the motion to quash.

Appeal from Superior Court, Spokane County; Miles Poindexter, Judge.

Action by Thomas McCart against the Racine Woollen Mills, Blake & Company. From an order quashing the service of summons, plaintiff appeals. Appeal dismissed.

S. P. Domer, for appellant. Henley & Kelam, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal from an order quashing the service of summons. The notice to quash was heard on affidavits which accompanied the motion, affidavits in answer thereto, and affidavits in reply to the answering affidavits. The respondent moves to dismiss the appeal. The motion must be granted. This court has repeatedly held that it cannot review a question of fact, based upon affidavits, unless the affidavits are brought before the court by the method provided by law for bringing evidence into this court. This was not done in this case. The appellant caused the affidavits to be certified by the clerk as a part of the transcript, and procured a certificate of the judge certifying that the affidavits were "presented to the court, and examined, and passed upon by the court at the hearing of said motion," but this does not comply with the statute. The statute requires that evidence be brought into this court by a bill of exceptions or a statement of facts. Jacobson v. Lunn, 16 Wash. 487, 48 Pac. 237; *State v. RENARD et al. v. CITY OF SPOKANE.

(Supreme Court of Washington. Jan. 20, 1908.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — STREET IMPROVEMENTS — SPECIAL ASSESSMENTS — OBJECTIONS — SCOPE — REVIEW.

Objections to a special assessment for street improvement, that the improvement made differed materially from that petitioned for, and that the wives of the petitioners did not sign with their husbands where community property was involved, affected only the regularity of the proceedings in ordering the improvement, and the regularity of the assessment, and not the jurisdiction of the city council to order the improvement or levy the assessment, and could not be reviewed, unless proper written objections were filed, as required by Laws 1901, p. 240, c. 118, § 2.

2. SAME — RIGHT OF APPEAL — LIMITATION.

The right of appeal from a special assessment for street improvement is purely statutory, and is limited to those who have filed objections to the assessment roll before the city council, as required by Laws 1901, p. 240, c. 118, § 2.

3. SAME — PROTEST TO PROPOSED IMPROVEMENT.

A protest, filed with a city council against a proposed improvement nearly two months before the assessment roll was filed with the city clerk, could not be considered as objections to the assessment roll, required to be filed before the roll is confirmed by the city council by Laws 1901, p. 240, c. 118, § 2, in order to authorize a review of such objections by the court, nor were oral objections made at the hearing available for that purpose, the statutory provision requiring written objections being mandatory.

Appeal from Superior Court, Spokane County; Henry L. Kennan, Judge.

Special assessment proceedings by the city of Spokane against Charles W. Renard and others. From an order of the city council confirming the assessment, objectors appealed to the superior court, where the assessment was sustained, and objectors appeal. Affirmed.

Hamblen, Lund & Gilbert, for appellants. J. M. Geraghty and Alex. M. Winston, for respondent.

RUDKIN, J. On the 11th day of July, 1903, property owners on Spofford avenue, in the city of Spokane, petitioned the city council for the improvement of that avenue between certain points by grading, parking, and sidewalk. The petition contained the following specification as to the character of the work: "The grade through the rock cut on said Spofford avenue to be made 30 feet wide, 20 feet between curb, and 5 feet on each side of sidewalk, the grade to be put as far south as property line." On February 2, 1904, the city council, purporting to act on this petition, passed an ordinance creating an assessment district, approving plans and specifications directing the letting of a contract for the work, and levying an assessment to defray the expenses thereof. On the 8th day of April, 1904, certain property owners on the avenue, including the appellants herein, filed a protest with the city council against the improvement of the street in accordance with the plans prepared by the city engineer, for the reason that the plans provided for a driveway 40 feet in width through the rock cut, instead of 30 feet as called for by the property owners' petition, and for the further reason that the cost of the improvement was not to exceed $3,600, whereas the estimated cost of the proposed improvement was $5,307.90. The assessment roll on which the present appeal is based was filed with the city clerk on the 23d day of May, 1904, notice of the filing was published on May 26, 1904, and the time for hearing objections fixed for June 28, 1904. The ordinance confirming the assessment roll was approved September 20, 1904, and thereupon the appellants here appealed to the superior court. The two objections urged in that court were that the improvement made differed materially from the improvement petitioned for, and that the wives of the petitioners did not sign with their husbands where community property was involved. The court confirmed the assessment, and from its judgment in that regard the present appeal is prosecuted.

At the threshold of the proceeding the appellants are met with the objection that there is nothing before this court for review, for the reason that the appellants filed no written objections to the assessment roll before the city council, as required by section 2 of the act of March 16, 1901 (Laws 1901, p. 240, c. 118). That section provides as follows: "Whenever any assessment roll for local improvements shall have been prepared as provided by law, charter or ordinance of any city of the first class, and such assessment roll shall have been confirmed by the council or legislative body of such city after due and proper notice to the property owner as provided by law, charter or ordinance so that said owners of property may have a reasonable opportunity to object to or protest against any assessment the regularity and correctness of the proceedings to order said improvement, and the regularity, validity and correctness of said assessment cannot in any manner be contested or questioned in any proceeding whatsoever by any person not filing written objections to such roll, prior to the same being confirmed, as aforesaid, and at such time or times as may be prescribed by the charter or ordinance." It seems manifest that the objections now urged go to the regularity and correctness of the proceedings in ordering the improvement and to the regularity, validity, and correctness of the assessment, and cannot be reviewed by the courts, unless proper written objections were filed. Annie Wright Seminary v. Tacoma, 23 Wash. 109, 62 Pac. 444; McNamee v. Tacoma, 24 Wash. 591, 64 Pac. 791; Potter v. Whatcom, 25 Wash. 207, 65 Pac. 197; Young v. Tacoma, 31 Wash. 153, 71 Pac. 742; Ferry v. Tacoma, 34 Wash. 652, 76 Pac. 277; Alexander v. Tacoma, 35 Wash. 366, 77 Pac. 636; Aberdeen v. Lucas, 37 Wash. 190, 79 Pac. 632.

It may be, as contended by the appellants, that objections going to the jurisdiction of the city council to order the improvement or levy the assessment are not waived by failing to file written objections, but the objections under consideration go merely to the regularity of the proceedings in ordering the improvement, and are not of a jurisdictional character. But if we are in error in this, nevertheless the right of appeal in these cases is purely statutory, and is limited to those who have filed objections against the assessment roll before the city council. Manifestly the protest filed with the city council against the proposed improvement nearly two months before the assessment roll was filed with the city clerk cannot be considered as objections to the assessment roll, and the oral objections made at the hearing were utterly insufficient in both form and substance. Furthermore, inasmuch as the written objections are made the basis of the hearing before the city council and in the courts, the requirement of the statute that they shall be in writing is mandatory.

The judgment of the court below must therefore be affirmed.

McOWEN v. SEATTLE ELECTRIC CO.

(Supreme Court of Washington. Jan. 24, 1908.)

NEW TRIAL—EXCESSIVE VERDICT—REMISSION.

Where a verdict in an action for injuries was excessive, the court was justified in granting defendant a new trial, unless plaintiff consented to a substantial remission.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 37, New Trial, §§ 324-329.]

Appeal from Superior Court, King County; John B. Yaker, Judge.

Action by Charles J. McOwen against the Seattle Electric Company. A verdict having been returned for plaintiff, the court granted a new trial, unless plaintiff would remit all sums in excess of $6,544, and from the order granting a new trial he appeals. Affirmed.

Casey & Casey and Graves, Palmer & Murphy, for appellant. Hughes, McMicken, Dovell & Ramsey, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This was an action to recover damages for personal injuries resulting from a collision between two street cars operated by the defendant company. The amount of the damage to which the plaintiff was entitled was the only issue in the case. The jury returned a verdict in his favor in the sum of $25,544; but on motion of the defendant the court granted a new trial, unless the plaintiff would remit from the verdict all sums in excess of $6,544. The plaintiff refused to remit, and a new trial was ordered. From this order the plaintiff has appealed.

Taking the view of the testimony most favorable to the appellant, both as to the extent of his injuries and as to the impairment of his earning capacity, we are convinced that the verdict of the jury was excessive, and that the court was amply justified in granting a new trial, unless a substantial remission from the verdict was made. In view of a retrial of the case, we deem it improper to determine at this time whether the verdict as reduced by the trial court was too large or too small, and refrain from expressing any opinion on that question; but, finding no error in the record, the judgment is affirmed.

VENDOR AND PURCHASER — BONA FIDE PURCHASER—RESERVATIONS—NOTICE.

Where defendants, on purchasing certain land in controversy, had notice of a reservation of the timber from recitals of a deed under which they claimed, and from other sources, they were not entitled to rely on a recital in such deed as to the time within which the owners of the timber were required to remove the same, which was much shorter than that specified in the contract of sale reserving the timber, but were bound to make inquiry with reference thereto, and were therefore charged with notice that the owners of the timber were not required to remove within the time specified in the deed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Cowlitz County; W. W. McCredie, Judge.

Action by Gustav Peterson and others against F. Weist and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

M. A. Langhorne and Forney & Ponder, for appellants. Thos. N. Strong, for respondents.

RUDKIN, J. Some time prior to the 11th day of February, 1897, John Baxter and wife agreed to convey the premises now in controversy to T. J. Johnson and Samuel Strom, in consideration of the sum of $450 to be thereafter paid, reserving, however, all timber growing on the land. On February 11, 1897, Baxter and wife sold all the timber reserved, except the cedar, to A. C. Mowrey, allowing 12 years from date of sale for the removal of the timber. On December 18, 1901, Baxter and wife, having received payment of the purchase price, conveyed to Johnson and Strom their deed containing the following reservation clause: "Saving and reserving therefrom all the timber of every kind and character now thereon, except cedar, reserving also the right to pass over the premises wherever necessary to remove the timber herein reserved; possession to be given of the timber and roads when A. C. Mowrey's time is up upon the timber; viz.: 3 years from Feb. 10, 1902." Johnson, one of the grantees named in the above deed, conveyed to the plaintiff Alex Peterson on June 3, 1902, and Strom, the other grantee, to the plaintiff G. V. Peterson on March 28, 1906. The defendants are the officers and employees of the successor in interest of Mowrey and wife in the timber contract. The deed from Baxter and wife to Johnson and Strom was filed for record February 13, 1906; the deed from Johnson to Alex Peterson on January 9, 1903; the deed from Strom to G. V. Peterson on September 19, 1906; and the timber contract from Baxter and wife to Mowrey and the assignment thereof on February 23, 1903. The present action was brought to enjoin the defendants from removing timber from the land under the Mowrey contract. The only issue in the case was whether the plaintiffs were bona fide purchasers for value and without notice of the sale of the timber, or rather of the time allowed for its removal. The court below found that at the time of their purchase the plaintiffs had full notice and knowledge of the sale of the timber and of the time allowed for its removal, and entered judgment dismissing the action. From this judgment, the plaintiffs have appealed.

The judgment appealed from is manifestly right. "It is a well-settled rule that, where a purchaser has knowledge or information of facts which are sufficient to put an ordinarily prudent man upon inquiry, and the inquiry, if followed with reasonable diligence, would lead to the discovery of defects in the title or of equitable rights of others affecting the property in question, the purchaser will be held chargeable with knowledge thereof, and will not be heard to say that he did not actually know of them. In other words, knowledge of facts sufficient to excite inquiry is constructive notice of all that the inquiry would have disclosed." 23 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law (2d Ed.) p. 495. Mann v. Young, 1 Wash. T. 454; Wickham v. Sprague, 18 Wash. 466, 51 Pac. 1055; Deering v. Holcomb, 26 Wash. 588, 67 Pac. 240, 561; Rattelmiller v. Stone, 28 Wash. 104, 68 Pac. 168. Here the appellants had notice of the reservation of the timber from the recitals in the deed through which they claimed and from other sources, but claim they had no notice of the time allowed for its removal, except the notice conveyed by the recital in the Baxter deed, which was three years from February 10, 1902. If they had no notice of the time allowed for the removal of the timber, it was solely because they made no inquiry. They could not blindly rely on the statement of their vendors (Foster, Neville & Co. v. Stallworth, 62 Ala. 547), and they made no inquiry from any other source. In fact, they made no inquiry of their vendors, but relied on the recital contained in the deed transmitted to them through the mail. We think the court was amply warranted in finding that the appellants had actual notice of all of the facts, including the time allowed for the removal of the timber, but the recital in the deed under which they claimed was sufficient of itself to excite inquiry, which, if followed up, would lead to notice.

There is no error in the record, and the judgment of the court below is affirmed.

MCMILLAN v. WALKER et al.

(Supreme Court of Washington. Jan. 20, 1908.)

1. JUDGMENT—AS EVIDENCE OF TITLE.

Where, in unlawful detainer, plaintiff claimed title through conveyances from one adjudged the owner thereof in an action involving title, and through a mortgage foreclosure, and the proceedings in either action vested the legal title in plaintiff, without barring equities of defendant, the records in the actions were admissible, though defendant was not a party to the actions.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 30, Judgment, § 1233.]

2. ADVERSE POSSESSION—PAYMENT OF TAXES.

A remote grantor, under whom plaintiff claimed, was the owner of the legal title until April, 1906. He attained his majority in February, 1901. Defendant claimed under a purchase from a third person in 1880, but his evidence was insufficient to establish any claim in the property. He failed to prove that he had paid any taxes on the premises. Held, that defendant's plea of the 10-year statute of limitations was not supported.

Appeal from Superior Court, Lincoln County; W. T. Warren, Judge.

Action by H. H. McMillan against Chas. W. Walker and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant Chas. W. Walker appeals. Affirmed.

J. T. Mulligan and Martin & Wilson, for appellant. Neal, Sessions & Myers, (H. A. P. Myers, of counsel), for respondent.

RUDKIN, J. This was an action of unlawful detainer commenced under section 5549, Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St. In the abstract appended to the complaint the plaintiff de-rails his title as follows: (1) By patent from the United States to Alice Sutherlin; (2) by decree of the superior court of Lincoln county in an action entitled Edmund Sutherlin v. Alice Sutherlin, adjudging that the plaintiff, Edmund Sutherlin, was the owner of said premises, and that the defendant, Alice Sutherlin, had no right, title, or interest therein; (3) by deed from Edmund Sutherlin and wife to Joseph Sessions; (4) by deed from Joseph Sessions and wife to the plaintiff herein; (5) by sheriff's deed, executed to the plaintiff herein, on foreclosure of a mortgage given by Alice Sutherlin on the 23d day of September, 1890. The answer consisted of a denial of the plaintiff's title, and pleas of the 10-year statute of limitations, the 7-year statute of limitations, and fee-simple title in the defendant Walker. At the close of the testimony the court below discharged the jury, and directed a judgment in favor of the plaintiff. From that judgment, the defendant Walker has appealed.

The appellant first contends that the court erred in admitting in evidence the records in the mortgage foreclosure, and in the action of Sutherlin v. Sutherlin, above referred to, because he was not made a party to either of said actions. In so far as the mortgage foreclosure is concerned, we deem it sufficient to say that the appellant claimed under paramount title, and was neither a necessary nor proper party to that action. The proceedings in either action were ample to vest the legal title in the respondent, and no claim is made that the judgments barred or cut off any claims or equities of the appellant. The respondent having shown a clear legal title, the judgment of the court below is free from error, unless the appellant established one or more of his affirmative defenses. The plea of the 10-year statute of limitations is disposed of in what was said by this court in May v. Sutherlin, 41 Wash. 609, 84 Pac. 585, involving this same land. Edmund Sutherlin, under whom the respondent claims, was the owner of the legal title until the 2d day of April, 1906. He did not attain his majority until the 28th of February, 1901, and until that date the 10-year statute of limitations did not commence to run. The appellant utterly failed to prove that he paid any taxes whatever on the premises. He testified that he tried to keep the taxes up, and that Mr. May paid them for quite a while during the hard times, at his request; but there was no evidence upon which the court or jury could find that taxes had been paid by the appellant, or at his request, for any year or series of years. The testimony of the appellant tending to show that he purchased the property from Alice Sutherlin in the year 1890 was contradictory and evasive. It was utterly insufficient to establish any claim or title in real property, and the court below properly so ruled. The record in this cause shows that the title to this land has been in litigation for more than 16 years. As soon as one claimant is defeated another turns up asserting some claim under a defendant in some former action. We fully agree with the court below that this litigation should end, at least until some more substantial and meritorious claim is asserted against the property.

The judgment of the court below is affirmed.

STATE v. SERIGHT.

(Supreme Court of Washington. Jan. 17, 1908.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW — DISMISSAL OF PROSECUTION FOR DELAY—TIME FOR MOTION.

The right to have a criminal prosecution dismissed because the information was not filed within 30 days after accused was bound over to answer, under the statute providing that, if an information be not filed or indictment found against a person held for crime within 30 days after the order holding the person is made, the court must order the prosecution dismissed, etc., is waived, if not exercised before or at the time accused is called upon to plead, and the motion to dismiss comes too late when made at the beginning of the trial.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 14, Criminal Law, §§ 1297-1304, 1375.]

2. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION—DISMISSAL FOR FAILURE TO FILE—EFFECT—FILING NEW INFORMATION.

The dismissal of a prosecution because of failure to file an information within 30 days after accused had been held to answer, as is expressly provided by statute, does not operate as a bar to another prosecution for the same offense, nor does a discharge compel the prosecuting officer to commence anew before a committing magistrate, but he may file an information in the court before which accused was bound over, compelling him to appear at once upon the dismissal of the original proceeding.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 27, Indictment and Information, § 156.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Spokane County; Wm. A. Huneke, Judge.

Edna Seright was convicted of aiding and assisting a person to commit rape, and appeals. Affirmed.

Nuzum & Nuzum, for appellant. R. M. Barnhart and A. J. Laughon, for the State.

FULLERTON, J. The appellant was informed against, tried, and convicted for aiding and assisting one John Grim in the commission of the crime of rape. From the sentence pronounced against her she appeals. It appears that the appellant was first arrested on October 17, 1906, on a warrant issued by a committing magistrate. An examination was held on the charge on October 17, 1906, at which time the magistrate found that there was reasonable cause to believe her guilty of the crime charged, and bound her over to answer to the superior court of Spokane county whenever the same should be prosecuted, ordering her to enter into a recognizance with sufficient sureties for her appearance therein in a penal sum named, and stand committed until such recognizance was furnished. She did not enter into the recognizance, and was committed to the county jail. An information was filed against her in the superior court on January 5, 1907. At that time she was brought before the court, arraigned on the information, and asked if she was ready to plead thereto. Thereupon she pleaded not guilty, and the cause was set down to be tried on January 14, 1907. On that day the court continued the cause until January 17, 1907. On January 17th, she filed a motion asking that the cause be dismissed because the information was not filed against her within 30 days after she had been held to answer. The motion was denied, whereupon a trial was had, with the result before stated. The ruling of the court on the motion to dismiss constitutes the only error assigned on this appeal.

The statute relating to persons held to answer to a criminal charge provides that, if an indictment be not found or an information filed against a person so held within 30 days after the time the order holding the person is made, "the court must order the prosecution dismissed, unless good cause to the contrary be shown." It is the appellant's contention that the failure to find an indictment or file an information within the time prescribed subjects the prosecution to a dismissal whenever a motion is made therefor, no matter at what stage of the case, or what proceeding may have intervened between the filing of the indictment or information and the time of the notice, unless the state at the time the motion is made shows good cause for the delay. But we think this not the true meaning of the statute. Unquestionably a person bound over to answer to a criminal charge may, after 30 days from that time, have the proceedings dismissed on motion, if no indictment is found or information filed against him, unless good cause for the delay be shown, and this right continues until the actual finding of the indictment or filing of the information, and it may be that the right exists when the defendant is called upon to plead to an indictment found or information filed after the 30 days, but the right is waived, if not exercised before or at the time he is so called upon to plead. This follows from the nature and purpose of the statute itself. It is manifest that its sole purpose was to procure for the accused a speedy trial, to enable him to compel the prosecuting officer to proceed against him within the time fixed, or else dismiss the proceedings brought against him. But a dismissal under such circumstances does not operate as a bar to another prosecution for the same offense, nor would a discharge compel the prosecuting officer to commence anew before a committing magistrate. On the contrary the prosecuting attorney may file such an information in the court before which he was bound over to appear at once upon the dismissal of the original proceeding without violating any of the accused's rights. There would be little reason, then, in holding the statute mandatory in the sense that the original lapse entitled the defendant to a dismissal at any stage of the proceedings he might ask for it. If he can exercise the right just before the trial, so he may during the trial, and after a verdict of the jury finding him guilty. This would be to give the statute an effect directly opposite to that the Legislature intended it should have. It would make it a means of delaying the final disposition of the case, when it was intended to hasten that event.

The motion, therefore, came too late, and the court did not err in refusing to grant it. The judgment is affirmed.

LANHAM et ux. v. WENATCHEE CANAL CO.

(Supreme Court of Washington. Jan. 20, 1908.)

1. WATERS — IRRIGATION — CONTRACTS — CONSTRUCTION.

Under an agreement by which defendant sold to plaintiffs a perpetual right to use a certain amount of water from defendant's irrigation system, and plaintiffs were to have the right to raise such part of the amount of water conveyed by pump or otherwise as they might desire for the purpose of irrigating part of their land lying above the grade of defendant's main canal, plaintiffs were not entitled to water from the ditch of another company in which defendant was a stockholder for the purpose of irrigating that part of their land.

2. SAME — PAROL LICENSE — RIGHT TO REVOKE.

The fact that plaintiffs were permitted to take water from the ditch owned by the other company until they could arrange to pump water from defendant's canal would not prevent defendant from revoking the permission which was granted as a mere accommodation, even if it amounted to a parol license.

3. INJUNCTION — TEMPORARY MANDATORY INJUNCTION — NECESSARY CONDITIONS.

If a mandatory injunction may issue at all before final hearing, it is only where plaintiff's right to the relief is clear and certain.

Action by Z. A. Lanham and wife against the Wenatchee Canal Company for a mandatory injunction requiring defendant to deliver water to plaintiffs' land through a certain ditch. From an order granting a temporary mandatory injunction, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Reeves & Reeves, for appellant.

RUDKIN, J. On the 1st day of June, 1904, the defendant corporation entered into a certain water-right agreement with the plaintiff Z. A. Lanham whereby the defendant transferred and sold to said Lanham a perpetual right to the use of water from the irrigation system of the defendant company, consisting of main and lateral canals and other works in Chelan county, to the amount of $\frac{38}{100}$ of one cubic foot per second, from April 15th to October 31st of each year, commencing with the 1st day of June, 1904, for the purpose of irrigating a certain 38-acre tract of land owned by the plaintiffs and for domestic purposes incident thereto. It appears that about 18 acres of this land is situated above the level of the appellant's main canal, and is not susceptible of irrigation therefrom by gravity flow. In view of this fact doubtless the water-right agreement contained the following provision: "It is understood and agreed that the purchaser is to have the right to raise such part of the amount of water herein conveyed by pump or otherwise as he may so desire, for the purpose of irrigating that part of the above-described land lying above the grade of the main canal of the said company." The present action was instituted on the 15th day of May, 1907, praying for a mandatory injunction requiring the defendant to deliver water to the plaintiffs' land through a certain ditch known as the "Settler's Ditch," pursuant to the terms of said water-right agreement. Upon a hearing had the temporary mandatory injunction was granted as prayed, and from that order the present appeal is prosecuted.

From the affidavits filed at the hearing in the court below it satisfactorily appears that the "Settler's Ditch" is owned by a corporation other than the appellant, and that the appellant is only a stockholder therein. This ditch forms no part of the appellant's irrigation system, and is not embraced within the contract under which the respondents claim. It appears, however, that the appellant, as a matter of accommodation, permitted the respondents to take water from the settler's ditch to irrigate that portion of their land that could not be irrigated by gravity flow from the appellant's main canal, until such time as the respondents might arrange to pump water from the main canal for that purpose. The court below, as appears from its certificate, was of opinion that the respondents were not entitled to the relief sought under the provisions of the contract upon which the action was brought, but that, inasmuch as the respondents had been permitted to take water from the settler's ditch under a parol license, it would be unjust and inequitable to permit a revocation of that license, without notice, under the circumstances. We are of opinion that the court below was clearly right in its conclusion that the water-right agreement did not entitle the respondents to the water claimed by them through the settler's ditch, on the showing made at the preliminary hearing; but, however unjust and inequitable it might seem to revoke a parol license, granted as a mere matter of accommodation, the appellant was clearly within its rights when it did so, and the court was powerless to prevent it.

If a mandatory injunction may issue at all before final hearing, it is only where the plaintiff's right to the relief is clear and certain. 22 Cyc. 743. In this case the respondents' right to the relief sought was not only not clear and certain, but on the contrary we think the appellant was within its legal rights when it revoked the parol license, if any existed, and refused longer to furnish water where there was neither a legal nor moral obligation requiring it so to do.

The order of the court below is therefore reversed.

HADLEY, C. J., and FULLERTON, CROW, DUNBAR, and MOUNT, JJ., concur. ROOT, J., concurs in the result.

HOFFMAN et al. v. DICKSON et ux.

(Supreme Court of Washington. Jan. 22, 1908.)

APPEAL — DETERMINATION — MODIFICATION — INADVERTENT ERROR.

Where a contract provided for a deed of general warranty to a certain vacant lot, and in an action for specific performance the trial court found that one-half the cost of certain party walls were incumbrances thereon, which could not be removed, and ordered specific performance, but the decree by apparent inadvertence recited that the purchasers were entitled to a deed of general warranty "subject to the liens for one-half the cost of constructing both of said party walls," upon sustaining the decision of the lower court the decree will be modified by striking out the quoted expression.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, §§ 4433-4497.]

On petition for rehearing. Denied.

For former opinion, see 92 Pac. 272.

PER CURIAM. Since the opinion was filed in this cause, and pending a petition for rehearing, we have discovered certain words used by the trial court in its decree which were not observed by us before the opinion was filed. The decree recites that appellants are entitled to a deed of general warranty "subject to the liens for one-half of the cost of constructing both of said party walls." In affirming the judgment the possible legal effect of the quoted words was overlooked by us, since the matter had not been called to our attention. We stated in our opinion that appellants are entitled to a deed with covenants of general warranty, that being what was specified in the contract. Such should unmistakably be the provision of the decree. The quoted words must have been used in the decree by a mere inadvertence, inasmuch as the record shows that the trial court found one-half the cost of the party walls to be incumbrances. The contract does not call for a warranty deed subject to any incumbrances. The reason the trial court did not require the present removal of the liens was because, for reasons stated in the main opinion, they are not now removable. The persons who may be entitled to the payment when the walls shall be used, if they are ever used, cannot now be ascertained. Respondents must therefore comply with their contract, and deliver a general warranty deed; but they cannot comply with the contract by delivering a warranty deed, which is expressly made subject to the incumbrances.

We do not believe that the trial court intended the legal effect which the words used may import, and we have not understood that respondents so contend. But that no controversy may arise as to the true meaning of the decree it should be modified by striking out the words above quoted. In all other respects the judgment is affirmed, the petition for rehearing is denied, and the cause is remanded for the purpose of said modification.

COX v. DICKIE et al.

(Supreme Court of Washington. Jan. 15, 1908.)

1. CORPORATIONS—SUBSCRIPTION TO STOCK—ACTIONS TO ENFORCE LIABILITY—DEFENSES—ESTOPPEL.

In an action by the receiver of a corporation to enforce under order of court unpaid stock subscriptions for the benefit of creditors, it was no defense that defendants contracted with the corporation to purchase the stock at half its par value, or that fraudulent representations induced the subscriptions, or that there was no full subscription to the capital stock, or that the corporation was defectively organized, defendants being estopped to set up such defenses.

2. SAME—NOTICE—PROOF.

Under 1 Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St. § 4262, relating to the calling in of subscriptions to corporate stock, and providing that in all cases notice of each assessment shall be given to the stockholders personally or by publication in some newspaper published in the county in which the principal place of business of the company is located, constructive notice may be substituted for personal notice; and proof, in an action by the receiver of a corporation to enforce under order of court unpaid stock subscriptions, that the court directed notice by publication and by mail, that a notice was published as required by the order, and that a letter containing a copy of the notice was mailed to each of the stockholders, was sufficient on the question of notice.

3. SAME.

Where the receiver of a corporation was by order of court directed to collect by suit from the stockholders the balance of the unpaid stock held by them, it was not necessary to bring a separate action against each stockholder, there being no statute requiring it.

4. SAME.

Subscribers to stock of a proposed corporation were liable thereon, though the corporation was organized under a different name from that at first selected; it appearing that the subscriptions were intended for, and in fact were, subscriptions to the corporation organized.

Appeal from Superior Court, King County; R. B. Albertson, Judge.

Action by E. B. Cox, as receiver of the Washington Food Company, against J. P. Dickie and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed, with directions.

H. R. Clise, for appellant. Ira Bronson, D. B. Trefethen, and Shank & Smith, for respondents.

MOUNT, J. This action was brought by the appellant, as receiver of the Washington Food Company, against a large number of defendants, upon their unpaid stock subscriptions in that company. The cause was tried to the court without a jury, and findings were made to the effect that the Washington Food Company was not legally incorporated, because the articles of incorporation were not executed and filed as required by law, and the capital stock was not fully subscribed; that the defendants subscribed for their stock believing that there was no indebtedness against the corporation; and that the amount paid for the stock, being one-half the par value thereof, was the limit of liability thereon, because the stock was represented to be, and was, denominated "treasury stock, fully paid and nonassessable." For these reasons the action was dismissed. The receiver has appealed from the order of dismissal.

The facts in the case are substantially as follows: In the year 1903 certain of the defendants, desiring to organize a company for the manufacture of breakfast foods in the city of Ballard, called public meetings in that city, wherein the advisability of organizing such a company was discussed. After several of these meetings it was decided to incorporate such a company, and the persons who were to act as trustees thereof were elected at one of these meetings. The name of the corporation first adopted was the "Honeyed Flake Food Company." Subscriptions for the capital stock thereof were solicited and made under that name; but later on, or about December 23, 1903, it was decided to incorporate under the name of the Washington Food Company, and articles of incorporation were prepared, executed, and acknowledged under that name. These articles were executed in triplicate, one copy filed in the auditor's office of King county, where the principal office was located, one copy sent to the Secretary of State at Olympia, and the other was kept by the company. These articles were not exact copies, because some of the copies contained more names of incorporators than others. More than three of the same persons, however, executed all of the copies. The articles provided that the capital stock of the company was $100,000, divided into 2,000 shares of the par value of $50 each. The stock was not fully subscribed, and subscriptions were being taken therefor both before the articles were filed and afterwards. Each person subscribing for stock was required to pay $25 per share in cash, with the agreement that the stock was thereby fully paid and nonassessable. After certain subscriptions had been made, and at a public meeting attended by stockholders and others, the trustees were instructed to purchase a site and let a contract for the erection of a building thereon, which the trustees did. Subsequently the building was completed, and machinery purchased, and the same put into operation. During all this time subscriptions for stock were being made on terms as above stated, the total subscriptions amounting to 917 shares. In the erection of the building and operation thereof the company became largely indebted, and on December 28, 1904, the appellant was appointed receiver of the property and effects of the corporation by the superior court of King county. The receiver qualified, and, after exhausting the assets of the corporation, there was still about $7,000 of indebtedness due the creditors of the corporation. Thereupon the superior court by order directed the receiver to collect by suit from the stockholders the balance of the unpaid stock held by them, and to publish a demand therefor in the Seattle Post-Intelligencer, and to mail a copy of such demand to each of the stockholders at his post-office address, as shown by the books of the company. This was done, and afterwards this action was begun.

The defense is based upon the points stated in appellant's brief as follows: (1) The stock was purchased bona fide as treasury stock at a fixed value; (2) fraudulent misrepresentations induced the subscriptions to stock, there being no sufficient circumstances to create an estoppel or waiver; (3) no full subscription to the capital stock of the company; (4) trust fund theory not applicable to this case, since there is no showing that the creditors relied on the stock subscriptions; (5) defect of organization of the company; (6) no notice of call for stock subscriptions; (7) this suit should have been instituted as a separate proceeding against the stockholders instead of being made a joint action; (8) there should be no liability against those whose names appeared in the Honeyed Flake Food Company subscription list; (9) the receiver should have sued for only so much of the unpaid subscription as was necessary to pay for the debts of the company; (10) all of the stockholders should have been made parties defendant under the court's order. The first five of these defenses may be considered together. It must be remembered that this is not an action by the corporation to enforce collection of subscriptions for stock or its contracts with its subscribers, but is an action brought by a receiver under order of the court to enforce such subscriptions for the benefit of creditors. As between the corporation itself and the stockholders all these defenses would probably be good, but as between the stockholders and the creditors of the corporation another rule prevails. Adamant Mfg. Co. v. Wallace, 16 Wash. 614, 48 Pac. 415. In such cases "it is no defense to a suit by a creditor to recover his debt out of an unpaid subscription that the defendant was induced to subscribe to the stock by fraudulent misrepresentations of the agent of the corporation, or by an agreement which the corporation had failed to carry out, or that the corporation was irregularly organized, or organized for an illegal purpose, or has been dissolved; nor can a stockholder set up informalities in the issue of the stock, if the corporation has the power to create it, though he may show that the stock is void as having been issued in excess of the limit imposed by the charter." 26 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law (2d Ed.) p. 1011. See, also, 10 Cyc. pp. 244 and 249; Mitchell v. Jordan, 36 Wash. 645, 79 Pac. 311; Cole v. Satsop Railroad Company, 9 Wash. 487, 37 Pac. 700, 43 Am. St. Rep. 858. Under this rule the trial court was clearly in error in basing the judgment of dismissal upon the facts found as stated above. Such facts, if true, did not constitute a defense in this action, because the stockholders were estopped to say that the corporation was not a legal one, or that they had a contract with the corporation to purchase its stock at 50 per cent. of its par value, or that they subscribed for its stock believing the company was not in debt. The receiver in this action represents the creditors. Mitchell v. Jordan, supra.

Respondents also contend that there was no personal notice of a call for stock subscriptions, and that for this reason the judgment must be sustained. The statute provides: "In all cases notice of each assessment shall be given to the stockholders personally, or by publication in some newspaper published in the county in which the principal place of business of the company is located." Section 4202, 1 Ballinger's Ann. Codes & St. It was held by this court in Elderkin v. Peterson, 8 Wash. 674, 36 Pac. 1089, that the notice required by this section applies to assessments made by the court against stockholders; but neither the statute nor the decision in Elderkin v. Peterson requires personal notice. Constructive notice by publication may be substituted for personal notice. The proof in this case shows that the court ordered the receiver to collect the unpaid subscription, and directed notice by publication and by mail. The receiver testified that such notice was given, that he had a notice published as required by the order, and that he mailed a letter containing a copy of the same to each of the stockholders as directed by the order. It is true that a large number of the defendants testified that they did not receive such letter, or know of the publication; but actual personal notice was not required. The proof was therefore sufficient upon the question of notice.

Respondents next contend that a separate action should have been brought against each stockholder. It is true this court held in Elderkin v. Peterson, supra, that the receiver may bring separate actions in cases like this; but we have no statute requiring separate actions in such cases, and, since each defendant in this case was at liberty to make his separate defense, no prejudicial error can be based upon the fact that a large number of defendants were joined in this action. In fact, the form of the action adopted here was beneficial to the defendants by reason of the saving of costs.

It is also contended by the respondents, and especially by respondent Crossett, who appears by separate counsel and separate brief, that there is no liability against those who subscribed for stock on the Honeyed Flake Company subscription list. But the facts show conclusively that the Honeyed Flake Company and the Washington Food Company were the same company. It was intended to give the company the former name; but that idea was abandoned, and the latter name chosen as being the more appropriate, and the subscription given to the Honeyed Flake Company was intended for and in fact was a subscription to the company, which was incorporated as the Washington Food Company. The mere change in the name did not release the subscribers.

In view of the rule that the receiver might have brought a separate action against each stockholder, it is unnecessary to notice the remaining points presented by respondents. For the reasons above stated, the judgment of the trial court is reversed, and the cause remanded, with instructions to enter judgment against each of the defendants as requested by appellant at the time of the trial.

PERKINS v. PEIRCE et al.

(Supreme Court of Washington. Jan. 31, 1908.)

1. APPEALS—PARTIES—JOINDER.

Where after judgment against the members of a firm one of them appealed and stated in his brief that his codefendant joined in the appeal, but no notice of such joinder and no appeal bond or brief was filed on behalf of such other partner, the appeal as to him would be dismissed.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, §§ 3126, 3127.]

2. PARTNERSHIP—CONTRACTS—MEMBERS—INDIVIDUAL LIABILITY.

Where a member of a firm employed plaintiff to perform certain services for it, such member was individually liable for the services performed, whether the partnership existed, or whether the contracting member had authority to make the contract on behalf of the firm.

Appeal from Superior Court, King County; Arthur E. Griffin, Judge.

Action by John N. Perkins against John Peirce and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant Fred T. Evans appeals. Affirmed.

Jerold Landon Finch, for appellant.

RUDKIN, J. This action was instituted against the defendants as copartners to recover for services performed by the plaintiff, at the instance and request of the defendants, in procuring options for certain timber lands, and in placing the defendants in communication with the owners thereof, to the end that deeds might be obtained therefor. Trial was had before the court without a jury. The court found that the defendants were copartners as alleged; that on the 21st day of March, 1905, they employed the plaintiff to procure options on certain timber lands in Clallam county, agreeing to divide with him the difference between the price paid per quarter section and $1,800, which was modified to $1,600 per quarter section on October 28, 1905; that the defendant Evans in entering into the contract of employment acted for himself and his codefendant Peirce; that pursuant to his contract of employment the plaintiff obtained options on five quarter sections and one 80-acre tract at the agreed purchase price of $1,000 per quarter section; that the defendants and their appointee obtained title to all of said lands; that the plaintiff has received nothing on account of his services in that behalf, and entered judgment accordingly. From this judgment, the defendant Evans has appealed.

He states in his brief that his co-defendant Peirce joined in the appeal; but no notice of such joinder and no appeal bond appears in the record, and no brief has been filed. As to the appellant Peirce, therefore, the appeal, if any, must be dismissed, and it is so ordered. Much of the argument of the appellant is addressed to the question of the existence of a partnership between himself and his codefendant Peirce; but in so far as the rights of the appellant are concerned we do not deem that question material. The contract of employment was entered into and signed by the appellant, and whether there was a copartnership, or whether the appellant was authorized to act for or bind his codefendant, is not an issue on this appeal. The court found that the contract was entered into by the appellant and the respondent, that the respondent performed his part of the contract, and has not been paid the stipulated compensation for his services. These findings are sustained by the testimony, and the judgment against the appellant was proper, partnership or no partnership, the rights of the defendant Peirce not being before this court. 15 Ency. Pl. & Pr. 960.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

STURGEON v. TACOMA EASTERN R. CO. (Supreme Court of Washington. Jan. 28, 1908.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT—MASTER'S LIABILITY FOR INJURIES TO SERVANT—METHODS OF WORK—CUSTOMS.

It cannot be said, as matter of law, that a brakeman is negligent in attempting to board a moving train, where the testimony shows that such is the common custom.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 34, Master and Servant, §§ 1089-1132.]

2. SAME—APPLIANCES—INSPECTION.

A railroad company cannot avoid liability to its employees by imposing on them the duty of inspection without affording a reasonable opportunity for the discharge of such duty.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 34, Master and Servant, § 718.]

3. SAME—ACTIONS—QUESTION FOR JURY.

Plaintiff, a switchman for defendant railroad company, while switching a wood car attempted to board the moving car by taking hold of a crosspiece of the woodrack on the front of the car, and it broke, letting him fall to the ground. There was testimony showing it to be customary for brakemen to use the crosspiece for such purposes. Held, that the question whether defendant was negligent in not keeping the rack reasonably safe was for the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 34, Master and Servant, §§ 1015, 1020.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Pierce County; M. L. Clifford, Judge.

Action by Ben H. Sturgeon against the Tacoma Eastern Railroad Company. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Burkey, O'Brien & Burkey, for appellant. E. M. Hayden and John A. Shackelford, for respondent.

RUDKIN, J. On and for some time prior to the 27th day of January, 1908, the plaintiff was in the employ of the defendant as a brakeman on one of its logging trains. Between the hours of 4:00 and 6:00 o'clock of the morning of the above date the train on which the plaintiff was employed stopped at Nelson's siding on the line of the defendant's road to take up some empty cars on a side track. There was a flat car partly loaded with wood in front of the empties which the train was about to pick up, and in order to reach the empties the engine was backed up and attached to this wood car. The wood car was next attached to the empties, and the train drawn forward onto the main track. The empties were then kicked back onto the main track, and the plaintiff turned the switch in order that the wood car might be returned to its original position on the side track. As he turned the switch the plaintiff signaled the engineer to back the train onto the siding, and, as the train approached him at a speed of from one to four miles an hour, he attempted to board the wood car for the purpose of setting the brake when the car reached its proper position on the siding, by placing his left hand and left knee on the drawhead and seizing one of the crosspieces of the wood rack with his right hand. The crosspiece thus seized was defective and gave way. In an effort to save himself the plaintiff attempted to throw himself clear of the train, but his left foot was caught and crushed. This action was brought to recover damages for the injury thus received. At the close of the plaintiff's case the court directed a nonsuit, and from the judgment of nonsuit the present appeal is prosecuted.

Under the facts thus presented two questions arise: (1) Was there testimony tending to show negligence on the part of the respondent? and (2) was the appellant guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law? The respondent contends that the wood rack in question was not intended for use as a ladder by trainmen in boarding cars, but there was no testimony on this point. On the other hand trainmen of years of experience testified that it is customary, not only on the respondent's road, but on all railroads, for brakemen to board cars such as this in the identical manner in which the appellant attempted to board the car in question. If this custom prevailed and was known to the respondent, or should have been known by the exercise of reasonable diligence, it became its duty to make its wood racks reasonably safe for the purpose for which they were habitually used, regardless of the purpose they were originally intended to subserve. Wallace v. Seaboard Air Line Ry. Co., 141 N. C. 646, 54 S. E. 399; Dunn v. New York & N. H. Ry., 107 Fed. 666, 46 C. C. A. 546; Babcock Lumber Co. v. Johnson, 120 Ga. 1030, 48 S. E. 438.

There is some controversy between counsel with reference to the testimony relating to the condition of the crosspiece which gave way and caused the appellant's injury. While we must accept the record as certified to this court we are satisfied that the testimony on this point was not correctly reported. Sometimes counsel and the witness are made to refer to the "brake" on the car and sometimes to the "break" in the crosspiece. To a certain extent the testimony is unintelligible, but it is apparent that some of the testimony at least referred to the break in the crosspiece on the wood rack, and that the appellant testified that the break was an old one. From the entire record the jury would have been warranted in finding that it is customary for trainmen to use the crosspieces on the wood racks in boarding cars such as this in the manner in which the crosspiece in question was used by the appellant; that this custom was known to the respondent; that the crosspiece or wood rack was not reasonably safe for that purpose, and that its defective and unsafe condition could have been ascertained by the respondent by the exercise of reasonable diligence and proper inspection. Was the appellant guilty of contributory negligence? The respondent contends that he was for two reasons: First, in attempting to board a moving train in the manner in which he did; and, second, because he failed to inspect the car as required by the rules of the company. It certainly cannot be said as a matter of law that a brakeman is guilty of negligence if he attempts to board a moving train.

The testimony shows clearly that such is the common custom, and it is perhaps not going too far to say that the existence of such a custom is a matter of common knowledge. Prosser v. Montana Central Ry. Co., 17 Mont. 372, 43 Pac. 81, 30 L. R. A. 814.

The rule of the company which imposed the duty of inspection on the appellant is as follows: "672 (a) Brakemen report to trainmaster, assistant superintendent, or superintendent, and obey the conductor, with those duties they will become familiar and assist in performing." Other rules impose the duty of inspection on conductors, and it is contended that the above rule imposes a like duty on brakemen. It must be apparent that a brakeman on a dark morning has but little opportunity to inspect cars while engaged in the discharge of his other duties, and a railroad company cannot avoid liability to its employes by imposing upon them the duty of inspection, unless a reasonable opportunity is given for the discharge of that duty. "A master cannot shift upon his employes his responsibility to them for injuries resulting from defects due to wear and tear, by devolving upon them the duty of inspection, unless they are given time and opportunity to make such inspection, as would reveal the defects. And this may be said to be the effect of the decisions. It is considered that such rules should receive a reasonable interpretation, and that the obligations of the servant should be determined with reference both to the character of the defect and to his ability to make an examination. Upon this basis, the validity of rules or agreements of the ordinary tenor, by which servants are obligated to examine appliances, may often be upheld. But if they are couched in terms which indicate a clear and absolute intention on the employer's part to impose a more extensive obligation upon the servant than is thus declared to be permissible, they will be treated—by most courts at all events—as an illegal attempt to subject the latter to the duty which is incumbent upon the former, of seeing that the plant is in a reasonably safe condition." 1 Labatt, Master and Servant, p. 1178. See, also, Matchett v. C. W. & M. Ry., 132 Ind. Sup. 334, 31 N. E. 792; Strong v. Iowa Central Ry. Co., 94 Iowa, 380, 62 N. W. 799; Holmes v. Southern Pac. Ry. Co., 120 Cal. 357, 52 Pac. 652.

On the entire record we are of opinion that the question of negligence on the part of the respondent, and of contributory negligence on the part of the appellant, should have been submitted to the jury under proper instructions, and, for the court's failure so to do, the judgment is reversed, and a new trial ordered.

1. EVIDENCE—OPINION EVIDENCE—MARKET VALUE—TESTIMONY OF OWNER—COMPETENCY.

Ownership alone does not render an owner of land a competent witness as to its value, if he is not familiar with its location, quality, or value.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 20, Evidence, § 2217.]

2. APPEAL—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR.

Though the owner thereof might have been properly permitted to testify to the market value of his land, where his qualifications to do so were disputed, and its value was shown by a number of witnesses better qualified to testify thereto, the exclusion of evidence by the owner was not prejudicial.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, §§ 4161–4170.]

3. SAME — DETERMINATION — AFFIRMANCE — REVERSAL NOT BENEFICIAL.

In condemnation proceedings to appropriate property occupied by a saloon, a judgment will be affirmed in spite of the exclusion of evidence of loss by reason of the saloon license being rendered valueless thereby, where the license expired pending appeal, and the owner enjoyed the full benefit thereof.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, § 4461.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Thurston County; O. V. Linn, Judge.

Condemnation proceedings by Port Townsend Southern Railroad Company against Dennis Nolan and another. From a decree of appropriation, defendants appeal. Judgment affirmed.

Walter M. Harvey and Vance & Mitchell, for appellants.

RUDKIN, J. This is an appeal from a decree of appropriation in a condemnation case. But two errors are assigned: First, the refusal of the court to permit the appellant to testify to the market value of the property sought to be appropriated; and, second, the refusal to admit evidence of the loss sustained through the appropriation of the property by taking and rendering valueless the saloon license issued to the appellant by the town of Tenino. In support of the first assignment it is contended: (1) That the owner is always competent to testify to the value of his own property; and, (2) that in any event the appellant showed that he was duly qualified in this case. With the first contention we cannot agree. The owner who occupies his property, and is familiar with its character and the purposes for which it may be used, and to a greater or less extent with land values in the community, is a competent witness. But the owner may have acquired his property by devise or descent in a distant state or country, and know nothing of its location, quality, condition, or value, and in such cases it is idle to contend that he is competent to testify to its value, or to any other fact concerning it. While, therefore, the owner may and often does occupy a different position towards his property than does a mere stranger, yet he must in all cases show at least some qualification before testifying to its value, and the difference between the qualifications required of the owner and of a stranger is one of degree only. On the showing made in this case we think the court might have permitted the owner to testify to the market value of the land taken; but the testimony as to his knowledge and qualification was extremely contradictory, and we are not prepared to say that the court abused the wide discretion which is necessarily vested in it by law. Furthermore the property sought to be condemned was a town lot. Its value depended largely upon its size and location, and the opportunities of the owner for knowing its market value were little if any better than those of any other person familiar with land values in the town. Seven or eight witnesses, whom the court deemed better qualified than the appellant, testified to the market value of the property in his behalf, and under such circumstances we do not think that the ruling of the court was prejudicial.

On the second assignment little need be said. The saloon license has expired by operation of law. The appellant has enjoyed the full benefit of it pending his appeal, and, should the judgment be reversed, the license could not become an issue on a retrial, or enter into the question of damages. As to that question the subject-matter of the controversy has ceased to exist, and no benefit could accrue to the appellant from a reversal of the judgment.

Finding no substantial error in the record, the judgment is affirmed.

TAYLOR v. DEBRITZ et al.

(Supreme Court of Washington. Jan. 30, 1908.)

TAXATION—PAYMENT OF TAXES—OMISSION OF TAX OFFICERS.

Where plaintiff after purchasing certain land applied in good faith to the proper officer to pay the taxes thereon, and payment for one year was not made, because the taxing officer stated that there were no taxes unpaid or delinquent against the land except those which plaintiff had previously paid, a tax deed pursuant to a sale for taxes for the year for which the lands were in fact delinquent was void.

Appeal from Superior Court, King County; R. B. Albertson, Judge.

Action by Z. B. Taylor against G. Debritz and another. From a decree for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Ralph Simon, for appellants. Hayden & Langhorne, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This was an action to set aside a tax deed, based on the foreclosure of a delinquency certificate for the taxes of 1888. From a judgment in favor of the plaintiff, the defendants have appealed.

The testimony introduced at the trial showed, and the court found: "That after purchasing said land, beginning with the year 1889 and each and every year thereafter, plaintiff requested from the proper collecting officers of King county statements of the taxes due as well as the taxes delinquent against said land; that each and every year since the purchase of said land, beginning with the year 1889, the proper collecting officers of King county asserted and represented to the plaintiff by written and verbal statement that there were no taxes unpaid or delinquent against said land, except such taxes as this plaintiff had theretofore paid; that this plaintiff has paid the taxes on said land beginning with the taxes assessed for the year 1889 down to and including the taxes assessed for the year 1906." Considering a similar state of facts in the recent case of Bullock v. Wallace (Wash.) 92 Pac. 675, this court quoted the following from 27 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law (2d Ed.) p. 735: "If the owner of land, or a party having an interest therein, in good faith applies to the proper officer for the purpose of paying the tax thereon, and payment is prevented by the mistake or fault of such officer, * * * the attempt to pay is considered, in most jurisdictions, as the legal equivalent of payment in so far as to discharge the lien and bar a sale for nonpayment;" and said: "The facts, we think, require the holding that the foreclosure was unauthorized in law, that the sale and deed thereunder were void, and that appellant was not divested of her title thereby." To the same effect, see Loving v. McPhail (Wash.) 92 Pac. 944.

On the authority of the above cases the judgment in this case must be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

WILSON v. McMILLAN.

(Supreme Court of Washington. Jan. 30, 1908.)

EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS—SALES—CONFIRMATION—SETTING ASIDE ORDER.

There is an irregularity in the obtaining of an order confirming a sale of real estate in probate proceedings, approximating constructive fraud on the estate, so as to authorize the setting aside thereof, where, pending objections by the heirs to confirmation of the sale, accompanied by an offer of M. to bid 10 per cent. advance in case of resale, this offer was withdrawn by M., and confirmation obtained by the purchaser, without notice to the executor or heirs when higher bids were available.

Appeal from Superior Court, Lincoln County; W. T. Warren, Judge.

Proceedings between W. A. Wilson and H. H. McMillan, executor of Martha J. Holburte, deceased. From an order, said Wilson appeals. Affirmed.

W. A. Wilson, pro se. H. A. P. Myers, for respondent.

93 P.—34

ROOT, J. This is an appeal from an order setting aside the confirmation of a sale of real estate made in a probate proceeding. The record shows that the sale of the property involved was first advertised for June 16, 1906, but, there being no bidders, the sale was postponed until June 23, 1906. At the sale the property was bid in by the appellant for $1,000, he being the only bidder. On June 30, 1906, the executor made his return, setting forth among other things "that the sum of $1,000 is much less than the value of said property, but the undersigned was unable to get any other bid for the same," and recommending the confirmation of the sale. Thereupon some of the heirs of the deceased objected to the confirmation, and with their objections a written offer by one H. N. Martin was filed, wherein he agreed in case of a resale to bid at least 10 per cent. over and above the $1,000, and pay the expense of such resale. The matter was continued from time to time until October 24, 1906, when Martin requested permission to withdraw the objections and his offer to bid over $1,000 at a new sale. The request was granted, and the bid and objections were withdrawn. The appellant then, without notice to the respondent or his counsel, presented an order of confirmation to the judge of the court, who signed the same. The executor, immediately upon learning of this, moved to vacate said order, as it had been made without his knowledge, and at a time when he was able to secure a larger sum for the property. This motion was granted, and it is from this order that the present appeal is prosecuted.

It is contended by appellant that the order of confirmation could not be set aside by the trial court in the absence of a showing of fraud or irregularity in the obtaining thereof, and that none such appears in this instance. We think there was an irregularity, and one which would approximate constructive fraud upon the estate. The "upset" bid interposed by Martin would naturally lead the executor and heirs to believe that no confirmation of the sale was to be had. When this was withdrawn, and an order of confirmation taken without any notice to the executor, and at a time when higher bids were available, we think the condition of affairs existed which justified the trial court in vacating the order of confirmation thus made. Ofttimes probate proceedings, or numerous steps therein, are largely ex parte, and considerable latitude is accorded by law to the court which has supervision of such matters, to the end that the best interests of the estate may be subserved.

Finding no error in the action of the court in making the order appealed from, the same is affirmed.

HADLEY, C. J., and CROW and DUNBAR, JJ., concur; FULLERTON AND MOUNT, JJ., did not sit.

AMES v. FARMERS' & MECHANICS' BANK.

(Supreme Court of Washington. Jan. 20, 1908.)

1. BANKS AND BANKING—DEPOSITS—RELATION BETWEEN BANK AND DEPOSITOR—EVIDENCE.

In an action to hold defendant, a bank, having its chief place of business at S., liable for deposits in a bank at C., on the ground that the C. bank was conducted by defendant, an advertisement of the C. bank stating that it was a branch of the S. bank, published at the instance of H., who had immediate charge of the C. bank, is competent evidence that the C. bank was a branch of defendant, in connection with evidence that it was mailed directly to defendant at its home office, that the affairs of defendant were largely left with its executive officers in the immediate charge of the banking business, and that the C. bank was organized by the authority of defendant's vice president, who placed H. in charge thereof.

2. SAME.

In an action to hold defendant bank for deposits in the C. bank, on the ground of its being a branch of defendant, plaintiff offered in evidence an application for a bond to secure the deposits of public funds in the C. bank, and the bond executed pursuant thereto, the application being made in the name of defendant, and signed by S. as its vice president, and by C. as its cashier, and reciting that the C. bank was controlled by defendant, and that defendant held itself responsible for it, and the bond, executed by both banks as principals, reciting such control of the C. bank by defendant; and, though no previous authority from defendant's board of directors to such officers to sign such papers was shown, such officers were shown to be largely charged with control of its affairs, and it was otherwise shown that its president had practically the same knowledge of such matters as they had. Held, that the evidence was admissible; it being for the jury to say whether defendant's board of directors, by the exercise of reasonable and ordinary diligence, which they were bound to exercise, should not have known the facts.

3. SAME.

So under such circumstances letters written to defendant on letter heads of the C. bank, conspicuously stating that it was a branch of defendant, and letters written by and to defendant's officers, on their face having some bearing on the subject, are admissible for what they are worth on the question of the C. bank being a branch of defendant.

4. APPEAL—REVIEW—RECORD.

Where a part of the writing under which plaintiff claims as assignee was detached and excluded as improper, the segregation being at the instance of defendant, and there is enough in the record to show assignments supporting plaintiff's right to sue, but the excluded part is not in the record, it cannot be said that it was error to admit a part of the writing.

5. TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—NECESSITY.

There was no error in refusing to charge on defendant's so-called affirmative defense, in an action against defendant bank to recover deposits made in the C. bank, on the ground that such bank was a branch of defendant, such defense being the mere statement that plaintiff, with the assignors of his claims, had been in possession and control of the assets of the C. bank, and that no part thereof had ever come into the possession of defendant or its agents; the whole controversy raised by the complaint and denials thereto being whether defendant had all the time been in possession through its agents, so that the affirmative matter raised no new issue, and it not only not being capable of being treated as intended for purposes of set-off, as defendant in no way admitted a liability, but the evidence not showing the value of assets, and it being conceded by plaintiff that whatever assets of the C. bank remained should be applied to reduce the judgment against defendant.

6. BANKS AND BANKING—DEPOSITS—ACTIONS BY DEPOSITOR—INSTRUCTIONS.

An instruction in an action against the S. bank for deposits made in the C. bank that one is liable to the same extent by subsequent ratification that he would be by precedent authority, and that, if the jury should find that any officer of defendant bank purported to start or open a bank at C., and to do business on behalf of defendant, representing that it was a branch of defendant, and that defendant, through its officers or stockholders became aware thereof, and failed within a reasonable time to repudiate said things, then defendant, by and through its officers and stockholders, is presumed to have ratified such things, and, if ratified, will be bound thereby, does not authorize the finding of a ratification on mere constructive knowledge, but on knowledge coming to defendant through its officers or stockholders.

7. APPEAL—REVIEW—RECORD.

The court's finding on exceptions to plaintiff's cost bill cannot be reviewed; the record showing merely that after a hearing and after being fully advised the court denied the exceptions, and there being nothing in the statement of facts showing what evidence was before the court at such hearing, or what matters or facts were considered by the court in reaching its conclusion, and the parties not agreeing as to such matter.

Appeal from Superior Court, Spokane County; Wm. A. Huneke, Judge.

Action by A. A. Ames against the Farmers' & Mechanics' Bank. Judgment for plaintiff, and new trial denied. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Merritt, Oswald & Merritt, for appellant.
H. M. Stephens, for respondent.

HADLEY, C. J. This is an action to recover the balance of unpaid bank deposits. The complaint states 104 causes of action representing the claim of the plaintiff as a depositor on his own account, and also those of 103 other depositors assigned to the plaintiff for the purposes of suit. The complaint avers that the defendant, Farmers' & Mechanics' Bank, is a corporation under the laws of this state, having its principal place of business in Spokane, and that it is authorized by its articles of incorporation to do a general banking business in as many places as it may determine to carry on such business. It is alleged that the defendant also did a general banking business at Cheney in Spokane county from the 5th day of July, 1904, to the 6th day of July, 1906; that the business so done at Cheney was transacted under the name of "Farmers' & Merchants' Bank." In the first cause of action it is alleged that from time to time the plaintiff deposited with the defendant, through its officers and agents doing business at Cheney, various sums of money, and that on the 6th and 7th days of July, 1906, the plaintiff had on deposit with defendant at Cheney, and the defendant then owed the plaintiff, the sum of $772.20, which remains unpaid; that on said

July 7th the defendant refused to pay to plaintiff said sum or any part thereof, and still refuses so to do; that on said date the defendant purported to close its doors and business at Cheney. Similar allegations are made as the basis of the other causes of action, including also allegations as to the assignments to plaintiff. Judgment is prayed for the sum of $10,745.03, with interest. By stipulation it was agreed that one answer should be treated as a separate answer to each of the causes of action. The answer denies that the defendant did a banking business at Cheney, admits that it did a general banking business at Spokane, but denies any indebtedness on account of the matters set forth in the complaint. The cause was tried by a jury, and a verdict was returned in favor of plaintiff for the sum of $10,004.66. Judgment was entered for the amount of the verdict and for costs. Defendant moved for a new trial, which was denied, and it has appealed.

There is but one designated assignment of error in the brief, which is that the court erred in overruling the motion for a new trial. Many separate points are discussed in argument as included within the one assigned as error. We will now consider the points which are specifically argued in the brief. An advertisement of the bank at Cheney was published in the Cheney Free Press, a newspaper published at Cheney. It was published at the instance of a Mr. Henning, who had immediate charge of the bank at Cheney. Henning, respondent claims, acted as the agent of appellant, but appellant denied his agency. The advertisement was as follows:

"The Farmers' & Merchants' Bank, Cheney, Wash.

"(Branch of the Farmers' & Mechanics' Bank of Spokane. Capital, $50,000.)

"To the Public: We have opened for business in our temporary location opposite the post office, and respectfully invite your patronage. Even if you have no business to transact, we shall be pleased to have you call and get better acquainted with us.

"Very truly yours,

"A. H. Henning, Cashier.

"General Banking Business. Bank Drafts and Money Orders. Interest Paid on Time Deposits."

It will be observed that the advertisement states that the bank at Cheney is a "branch of the Farmers' & Mechanics' Bank of Spokane." It was offered in evidence by respondent, and was admitted with the understanding that it was competent evidence as bearing upon the fact that the bank at Cheney was a branch of appellant, if the advertisement was brought to the attention of appellant, and with the further understanding that it would be followed with other evidence showing that it was brought to appellant's attention. The publisher of the newspaper afterwards testified that he mailed the paper, postage prepaid, to the appellant at Spokane. The argument is made that the advertisement was no more than the declaration of one who claimed after the transaction to have been an agent. We think, in view of the whole evidence, it was not incompetent. The evidence tended to show that the affairs of the bank were by a course of dealing largely left with the executive officers in the immediate charge of the banking business. The testimony without doubt showed that the bank at Cheney was organized by the authority of Mr. Swanson, vice president of appellant, and that Mr. Henning was by him placed in charge. The publication in the paper was a direct assertion to the public that the bank at Cheney was a branch of appellant; and when it appeared that the paper containing the advertisement was mailed directly to the appellant at its home office, it was for the jury to say under all the circumstances whether appellant had knowledge of its contents. The same was true of an advertising circular, which contained a similar statement, and to which objection was also made. That this circular was received at appellant's Spokane bank was testified by Swanson, but he did not say that he knew that other officers saw it.

A depository bond and the application to the surety company therefor were admitted in evidence over appellant's objection. The bond was made to secure the treasurer of the city of Cheney who had selected the bank at Cheney as a depository for public moneys. The application was made in the name of appellant, and was signed by Swanson as appellant's vice president, and by Mr. Clancy as its cashier. It contained the following statement: "This application made to secure bonds for purpose of protecting against loss all moneys deposited in Farmers' & Merchants' Bank of Cheney, Washington, a private institution controlled by this bank, and this bank holding itself responsible for said bank." The bond, executed in pursuance of the application, was executed by both banks as principals, and by Fidelity & Deposit Company of Maryland as surety, and contained the following recitals: "Whereas, the Farmers' & Merchants' Bank of Cheney, Washington, is controlled by the Farmers' & Mechanics' Bank of Spokane, Washington; and whereas said Farmers' & Merchants' Bank has been selected by said A. L. Ames, treasurer of the city of Cheney, Washington, as a depository for public moneys coming into his hands as said treasurer; and whereas, by reason of the Farmers' & Mechanics' Bank of Spokane, Washington, controlling and directing the Farmers' & Merchants' Bank of Cheney, Washington, it is deemed proper that the Farmers' & Mechanics' Bank of Spokane, Washington, join as a co-principal in this bond to said A. L. Ames, treasurer of the city of Cheney, Washington." We think it was not error to admit these exhibits. It is contended that the application and bond were admitted without showing any authority of appellant to Swanson and Claney to execute them. It is true that previous authority from the board of directors was not directly shown; but the exhibits did show knowledge on the part of two of the active executive officers of the bank that the bank at Cheney was being held out as a branch of appellant, and that the treasurer of the city of Cheney, who was about to become a depositor of public funds, so understood it. With this knowledge on the part of two such active officers who, as the evidence tended to show, were largely charged with the control of the bank's affairs, it was for the jury to say whether the course of dealing of appellant was such as showed that the knowledge of these officers became, under the circumstances, the knowledge of appellant. It was also shown that the president of appellant possessed practically the same knowledge upon the subject as that of the vice president and cashier. Without doubt the patrons of the bank at Cheney must have understood from its beginning that it was a branch of appellant, and the evidence shows that such transactions were had between the two banks as may well be said to have indicated such a relationship. It was therefore for the jury to say whether appellant's board of directors, by the exercise of reasonable and ordinary diligence, should have known the facts. It was the duty of the directors to exercise such diligence in the premises. In Martin v. Webb, 110 U. S. 7, 3 Sup. Ct. 428, 28 L. Ed. 49, the court said: "Directors cannot, in justice to those who deal with the bank, shut their eyes to what is going on around them. It is their duty to use ordinary diligence in ascertaining the condition of its business, and to exercise reasonable control and supervision of its officers. They have something more to do than from time to time to elect the officers of the bank, and to make declarations of dividends. That which they ought, by proper diligence, to have known as to the general course of business in the bank, they may be presumed to have known in any contest between the corporation and those who are justified by the circumstances in dealing with its officers upon the basis of that course of business." See, also, Coolidge v. Schering, 32 Wash. 537, 73 Pac. 682; Rattlemill v. Stone, 28 Wash. 104, 68 Pac. 168.

Numerous other objections were made to the admission of testimony in the way of letters written by appellant's officers, and of letters addressed to them. What has been hereinbefore said applies to that testimony. Upon its face it at least had some bearing upon the subject in hand. Letter heads of letters sent from the bank at Cheney to appellant contain the statement in a conspicuous way that the one bank was a branch of the other. A letter written by appellant's cashier related to the lease of the premises occupied by the bank at Cheney. All this evidence was admissible for whatever value it possessed, and it was for the jury to pass upon the questions of knowledge and authority as heretofore stated.

Objection was made to the introduction of the writing under which respondent claims as assignee of the other claimants. It is urged that a part of the writing was detached and excluded as improper, and that it was error to admit only a part of it. The detached part is not in the record, and we cannot determine whether it was properly excluded or not. The record shows that the segregation of parts of the writing was at the instance of appellant. There is sufficient in the record to show assignments supporting respondent's right to sue.

Appellant complains that the court did not instruct the jury concerning what it calls its affirmative defense. That defense was the mere statement that respondent, together with his assignors, had been in possession and control of the assets of the bank at Cheney, and that no part thereof had ever come into the possession of appellant or its agents. The whole controversy raised by the complaint, and denials thereto, was whether appellant had all the time been in possession through its agents. The affirmative matter, therefore, raised no new issue. It could not be treated as intended for the purposes of set-off, for appellant in no way admitted a liability against which there could be a set-off. Moreover the evidence did not show the value of the assets so that the jury could make application thereof by way of set-off. It was shown that a dividend payment had been made from the assets upon deposits, and it is conceded by respondent that whatever remains by way of assets should be applied to reduce the judgment against appellant; but it is contended that the possession of the assets is held for appellant by agents of the latter, and under the issues the finding of the jury would seem to establish such fact. The court, therefore, did not err in refusing to instruct as to the so-called affirmative defense. The court instructed the jury in effect that one is liable to the same extent by subsequent ratification that he would be by precedent authority; that if they should find that any officer of appellant purported to start or open a branch bank at Cheney, and to do business on behalf of appellant, representing that it was a branch bank of appellant, and that the appellant, through its officers or stockholders thereafter became aware thereof, and failed within a reasonable time to repudiate said things, then it, by and through its officers and stockholders, is presumed to have ratified such things, and, if ratified, it will be bound thereby. It is contended that the doctrine of ratification or acquiescence, based upon constructive knowledge, was repudiated by this court in Heinzerling v. Agen (Wash.) 90 Pac. 262. We think the instruction in question, when considered as a whole, does not authorize the finding of a ratification upon mere constructive knowledge, but that it is rather based upon the theory of knowledge which may have come to the appellant itself through its officers or stockholders, and it was for the jury to find whether such knowledge came to appellant through the source mentioned. Considering all the instructions together, we do not think the jury were misled, and we believe no prejudicial error was committed either in giving or in refusing to give requested ones.

Appellant excepted to respondent's cost bill as filed in the trial court, and supported the exceptions by counsel's affidavit that the facts stated in the exceptions were true. The record shows that after a hearing, and after being fully advised in the premises, the court denied the exceptions. There is, however, nothing in the statement of facts showing what evidence was before the court at that hearing, or what matters and facts were considered by the court in reaching its conclusion. We cannot therefore review the court's finding upon that subject. It is true appellant's counsel say that no affidavits were filed except the one above mentioned, but respondent's counsel says that additional statements and matters were taken into consideration by the court at the hearing. With such dispute existing the certificate of the trial court is necessary to inform this court what facts were considered.

We think it was not error to deny the new trial, and the judgment is affirmed.

SPOKANE STAMP WORKS v. RIDPATH.
(Supreme Court of Washington. Jan. 29, 1908.)
INJUNCTION—ACTIONS FOR INJUNCTION—EVIDENCE—BURDEN OF PROOF.

A defendant leased a room on the ground floor of his hotel to plaintiff. Held that, in an action to enjoin defendant from removing a post which extended up through the floor and supported certain noisy and jarring machinery, the evidence as to the understanding between plaintiff and defendant being conflicting, the burden of proof is on plaintiff to establish that it was maintaining and operating the machinery by authority of the defendant.

Appeal from Superior Court, Spokane County; Henry L. Kennan, Judge.

Action by the Spokane Stamp Works against William M. Ridpath. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded, with instructions to dismiss the action.

Henley & Kellam, for appellant. John O. Kleber, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The subject-matter of this action may be understood by reference to the facts stated and discussed in Ridpath v. Spo- kane Stamp Works, decided by this court January 17, 1908. It was held by the trial court in that case that the testimony offered by the plaintiff was not sufficient for the jury, and a nonsuit was granted. This court held that the testimony concerning the operation of the stamp machinery upon the premises showed upon its face the existence of a nuisance in a building that was chiefly used as a hotel, and such as the owner had a right to have abated. It was held that the trial court erred in granting the nonsuit, and the cause was remanded, with instructions to proceed with the trial. The parties are reversed in this action. The stamp works company brought this suit against the owner to restrain him from removing the upright log or the piece of timber extending from the ground in the basement up through the first floor, and upon which the stamp falls as the result of operating the machinery, and also to restrain him from cutting the power wires leading to the machinery. A permanent injunction was granted, and the owner has appealed.

Testimony was introduced by both parties in this case, and, after having read the record thereof, we are convinced that the facts show the maintenance by respondent of a nuisance upon appellant's premises. The written lease between the parties gives no leave to maintain any such noisy and jarring machinery, and the claim of right to maintain it, is based merely upon alleged oral conversations said to have occurred, some before and some after, the execution of the written lease. The evidence, however, convinces us that the owner at no time correctly understood what would be the effect of this machinery in its operation, and that he, from the beginning and at all times, expressly protested against the installation of appliances that would be noisy, or that would in any manner disturb the occupants of the hotel. He was, however, led by respondent's agents to believe that the appliances they were installing would not have such effect, and while he warned them that noisy machinery would not be tolerated, yet he did not absolutely object to the installation of this particular machinery. We think the evidence shows that, by the use of the log and power for operating the stamp thereon, respondent is using and affecting the premises in a manner never contemplated by the owner, and to which he never consented. There was conflict in the evidence; but the burden was upon respondent to establish by a preponderance of the testimony that it was maintaining and operating this machinery by authority of the owner, having in view all the peculiar phases of its operation and the effect thereof. This we think respondent has not done, and, inasmuch as the action is triable de novo here, we so find.

It was therefore error to grant respondent an injunction, and the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded, with instructions to dismiss the action.

GAULT v. BRADSHAW.

(Supreme Court of Washington. Jan. 25, 1908.)

1. APPEAL—REVIEW—IMMATERIAL QUESTIONS.

Where the court directed a verdict, the rulings on the admission of evidence, none of which excluded evidence throwing light on the main issue, were immaterial.

2. BROKERS—COMMISSIONS—WHEN EARNED.

An owner listing his property for sale at a fixed price with a real estate broker, with knowledge that the latter on procuring a purchaser will charge a commission, is liable for the commission when the broker procures a purchaser to whom a sale is made at the fixed price.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 8, Brokers, §§ 65-74.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Kittitas County; H. B. Rigg, Judge.

Action by B. A. Gault against G. R. Bradshaw. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

O. O. Felkner, for appellant. Hovey & Hale, for respondent.

FULLERTON, J. The respondent brought this action against the appellant to recover the sum of $1,250 claimed to be due as a commission for the sale of certain real and personal property made on September 16, 1904. After issue had been joined a trial was entered upon before the court and a jury at the conclusion of which the court on the respondent's motion directed a verdict in his favor on the ground that there was no substantial dispute on any material question of fact, and that the facts warranted a recovery on the part of the respondent. From the judgment entered on the directed verdict, this appeal is taken.

The appellant assigns errors on the ruling of the court made while passing upon the admissibility of evidence, but since no evidence was excluded which would throw light on the main issue, the questions become immaterial, in view of the action of the court in instructing a verdict; this on the principle, so often stated by us, that on trials had before the court without a jury the erroneous admission of evidence is not ground in itself for a reversal of the judgment.

On the principal question, whether or not there was a substantial dispute in the evidence, we think the court committed no error. It is undisputed that the appellant listed his property for sale with the respondent, who was a real estate broker, at a fixed price, and that the respondent told the appellant that he would charge him a 5 per cent. commission if he found a purchaser who would take the property at the price named. It is undisputed also that the respondent did find such a purchaser, that he sent the purchaser to the appellant, and that the appellant sold the property to the purchaser at the price he had named to the respondent. The appellant sought to escape liability by contending that he did not agree to pay the commission asked by the respondent, and that, although he made no reply when the respondent told him he would charge a commission, he did not thereby intend to consent to agree to pay any commission; but to make a contract the assent to this part of the agreement did not have to be expressed. By listing the property with the respondent for sale, learning the respondent's terms, and afterwards accepting the fruits of the respondent's exertion an implied promise to pay the charge arose, and the appellant cannot now escape liability by saying that he did not intend to make such an agreement. He should have made known his reservation at the time the statement was made to him. It is too late to make it known for the first time after the respondent had performed on his part, and he had received the benefits of such performance.

But without examining the evidence further, we think it justified the conclusion of the trial court. The judgment will, therefore, stand affirmed.

DONALDSON et al. v. WINNINGHAM et al.

(Supreme Court of Washington. Jan. 30, 1908.)

1. INSANE PERSONS — ADJUDICATION OF INSANITY AND GUARDIANSHIP PROCEEDING — RELATION.

In an action involving the validity of an order to defendant's guardian to sell her land, it was improper to consider the proceeding in which she was adjudged insane and committed to a state hospital, since the validity of the order appointing the guardian depends in no manner upon the validity of the previous adjudication of insanity, no fraud or conspiracy being charged.

2. JUDGMENT—COLLATERAL ATTACK.

On suit against a former owner to recover property, or to quiet a title acquired at a judicial sale, a cross-complaint by the former owner attacking the validity of the order or judgment under which the sale was made is a direct and not a collateral attack on such order or judgment, though mere errors or irregularities not going to the jurisdiction may only be corrected on a direct appeal, or, in the case of a sale by an insane person's guardian, by an appropriate proceeding brought within one year after the disability is removed.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 30, Judgment, §§ 961-965.]

3. INSANE PERSONS—APPOINTMENT OF GUARDIAN—NOTICE—NECESSITY.

Service of notice of the application for the appointment of a guardian upon the insane person, and upon the person having his care, custody, and control, as expressly required by Act March 16, 1903 (Laws 1903, p. 242, c. 130), is jurisdictional, and if no such notice is served, all subsequent proceedings are void.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 27, Insane Persons, § 51.]

4. HOMESTEAD—DECLARATION—NECESSITY FOR FILING.

There can be no homestead right in property acquired since the adoption of Act March 30, 1895 (Laws 1895, p. 109, c. 64), unless a declaration of homestead is executed and filed as expressly required by such act.

Appeal from Superior Court, King County;
R. B. Albertson, Judge.

Action by T. J. Donaldson and another against John W. Winningham and another. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Reversed, and new trial ordered.

J. H. Allen and M. M. Winningham, for appellants. H. E. Foster, for respondents.

RUDKIN, J. The defendants acquired the property in controversy on the 2d day of January, 1902, and occupied the same as their home until the 10th day of January, 1905. On the latter date the defendant Maggie M. Winningham was adjudged insane by the superior court of King county and committed to the Western Washington Hospital for Insane at Fort Steilacoom. On the 2d day of March, 1905, the defendant John W. Winningham was appointed guardian of the person and estate of the defendant Maggie M. Winningham by the same court. On the 18th day of May, 1905, the defendant John W. Winningham for himself and as guardian of the person and estate of his codefendant Maggie M. Winningham conveyed the property to one William Winningham pursuant to an order of the superior court made and entered in the guardianship matter, and William Winningham in turn conveyed to the plaintiffs. The present action was instituted by the plaintiffs to quiet their title as against the Winnings. The court made findings and granted judgment according to the prayer of the complaint, and the defendants have appealed therefrom.

The appellant Maggie M. Winningham by cross-complaint attacked the regularity and validity of the insanity proceedings, as a result of which she was adjudged insane and committed to the hospital for the insane; the regularity and validity of the guardianship proceedings, and the regularity and validity of the order of sale, on the above grounds, and on the further ground that the property was a homestead. The respondents contend that the cross-complaint was a collateral attack on the orders or judgments in the insanity and guardianship proceedings. We may say here that the insanity proceedings have no place in this record. The superior court has jurisdiction to appoint guardians for insane persons wholly independent of its jurisdiction to commit to hospitals for the insane, and the validity of the order appointing the guardian depends in no manner upon the validity of the previous adjudication of insanity. If fraud or conspiracy were charged, a different rule might apply, but no such claim is advanced here. Is this a collateral attack on the guardianship proceedings? We think it is settled by the decisions of this court that, where an action is brought against the former owner to recover property or quiet a title acquired at a judicial sale, a cross-complaint by such former owner attacking the validity of the order or judgment under which the sale was made is a direct and not a collateral attack on such order or judgment. Christofferson v. Pfennig, 16 Wash. 491, 48 Pac. 264; Krutz v. Isaacs, 25 Wash. 566, 66 Pac. 141; Northwestern & P. H. Bank v. Ridpath, 29 Wash. 687, 70 Pac. 139. We do not mean by this that mere errors or irregularities not going to the jurisdiction of the court may be inquired into under such a cross-complaint; for these can only be corrected on a direct appeal, or in a case such as this by an appropriate proceeding instituted by the insane person within one year after the disability is removed. But the jurisdiction of the court to make the order under which the sale was made may be inquired into; and the service of notice of the application for the appointment of a guardian upon the insane person, and upon the person having the care, custody, and control of such insane person, as required by the act of March 16, 1903 (Laws 1903, p. 242, c. 130), is jurisdictional, and if no such notice was served, all subsequent proceedings are null and void. State ex rel. Lowary v. Superior Court, 41 Wash. 450, 83 Pac. 726.

This in our opinion is the only jurisdictional question raised by the cross-complaint or the offer of proof. The question of the sale of a homestead does not arise in this case. While it was held in Curry v. Wilson (Wash.) 87 Pac. 1065, that there was no authority in law for the sale or mortgage of the homestead of an insane person in this state prior to the passage of the homestead act of March 30, 1895 (Laws 1895, p. 109, c. 64)—and there is no pretense that the provisions of that act were complied with here—yet in the case of Whitworth v. McKee, 32 Wash. 83, 72 Pac. 1046, it was held that there is no homestead right in property acquired since the passage of the act of 1895, supra, unless the declaration of homestead is executed and filed as therein provided. The property in controversy was acquired since the passage of that act, and the appellants concede that no declaration of homestead was executed or filed.

This disposes of all of the assignments of error; and for the error in excluding testimony tending to show that no notice of the application for the appointment of a guardian was given or served the judgment is reversed, and a new trial ordered. If on a retrial it should appear that no such notice was given or served, the court will take an accounting between the parties and enter judgment quieting title in the appellants on such terms as may be equitable. If it shall appear that such notice was in fact given, judgment will go for the respondents.

RANKIN v. BLAINE COUNTY BANK.

(Supreme Court of Oklahoma. Jan. 21, 1908.)

1. EVIDENCE—PAROL—PARTIES TO CONTRACT—PRINCIPAL AND AGENT—CONTRACT BY AGENT—ACTION BY PRINCIPAL.

A principal may maintain an action on a written contract made by his agent in his own name, and evidence may properly be admitted to show that the principal was the real party in interest, notwithstanding the rule of law that an agreement reduced to writing may not be contradicted or varied by parol evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 20, Evidence, § 2112.]

2. BANKS AND BANKING—INSOLVENCY—DEPOSITS—COLLATERAL.

Where a bank borrows money from another bank, and authorizes its cashier in his own name to pledge promissory notes taken in the name of the cashier, but belonging to the borrowing bank, as security for the loan, and the loaning bank fails, having on deposit money belonging to the borrowing bank in excess of the amount borrowed on the pledged promissory notes, the borrowing bank may institute suit in its own name against the receiver of the failing bank for the recovery of the promissory notes pledged, and in such suit, upon proper allegation and proof, is entitled to the return of the notes, and to have the sum borrowed on them set off against the amount on deposit.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from District Court, Logan County; J. L. Pancoast, Judge.

Action by the Blaine County Bank against George C. Rankin, receiver of the Capitol National Bank of Guthrie. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Flynn & Ames, for plaintiff in error. Dale & Bierer, for defendant in error.

KANE, J. This is an action brought by the Blaine County Bank, a corporation, against J. A. Willoughby, receiver of the Capitol National Bank of Guthrie, Okl., for the return of certain promissory notes deposited by the Blaine County Bank with the Capitol National Bank as collateral, to secure loans made by the Capitol National Bank to the Blaine County Bank. Since the cause was filed in this court, George C. Rankin, as receiver, was substituted as plaintiff in error, in lieu of Mr. Willoughby.

The plaintiff in error states the facts in his petition below, as follows: "That during the time said Capitol National Bank was engaged in the banking business said plaintiff deposited with said bank, at various times, sums of money, and that at the date said Capitol National Bank failed and closed its doors it had on deposit in said bank, to the credit of plaintiff, the sum of $11,914.89, and on said date also had with said Capitol National Bank the following described notes, to wit: [Here follows description of notes.] Plaintiff states that said notes were placed with the Capitol National Bank under an arrangement and agreement with one Charles E. Billingsley, at that time president of said bank, as security for money advanced to and placed by the Capitol National Bank to the credit of plaintiff herein; that at the time, to wit, April 4, 1904, when said Capitol National Bank ceased doing business, said above-described notes were held by the said Capitol National Bank to secure an advancement made by said last-named bank to the plaintiff bank in the sum of $3,224.25, which sum of money had theretofore been so advanced and placed to the credit of said plaintiff bank upon the books of the Capitol National Bank, and which said sum of money made and constituted a part of the $11,914.89, which the plaintiff bank had on deposit with said Capitol National Bank at the time said Capitol National Bank ceased doing business; and at the time said notes above described were placed in said Capitol National Bank it was agreed by and between the Blaine County Bank, plaintiff herein, and Charles E. Billingsley, as president of the Capitol National Bank, that said notes should be returned to the plaintiff herein as the same became due and payable, and when so returned charged to the account of plaintiff herein upon the books of said Capitol National Bank. Plaintiff alleges that when said Capitol National Bank failed, and the defendant receiver had been appointed and qualified to take charge of the assets of said Capitol National Bank, plaintiff demanded of said receiver a return of said notes so left in said Capitol National Bank, as aforesaid, and that the amount thereof, to wit, the sum of $3,224.25, be charged against the deposit, which said plaintiff had in said Capitol National Bank at the time it failed and ceased doing business, which demand has been by the receiver refused, and said receiver has failed to comply with the demand of plaintiff, and is threatening to, and will, if not restrained, attempt to collect the said notes from the makers thereof, greatly to the injury and detriment of plaintiff."

The following, taken from the statement of defendant in error, in its brief, fairly states the details of the arrangement between the banks, as shown by the evidence: "These notes had been taken by the Blaine County Bank in the name of Ed. S. Wheelock, who was then acting as the cashier of the Blaine County Bank, and had been sent to the Capitol National Bank under a certain arrangement and agreement between the officers of the Blaine County Bank and the Capitol National Bank, whereby the Capitol National Bank was to advance, for the benefit of the Blaine County Bank, the face value of the notes at an agreed rate of interest—at 8 per cent. per annum—during the time such advancements were to run. Under this arrangement the Capitol National Bank advanced the money to Ed. S. Wheelock. Ed. S. Wheelock immediately transferred it to the Blaine County Bank."

The following is a further statement of the facts in relation to these notes taken from the brief of plaintiff in error: "Five of the notes in question are payable to the order of Ed. S. Wheelock at the Blaine County Bank, and are indorsed 'payment guaranteed, Ed. S. Wheelock.' The remaining four notes are payable to the order of Ed. S. Wheelock, cash, and are likewise indorsed, 'payment guaranteed, Ed. S. Wheelock.'

These notes, it seems from the evidence, represented loans made by the Blaine County Bank to some of its customers out of the funds of the bank. The plaintiff in error, defendant below, tried his case on the theory that, at the time of the suspension of the Capitol National Bank, the Blaine County Bank had no right, title, or interest in and to the notes; that the notes were then, and are now, the property of the Capitol National Bank; that the Capitol National Bank purchased them from Ed. S. Wheelock, and they came into the hands of the receiver as part of the assets of the bank. The court submitted the question of the ownership of the notes to the jury, and the jury found as follows: "We, the jury in the above-entitled cause, do, upon our oaths, find that the notes in controversy in this cause were placed in the Capitol National Bank as security for loans and advancements to the plaintiff." Thereupon the court rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiff, from which judgment the defendant appealed to this court.

It is practically conceded by counsel for both parties, if evidence was properly admissible for the purpose of proving that the Blaine County Bank was the owner of the paper and pledged it to the Capitol National Bank as collateral for a loan made by the Capitol National Bank to the Blaine County Bank, that said Blaine County Bank is entitled to the relief it prays for in its petition. But counsel for plaintiff in error, to avoid this conclusion, contends that: "(1) The court erred in refusing to receive evidence as to the general custom of banks in rediscounting negotiable paper. (2) The court erred in submitting special interrogatories to the jury, because such interrogatories called for conclusions from the jury and not for facts. (3) The court erred in rendering judgment in favor of the defendant in error, because (a) the promissory notes in question and the indorsements thereon show that such notes were the property of Ed. S. Wheelock at the time of their transfer to the Capitol National Bank, and the court had no power to take into consideration parol evidence for the purpose of changing, varying or contradicting such instruments; (b) such judgment was not based upon any general verdict of the jury."

There seems to be no serious contention as to the agreement entered into between the two banks. Wheelock and Billingsley substantially agree in their statement of facts, no matter how much they may differ from each other in their conclusions of law. Evidence of a custom alone, unsupported by any other evidence, certainly could not properly be admitted to upset this undisputed contract between the parties authorized to act for the two banks. If such evidence was admitted, it would not join an issue of fact sufficient to send the case to the jury, or justify the court to find contrary to the otherwise uncontradicted testimony supporting the contract. In the case at bar there really was no issue of fact joined by the evidence to be submitted to the jury. The court probably should have taken the case from the jury; but the mere fact that it presented a certain question to the jury, and the jury made a finding that was entirely consistent with the undisputed evidence, does not, to our mind, constitute prejudicial error, if error at all. If the evidence on this point was properly admitted, the court or the jury could possibly come to no other conclusion than the one the jury arrived at, and whether the finding was a finding of fact or a conclusion of law it could in no way injure the plaintiff in error. There being no issue of fact joined by the evidence, it must necessarily follow that a verdict in this case, either special or general, was not necessary, and the record in this court may be examined as though no jury had been impaneled and sworn.

We now come to the assignment of error that reaches the merits of the case: "The court erred in rendering judgment in favor of the defendant in error, because the promissory notes in question and the indorsements thereon show that such notes were the property of Ed. S. Wheelock at the time of their transfer to the Capitol National Bank, and the court had no power to take into consideration parol evidence for the purpose of changing, varying, or contradicting such instruments." We have examined all of the authorities cited by the parties to this suit on the point raised by this last assignment, and believe that the principles governing this case are fairly deducible from them. The doctrine that parol evidence is not admissible to vary the legal import of a written agreement as a general proposition of law is well settled. But counsel for defendant in error argue they are not seeking to vary or change the terms of the promissory notes in question, but are only seeking to show who the principal was in the transactions carried on in relation to them by Ed. S. Wheelock and the Capitol National Bank; that Ed. S. Wheelock, in these transactions, was acting for the defendant in error, and that a principal may maintain an action on a written contract made by his agent in his own name; and that evidence may properly be admitted to show that the principal is the real party in interest, notwithstanding the rule of law that an agreement reduced to writing may not be contradicted or varied by parol evidence. This contention seems to be well supported by the decisions. "The contract of the agent is the contract of the principal, and he may sue or be sued thereon, though not named therein; and notwithstanding the rule of the law that an agreement reduced to writing may not be contradicted or varied by parol, it is well settled that the principal may show that the agent who made the contract in his own name was acting for him. This proof does not contradict the writing; it only explains the transaction. But the agent who binds himself will not be allowed to contradict the writing by proving that he was contracting only as agent, while the same evidence will be admitted to charge the principal. 'Such evidence [says Baron Park] does not deny that the contract binds those whom on its face it purports to bind; but shows that it also binds another, by reason that the act of the agent is the act of the principal.' Ford v. Williams, 21 How. (U. S.) 287, 16 L. Ed. 36. Applying the rule above laid down to the case at bar, it would seem that the Capitol National Bank might have sued Wheelock on the notes, and that Wheelock would not be allowed to contradict the writing by proving that he contracted only as agent; but while this evidence would be inadmissible in the suit against Wheelock, it would be admissible to charge the principal, if the Capitol National Bank brought suit on the notes against the Blaine County Bank.

It seems clear, from an analysis of the foregoing case, that the receiver of the Capitol National Bank might have brought suit against either Wheelock or the Blaine County Bank, and that in the event suit was brought against the Blaine County Bank parol evidence would have been admissible to show that the Blaine County Bank was liable as principal. Why does not the same rule apply in this case where the Blaine County Bank brings suit to recover possession of the notes? We think it does, and it was not error for the court below to admit such evidence.

The only remaining question in the case is the right of the Blaine County Bank to have the amount it owed the Capitol National Bank on these notes set off as a credit in its favor against the amount the Capitol National Bank, at the time of its failure, owed the Blaine County Bank. On this proposition the case of Scott v. Armstrong, 146 U. S. 499, 13 Sup. Ct. 148, 36 L. Ed. 1059, is strongly in point. The facts in the case of Scott v. Armstrong, supra, as stated by Mr. Chief Justice Fuller, are briefly as follows: "No. 53 was an action brought by David Armstrong, receiver of the Fidelity National Bank of Cincinnati, Ohio, against Levi Scott and the Farmers' & Merchants' State Bank, in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of Ohio, upon a promissory note of $10,000, dated at Cincinnati on June 6, 1887, payable ninety days after date, at said Fidelity Bank, with interest after maturity at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum, signed by Scott and indorsed by the Farmers' Bank to the order of the Fidelity Bank. The defendant Scott was the cashier of his codefendant, and pleaded that he signed the note for the accommodation of the banks under an agreement that he should not be looked to for its payment. The Farmers' Bank made the same averments as to Scott, and pleaded a set-off to the amount of $8,809.94, as arising on certain facts, in substance as follows. That the Fidelity Bank lent the Farmers' Bank the $10,000 at a discount at the rate of seven per cent. per annum, for ninety days, under an agreement that the money so borrowed, less the discount, should be placed to the credit of the Farmers' Bank on the books of the Fidelity Bank; that the note in suit was executed accordingly, dated and discounted on June 6, 1887, and the proceeds, $9,819.17, were placed to the credit of the Farmers' Bank, upon the books of the Fidelity Bank, to meet any checks or drafts of the Farmers' Bank, and to pay the note when it became due; that afterwards, and before June 20th, the Farmers' Bank drew against the deposit the sum of $1,009.23, and the balance, $8,809.94, remained to the credit of the defendant to meet the note, and was so to its credit at the time the receiver was appointed; that upon the maturity of the note and before suit was brought defendant tendered to the receiver the sum of $1,190.06, the balance due on the note; and that the tender had since that time been kept good, and the money was now brought into court." On the above state of facts, which are, substantially, the same in principle as the facts in the case at bar, the court held that Scott and the Farmers' & Merchants' Bank did not have a legal right to a set-off, yet equity would afford that relief.

The Oklahoma Code of Civil Procedure abolishes the distinction between actions at law and suits in equity, requires all actions to be brought in the name of the real party in interest, and permits all defenses, counterclaims, and set-offs, whether formerly known as legal or equitable, to be set up therein, and the court entertaining such actions may give all the relief, either legal or equitable, the parties show themselves entitled to. It then does no violence to our practice or procedure to hold that where a bank borrows money from another bank and authorizes its cashier in his own name to pledge promissory notes, taken in the name of the cashier, but belonging to the borrowing bank, as security for the loan, and the loaning bank fails, having on deposit money belonging to the borrowing bank in excess of the amount borrowed on the pledged promissory notes, the borrowing bank may institute suit in its own name against the receiver of the failing bank for the recovery of the promissory notes pledged, and in such suit, on proper allegation and proof, is entitled to the return of the notes, and to have the sum borrowed on them set off against the amount on deposit.

Counsel for plaintiff in error, in their reply brief, state that, "All of the issues in this case are settled by a decision of the Supreme Court of the territory of Oklahoma in the case of Willoughby v. Ball, 18 Okl. 535, 90 Pac. 1017." We think there are a good many points of difference in the two cases. Mr. Justice Burwell, who wrote the opinion in Willoughby v. Ball, 18 Okl. 535, 90 Pac. 1017, distinguishes it from Scott v. Armstrong, 146 U. S. 499, 13 Sup. Ct. 148, 36 L. Ed. 1059, and we are of the opinion that this part of Justice Burwell's opinion also points out the difference between Willoughby v. Ball and the case at bar. Willoughby v. Ball, supra, was a suit commenced by Ball, president of the Bank of Meridian, in his individual capacity, alleging that the Capitol National Bank of Guthrie closed its doors and ceased to do business on or about April 4, 1904; that on or about March 12, 1904, the plaintiff Ball, representing the Bank of Meridian, borrowed from the Capitol National Bank the sum of $2,000 due April 12, 1904, for which he executed his promissory note, which drew 2 per cent. per annum, and the proceeds of the loan were placed to the credit of the Bank of Meridian, and were never withdrawn from the Capitol National Bank; that the plaintiff was authorized by the board of directors of the Bank of Meridian to make this loan in his own name. That the fact that the loan was not made for the benefit of Ball, but for the benefit of the Bank of Meridian, was made known to Mr. Billingsley, the president of the Capitol National Bank, at the time the loan was made. That on April 12, 1904, eight days after the Capitol National Bank failed, the Bank of Meridian requested the national bank examiner, who was then in charge of the Capitol National Bank, to charge said note of Ball's to the account of the Bank of Meridian, cancelling said note and surrender the same, and that the Bank of Meridian had on deposit, at said time, with the Capitol National Bank, the sum of $2,975.25, but that the bank examiner refused to make said charge and surrender said note. The petition then prays for a cancellation of the note, and that the account of the Bank of Meridian and the amount of the note be offset against it. The defendant, as receiver, entered his appearance and filed an answer, which was a general denial, and a cross-petition praying for judgment against Ball on the note. The Bank of Meridian, although it entered its appearance, filed no pleadings in the case. The plaintiff Ball then filed a reply which was a general denial, and then pleaded affirmatively as a defense to the cross-petition of the defendant on the note the agreement between him and the Capitol National Bank wherein it was understood that the loan was to the Bank of Meridian and not to Ball. The court held that the foregoing statement of facts did not constitute a cause of action in favor of Ball against the receiver, and that an objection to the introduction of evidence should have been sustained, mainly, for the reason that the petition shows on its face that Ball was not the real party in interest. Discussing this branch of the case, Justice Burwell says: "The Bank of Meridian, although made a party to the suit, has filed no pleading and asked for no relief. Under the plaintiff's own allegations in his pleadings the deposit in the Capitol National Bank was not his, but was due to the Bank of Meridian."

The above quotation clearly shows that the reason that the Supreme Court held that the demurrer should be sustained to Ball's evidence was that Ball, although he was an officer of the Bank of Meridian, could not, in his individual capacity, claim a set-off for it against the receiver; but that the ruling of the court would have been different if the suit was brought in the name of the Bank of Meridian, as this one is brought in the name of the Blaine County Bank, is clearly gathered from another statement by Mr. Justice Burwell in the Ball Case: "Although he may be interested in the bank, he cannot protect its right in an action in his individual name; if it is true that the debt is due from the Bank of Meridian and not from Ball, and it desires that its balance in the Capitol National Bank be set off against the debt represented by the note, it must ask for such relief. Every action or defense must be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest, and where one having a legal right sits indifferently by, and fails to enforce it, a stranger will not be permitted to do so for him." In relation to Ball's rights under proper pleading and proof, the court held that, "While a principal debtor may set off a debt due from the plaintiff to him in an action against him and his surety jointly, the surety cannot do so on his own motion, unless he shows the insolvency of his principal, and his inability to obtain a relief either in an action brought by him, or as a defense to an action on the note; and, even then, the principal debtor should be made a party to the suit."

In the case at bar the Blaine County Bank is prosecuting its own suit against the receiver, and it desires that the amount it owes the Capitol National Bank be set off against its deposit, and asks for such relief. The court is of the opinion that it is entitled to the relief prayed for, and, finding no material error in the proceedings of the court below, it follows that the judgment of the court below must be affirmed. It is so ordered. All the Justices concurring, except HAYES, J., who was disqualified, not sitting.

HARDING v. GARBER, Judge.

(Supreme Court of Oklahoma. Dec. 28, 1907.)

1. APPEAL—REVERSAL—REMAND—PROCEDURE BELOW.

A mandate from a superior court to an inferior court that reverses an order setting aside a decree of foreclosure, and that directs an order to be made in the foreclosure proceeding that will permit G., one of the defendants therein, to appear, plead, and defend, but that will not disturb the possession of H., who in the opinion of the court from which the mandate is issued is a mortgagee in possession, does not deprive the inferior court of jurisdiction to appoint a receiver, when legal grounds therefor exist.

2. MORTGAGES—FORECLOSURE—MORTGAGEE IN POSSESSION—RECEIVER.

A mortgagee in possession may be divested of possession by appointment of a receiver, when it appears that the mortgagee is irresponsible, or that the rents and profits will be lost or be in danger of loss, or that the mortgagee is committing waste upon or materially injuring the premises.

3. MANDAMUS—WHEN LIES.

The writ of mandamus does not lie from a superior court to an inferior court to control its judicial action.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Application of Daniel W. Harding for writ of mandamus to M. C. Garber, judge of the district court of Garfield county. Writ denied.

Relator's petition, after omitting caption and exhibits, is:

"The relator, Daniel W. Harding, represents and shows to this court: That on, to wit, the ——— day of ———, 1896, one John Romig held a mortgage on the east half of the northeast quarter of section eighteen (18), in township twenty-two (22) north, of range six (6) west of the Indian meridian, in Garfield county, Okl. T. That the apparent legal title to said land was at the time in one Myrtle Gillett. That said mortgage became in default, and said Romig brought suit to foreclose said mortgage in the district court of Garfield county, Okl. T., and cause proper service by publication to be made on Myrtle Gillett, the apparent owner of said land. That said Romig obtain judgment in said court foreclosing his said mortgage. That said land was sold under the judgment of said court to said John Romig, and the sale duly confirmed, and sheriff's deed executed and recorded, and said Romig then went into possession of said land. That the record of all said proceedings in said court are regular. That thereafter John Romig sold and conveyed said land to the relator, Daniel W. Harding, who immediately went into possession of said land, and has continued in absolute and exclusive possession of said land down to the date of filing this application. That this relator bought said land, relying upon the record in said cause, and without any knowledge of adverse claims to said lands, based upon any matters dehors the record in said cause, and this applicant paid full value for said land in good faith, and has, since entering the possession of said land, permanently improved the same, paid taxes, effected insurance and repairs amounting in the aggregate to over $7,000. That afterwards, and during the year 1898, Myrtle Gillett appeared in said district court and filed her motion in the cause of Romig v. Myrtle Gillett (in which the mortgage was foreclosed, and the land sold to Romig as aforesaid) to set aside foreclosure, judgment, and all proceedings had thereunder, for the alleged reason that the said judgment was void because she, as defendant in said action, was a resident of Oklahoma at the time service by publication was obtained on her in said action as a nonresident. That upon said motion said court entered an order setting aside foreclosure, judgment, and all proceedings had thereunder, and ordered this applicant forthwith dispossessed from said land because said court held said judgment was void. That this applicant duly appealed from said order to the Supreme Court of Oklahoma, and that court, on consideration of said appeal, affirmed the order of the lower court in all things. That from the decision of said Supreme Court this applicant appealed to the Supreme Court of the United States, and that court, in the month of November, A. D. 1902, upon consideration of the appeal of this applicant, reversed the judgment of the Supreme Court of Oklahoma in words and figures as follows, to wit: 'The decision of the Supreme Court of Oklahoma will be reversed, and the cause remanded to that court, with instructions to set aside the order of the trial court, and to direct the entry of one which without disturbing the possession of Harding will give to the appellee the right to appear, plead, and make such defense as under the facts of the case and the principles of equity she is entitled to.' A full and complete copy of said mandate is hereto attached as Exhibit A, and made part hereof. That upon said mandate this court issued its mandate to the trial court, to wit: The district court of Garfield county, Okl. T., directing said trial court to set aside the judgment in foreclosure, and to enter an order allowing Myrtle Gillett to appear, plead, and make such defense as under the facts of the case and the principles of equity she may be entitled, 'and that the possession of Daniel W. Harding to the land in controversy be not disturbed, pending said proceedings, and that his rights and interests in the premises be determined in said cause.' A full and complete copy of said mandate is hereto attached, and made a part thereof, marked 'Exhibit B.' That upon said mandate the district court entered its order allowing Myrtle Gillett to plead. A copy of said order is hereto attached and made part hereof as Exhibit C. That in pursuance of said order Myrtle Gillett appeared in said court and filed her pleading, alleging that she had sold all her interest in the land to George P. Rush and Bruce Sanders, and that her only interest in the matter was a vendor's lien of $250. That Rush & Sanders held the equity of redemption in and to said land; asked that they be made parties; asked that an accounting be taken of the rents and profits received by Harding, and that they be applied on the payment of the mortgage of Romig; alleged that Harding was a mortgagee in possession, Rush & Sanders filed a motion to be made parties. This motion the lower court overruled. This applicant and John Romig each moved for judgment on the pleadings, and the lower court sustained said motions. A copy of said judgment is hereto attached, and made part hereof as Exhibit D. That thereafter Myrtle Gillett appealed from said judgment to the Supreme Court of Oklahoma, and that court reversed the judgment of the lower court, rendering judgment on the pleadings, and to make Rush & Sanders parties, and to proceed further in accordance with said opinion. That from this judgment of the Supreme Court of Oklahoma this applicant appealed to the Supreme Court of the United States, and said court dismissed said appeal because the decision of the Supreme Court of Oklahoma was not a final decision, and did not fix the substantial law of the case. That the mandate of the Supreme Court of Oklahoma, based on the order of the United States Supreme Court dismissing the appeal of this applicant, was filed in the district court of Garfield county, Oklahoma, on or about the 31st day of May, 1907. That said cause now stands for trial under the several mandates of the Supreme Courts. That no judgment has ever been rendered in said cause on the pleadings of Myrtle Gillett or her grantees, Rush & Sanders, nor has any accounting ever been taken or any trial had, nor has said cause ever been set for trial. That notwithstanding these facts the said George P. Rush and Bruce Sanders gave this applicant notice that they would present their application for the appointment of a receiver in said cause to take possession of said land and collect the rents and profits thereof, to preserve the same pending the trial. That said application for a receiver was presented to Hon. M. C. Garber, judge of said court, on the 10th day of June, 1907, upon the said application for a receiver, and the answer of the relator to said application, and the demurrer of said applicants to all that portion of relator's answer which pleaded and set out the mandate of the Supreme Court of the United States, and the mandate of this court, to the effect that relator's possession should not be disturbed pending the trial.

"Relator alleges that said Judge M. C. Garber sustained a demurrer to his plea that said mandate protected him in his possession until after said trial, and refused to consider said mandates. Relator further says that the further hearing of said application was by said judge continued until June 20, 1907, and on said date said judge did appoint a receiver in this cause to take possession of said land and collect the rents and profits thereof (a certified copy of said order is hereto attached as Exhibit E), and your relator alleges that unless this court grants a writ of mandamus to compel said judge to obey said mandates, and desist from disturbing the possession of this relator pending the trial in this cause, said judge will enforce the appointment of said receiver, and dispossess this relator, based on his decision that said mandates do not prohibit him from appointing a receiver and taking possession of said land pending said hearing. Your relator alleges that he has no adequate remedy at law by which he can compel said lower court to obey said mandates; but relator alleges that a receiver has been appointed in violation of said mandates, and he has no other remedy than by the mandate of this court, enforcing its mandate.

"Wherefore applicant prays that a peremptory writ of mandamus issue, directed to Hon. M. C. Garber, compelling him to obey the mandate of this court, and not disturb the possession of the applicant by appointing a receiver or otherwise, and to vacate the order appointing said receiver, and all proper relief."

To relator's petition respondent interposed a general demurrer, and upon relator's petition and respondent's demurrer case is submitted to this court.

It is necessary to an understanding of this action that a brief history of the litigation out of which it has grown be given. This action grows out of a suit brought in the district court of Garfield county on the 11th day of March, 1896, by John Romig against Don A. Gillett and Myrtle Gillett, to recover a judgment against Don A. Gillett for $749, with interest and attorney's fees, and to foreclose a certain mortgage, executed by Don A. Gillett to John Romig upon real estate situated in Garfield county, Okl., to secure said indebtedness. On the 18th day of December, 1896, judgment was rendered by the court in favor of John Romig for the amount sued for and foreclosing the mortgage. Sale of the land was afterwards made under the decree of foreclosure, and confirmed by the court. At the sale John Romig, the plaintiff in the action, and the mortgagee under the mortgage foreclosed, became the purchaser of the land involved. On the 9th day of March, 1897, John Romig sold said premises to Daniel W. Harding, the relator in this action. Subsequently, on the 17th day of March, 1898, Myrtle Gillett filed her motion to set aside the judgment and decree of foreclosure upon different grounds, which are not necessary to be repeated here. The court sustained the motion of Myrtle Gillett to vacate the judgment of foreclosure and order her restored to the possession of the premises of which she had been wrongfully dispossessed. From this judgment plaintiffs Romig and Harding appealed to the Supreme Court of Oklahoma Territory. The Supreme Court of Oklahoma affirmed the judgment of the trial court. John Romig and Daniel W. Harding v. Myrtle Gillett, 10 Okl. 186, 62 Pac. 805. From this judgment Romig and Harding appealed to the Supreme Court of the United States. The Supreme Court of the United States reversed the decree of the Supreme Court of Oklahoma, and remanded the case to that court, with directions to set aside the order of the trial court, and to direct the entry of an order which, without disturbing the possession of Harding, would give the appellee Myrtle Gillett the right to appear, plead, and make such defense as under the facts of the case and the principles of equity she was entitled to. John Romig and Daniel W. Harding v. Myrtle Gillett, 187 U. S. 111, 23 Sup. Ct. 40, 47 L. Ed. 97. A mandate was issued from the Supreme Court of the United States to the Supreme Court of Oklahoma, in obedience to which the Supreme Court of Oklahoma issued its mandates to the district court of Garfield county. Certified copies of these mandates are attached as exhibits to relator's petition in this action, and contain respectively the language quoted in relator's petition. The district court of Garfield county, with James K. Beauchamp sitting as judge, in obedience to the mandate of the Supreme Court of Oklahoma, on the 1st day of June, 1903, made an order vacating and setting aside the judgment and decree of foreclosure made in the case by that court on the 18th day of December, 1896, and permitting Myrtle Gillett to appear, plead, and defend. A copy of this order is attached to relator's petition in this action. On December 1, 1903, Myrtle Gillett entered her appearance in the original action in the district court of Garfield county, and filed an answer and cross-petition. Subsequently Daniel W. Harding, the grantee of Romig, filed an answer on cross-petition to the answer and cross-petition of Myrtle Gillett. After various answers and cross-petitions and replies thereto had been filed, Romig and Harding moved the court for judgment on the pleadings, which motion was by the court sustained, and the decree of foreclosure rendered by that court on the 18th day of December, 1896, in favor of Romig against the Gilletts, was reinstated, confirmed, and ratified. This judgment on the appeal of Myrtle Gillett to the Supreme Court of Oklahoma was reversed. Gillett v. Romig et al., 17 Okl. 324, 87 Pac. 325. From this judgment of the Supreme Court of Oklahoma appeal was taken by Romig and Harding to the Supreme Court of the United States, which appeal was dismissed by that court. George P. Rush and Bruce Sanders, who had become the grantees of Myrtle Gillett, and who had become interpleaders in the original action pending in the district court of Garfield county on the 10th day of June, 1907, made application to the respondent in this action for an order appointing a receiver in said action to take charge of the land in controversy, and collect the rents and profits therefrom. On the 20th day of June, 1907, respondent, as judge of the district court of Garfield county, granted the application, and made an order appointing a receiver as prayed for.

Relator alleges that under the language of the Supreme Court of the United States, quoted in his petition as follows: "The decision of the Supreme Court of Oklahoma will be reversed, and the case remanded to that court, with instructions to set aside the order of the trial court, and to direct the entry of one, which, without disturbing the possession of Harding, will give to the appellee the right to appear, plead, and make such defense as under the facts in the case and the principals of equity she is entitled to," and under the language of the mandate of the Supreme Court of Oklahoma quoted in his petition as follows: "* * * and that the possession of Daniel W. Harding to the land in controversy be not disturbed pending said proceedings, and that his rights and interest be determined in said cause"—the respondent was without jurisdiction to make the order made by him on the 20th day of June, 1907, appointing a receiver, and that said order is in violation of the mandates of the Supreme Court of Oklahoma, and of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Moore & Moore and Buckner & Buckner, for relator. C. G. Hornor, H. G. Sturgis, and James W. Steen, for respondent.

HAYS, J. (after stating the facts as above). The principal question presented to this court by the pleadings before it is whether the respondent, as judge of the district court of Garfield county, under the mandates of the Supreme Court of the United States, and of the Supreme Court of Oklahoma, directing that an order be made by the trial court in the principal case, which, without disturbing the possession of Harding, would give to the appellee Myrtle Gillett the right to appear, plead, and make such defense as under the facts in the case and the principles of equity she was entitled to, had jurisdiction to hear the application for or make an order appointing a receiver to take possession of the land and premises in controversy.

Counsel for relator contends that the mandates of the Supreme Court of the United States and of the Supreme Court of Oklahoma fix the status of the relator in the principal action, pending the final termination thereof; that the effect of said mandates is to give the relator a final judgment for the possession of said land and premises, pending the final termination of the original action; and that his status thus fixed cannot be changed prior to that time, and that until such termination of said action he has by virtue of said mandates possession of said land and premises as the owner thereof, not subject to the control of any court. In determining what was presented to and decided by a court, it is proper to look both to the opinion and mandate of the court. Guadalupe Thompson, Administratrix, et al. v. Maxwell Land Grant & Railway Co., 168 U. S. 451, 18 Sup. Ct. 121, 42 L. Ed. 539. In which case the court said: "We take judicial notice of our own opinions; and, although the judgment and mandate express the decision of the court, yet we may properly examine the opinion in order to determine what matters were considered, upon what grounds the judgment was entered, and what has become settled for future disposition of the case." The mandate of the Supreme Court of the United States from which relator quotes in his petition contains this further language: "You therefore are hereby commanded that such action and further proceedings be had in said cause in conformity with the opinion and decree of this court. * * *" Mr. Justice Brewer, who delivered the opinion of the court, in discussing the rights of Harding, who was one of the appellants before the court, said: "Harding, as the grantee of a purchaser at a foreclosure sale, stands in the shoes of the mortgagee. Bryan v. Brasius, 162 U. S. 415, 16 Sup. Ct. 803, 40 L. Ed. 1022. As shown by the opinion in that case and cases cited therein a mortgagee, who enters into possession, not forcibly, but peaceably, and under authority of a foreclosure proceeding, cannot be dispossessed by the mortgagor, or one claiming under him, so long as the mortgage debt remains unpaid." If, in determining what was decided by the Supreme Court of the United States, and if, in construing its mandate, we consider in connection therewith, as we should, the opinion of the court, it appears that it was decided by that court that the order of the trial court setting aside the judgment and decree of foreclosure, and directing that Harding be dispossessed of the premises, should be vacated, and that such order should be made as would protect the rights of both parties, an order that would give Myrtle Gillett an opportunity to appear, plead, and defend in the foreclosure proceedings, to do which, would require that the judgment and decree of foreclosure be opened; but that since Harding had come peaceably into possession of the mortgaged premises as the grantee of the mortgagee, who was the purchaser under the foreclosure proceedings, his rights, pending the final termination of the action, were those of a mortgagee in possession, and as such should be protected. It is our opinion that it was the intention of the Supreme Court of the United States by its mandate to protect, and that its mandate and the mandate of the Supreme Court of Oklahoma do protect, Harding only in that possession which the Supreme Court of the United States said under the conditions Harding had, which was the possession of a mortgagee. This is the construction that has been given to the judgment and opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States by the Supreme Court of Oklahoma. Gillett v. Romig et al., 17 Okl. 324, 87 Pac. 325.

The mortgagee in possession holds the estate as a mere trustee for his indemnity. He must perform the duties of his trust. He must apply the rents and profits for the purpose of the mortgage, and must treat the property as a provident owner would. A court of equity will compel him to perform these duties of his trust. It is a general rule of law that the mortgagee, or his grantee, who has come peaceably into possession of the mortgaged property, cannot be dispossessed of same so long as the mortgage debt remains unpaid; but if it appears that the mortgagee is irresponsible, or that the rents and profits will be lost or be in danger of loss, or that the mortgagee is committing waste upon or materially injuring the premises, a receiver may be appointed. 20 Amer. & Eng. Enc. of Law (2d Ed.) 1008; 2 Pingrey on Mortgages, § 1796; Boston & Providence R. R. Co. v. Railway Co., 12 R. I. 220. The judgments and mandates of the Supreme Court of the United States and of the Supreme Court of Oklahoma protect Harding, pending the termination of the principal action, only in that possession which he had, which, under the opinion the Supreme Court of the United States, was the possession of a mortgagee. As long as Harding discharges the duties of his trust, he should be protected in that possession; but from the authorities cited, supra, it is seen that the possession of a mortgagee may be divested when it appears that the mortgagee is irresponsible, or that the rents and profits will be lost or be in danger of loss, or that the mortgagee is committing waste upon or materially injuring the premises, and that a receiver may be appointed.

An application for the appointment of a receiver in the principal action now pending in the district court of Garfield county, containing allegations for the appointment of a receiver on the grounds above mentioned, would be such an application as the court would have jurisdiction to hear, and the act of the court in granting or refusing the same would be a judicial act. The application for the appointment of a receiver presented to respondent is not before this court, and in the absence of the same it will be presumed that it contained legal grounds to warrant the action of the court.

The writ of mandamus does not lie from a superior court to an inferior court to control its judicial acts, or its exercise of judicial discretion. Merrill on Mandamus, 32.

It is the opinion of the court that respondent's demurrer to relator's petition should be sustained, and the writs of peremptory mandamus denied, and it is so ordered. All the Justices concurring.

ALBERTI v. MOORE et al.

(Supreme Court of Oklahoma. Jan. 21, 1908.)

1. MECHANICS' LIENS — STATEMENT — AMENDMENT.

Where, in an action foreclosing a subcontractor's or materialman's lien, in which the original statement filed inaccurately states the name of the party sought to be charged, and erroneously describes the property intended to be subjected to the lien, the court in the exercise of its discretion, and in the furtherance of justice, may allow such lien claimant to file an amended statement, and foreclose the same.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 34, Mechanics' Liens, §§ 275-278.]

2. SAME—PERSONAL JUDGMENT.

A subcontractor, materialman, or workman, between whom and the owner there is no privity of contract, and in whose favor no direct liability has been imposed upon the owner, is not entitled to a personal judgment against the owner. The judgment rendered should be a personal one against the original contractor, and a decree establishing a lien and ordering the sale of the real estate or other property, as in other cases of sales of real estate.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 34, Mechanics' Liens, §§ 632-634.]

3. SAME—PARTIES.

An employé of a subcontractor or materialman, who filed a lien against the property improved, and who in a suit brought by his principal to foreclose his own lien is made a party, but is not served with process, files no pleading, and makes no appearance either personally or by counsel, is not in court, and the court has no such jurisdiction as will warrant it in awarding a judgment in his favor.

4. SAME—JUDGMENT OVER AGAINST CONTRACTOR.

The owner of a lot, who makes an agreement with a firm of contractors to construct a building thereon for a specific sum, and who under the terms of the contract pays them therefor within 60 days of the time when the last material is furnished, and whose property is, in a suit, subjected to a subcontractor's or materialman's lien, is entitled, in the same action, to recover a judgment against the contractors for the full amount of the judgment, interest, and costs, recovered by such subcontractor or materialman, and established as a lien against his property.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from District Court, Kay County; Bayard T. Halner, Judge.

Action by O. H. P. Moore and others against George Alberti. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant brings error. Modified.

This is an action brought in the district court of Kay county, Okl. T., for the purpose of foreclosing a mechanics' lien on lot 13, in block 33, in the town of Newkirk, Okl., property of George Alberti, plaintiff in error. The material facts out of which this controversy grows are as follows: August 1, 1898, George Alberti entered into a written contract with John H. Pierce and Jesse Thomas, under which they agreed to build on the said lot a stone building, contractors therein furnishing all materials, and to construct it for a stipulated price. Under this agreement the structure was erected, and the price agreed upon, with the exception of $27.81, was paid by Alberti to Pierce and Thomas. Thereafter, and on September 27, 1898, there was filed in the office of the clerk of the district court of Kay county a mechanics' lien statement, wherein Joseph Alberti was charged as debtor to O. H. P. Moore and J. H. Helms, partners, for materials furnished in erecting a two-story building on lot 13, block 15, town of Newkirk, Kay county, Okl. T., from August 15, 1898, to September 20, 1898, consisting of the balance due on 84 cords and 49 feet of stone at $3.65 per cord, $274.80. Notice of this lien seems to have been served upon George Alberti, plaintiff in error, on September 27, 1898. On October 3, 1898, there was filed in said office a mechanics' lien of Jesse Anderson, in which was claimed the sum of $80.40 against lot 13, block 33, town of Newkirk, Okl. T. No notice of this lien appears to have been served, and in the subsequent proceedings Anderson filed no pleading, nor did he appear in court either in person or by attorney. On the 13th day of February, 1899, O. H. P. Moore and J. H. Helms, as partners, filed their petition against Joseph Alberti, defendant, pleading the contract between Alberti and Pierce and Thomas for the construction of the building, praying for judgment against the defendant for the sum of $274.80, with interest thereon at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum from September 20, 1898, and for the foreclosure of their mechanics' lien above mentioned. Summons was issued to Joseph Alberti, and served upon George Alberti, who entered his appearance, and filed as answer a general denial, and the case came on for trial on the 30th day of March, 1899. Parties, plaintiff and defendant, introduced their evidence and rested, whereupon the court ordered that all lien claimants and contractors interested in the subject-matter of this action should be made parties defendant. Whereupon plaintiffs asked leave to amend their petition and to file an amended statement of their lien claim, which was granted, and to which the defendant excepted. On April 10, 1899, the plaintiffs virtually began a new action, but entitled their pleading filed an amended petition, in which there was made defendants George Alberti, John H. Pierce, Jesse Thomas, and Jesse W. Aldridge. In this petition it was pleaded that plaintiff Moore had succeeded to all the interest of the partnership of Moore and Helms in the contract for stone used in the construction of the stone building; that the defendants George Alberti, John Pierce, and Jesse Thomas had agreed to pay said plaintiff the sum of $3.65 per cord for the stone furnished; that there was then due and owing from the defendants Alberti, Pierce, and Thomas to plaintiff a balance of $274.80, for which, against all of them, he asked judgment. Moore also, in accordance with the rule of the court, filed an amended lien statement, and prayed that the lien be foreclosed against the premises involved. Summons was issued and served on all the defendants except Aldridge. John Pierce filed separate answer, setting up the contract for the erection of the building, and alleging that he and the defendant Jesse Thomas had a verbal agreement by which said Thomas agreed to furnish the stone for $3.65 per cord, and that he had been fully paid for the same, and that Thomas had no other or further interest in the contract. He then denied all the other allegations in plaintiff's petition, and asked to be discharged, with costs. George Alberti filed his answer alleging that he was the owner of lot 13, in block 33, in the town of Newkirk, Kay county, Okl. T., and that the only contract he entered into regarding the construction of the building on said lot was by and between himself, John Pierce, and Jesse Thomas, and that under the terms of said contract, the said Pierce and Thomas were to furnish all materials required for the consideration of $728, all of which sum had been paid with the exception of $27.81, which was paid into court for the use and benefit of the party entitled thereto, and praying that in the event judgment be rendered against his property that he recover judgment against John H. Pierce and Jesse Thomas for the amount thereof, with his costs. Jesse Thomas for his answer admitted the signing of the contract, but denied that he was in any way indebted to defendant George Alberti. Upon the issues thus framed, a jury being waived, the cause came on for hearing on September 9, 1899, before the court, who, after hearing all of the evidence, rendered a judgment in favor of plaintiff O. H. P. Moore, and against the defendant George Alberti, for the sum of $193, and his costs, and a judgment in favor of Jesse W. Aldridge and against George Alberti in the sum of $80.40, and for his costs, and decreed the said judgment a first lien on the premises above described, foreclosing the same, denying the prayer of Alberti's answer for judgment against Pierce and Thomas, or either of them, and providing that John Pierce and Jesse Thomas recover their costs against said Alberti. On September 13, 1899, Alberti filed his motion for new trial, and on its presentation the court modified the judgment, assessing the amount of plaintiff's recovery in the sum of $145.20, and Jesse Aldridge's recovery in the sum of $59.57, overruling the motion as to the balance of the judgment, to which exception was saved by Alberti, and the case brought to this court for review.

W. S. Cline and Ira A. Hill, for plaintiff in error. Virgil H. Brown, J. L. Roberson, and McGinnis & Woodson, for defendants in error.

DUNN, J. (after stating the facts as above). Under our statutes, and the facts as developed in this case, Moore occupies the position of a materialman, and is entitled to a lien by virtue thereof. He furnished the stone to Pierce and Thomas with which they constructed the building, and which, under their contract, they were bound to furnish for the sum agreed upon with Alberti. Section 631, c. 68, Code Civ. Proc. St. Okl. 1893, sets out the conditions under which Moore could obtain a lien against the building or property on which such material was used: "Any person who shall furnish any such material or perform such labor under a subcontract with the contractor, or as an artisan or day laborer in the employ of such contractor, may obtain a lien upon such land from the same time, in the same manner, and to the same extent as the original contractor, for the amount due him for such material and labor; and any artisan or day laborer in the employ of such subcontractor, may obtain a lien upon such land from the same time, in the same manner, and to the same extent as the subcontractor, for the amount due him for such material and labor, by filing with the clerk of the district court of the county in which the land is situated, within sixty days after the date upon which material was last furnished or labor last performed under such subcontract, a statement, verified by affidavit, setting forth the amount due from the contractor to the claimant, and the items thereof as nearly as practicable, the name of the owner, the name of the contractor, the name of the claimant, and a description of the property upon which a lien is claimed; and by serving a notice in writing of the filing of such lien upon the owner of the land; Provided, that if with due diligence the owner cannot be found in the county where the land is situated, the claimant, after filing an affidavit setting forth such facts, may serve a copy of such statement upon the occupant of the land, or if the land be unoccupied, may post such copy in a conspicuous place upon the land or any building thereon. Immediately upon the filing of such statement the clerk of said court shall enter a record of the same in the docket provided for in section six hundred and fifty of this act, and in the manner therein specified: Provided, that the owner of any land affected by such lien shall not thereby become liable to any claimant for any greater amount than he contracted to pay the original contractor; but the risk of all payments made to the original contractor shall be upon such owner until the expiration of the sixty days heretofore specified; and no owner shall be liable to an action by such contractor until the expiration of said sixty days, and such owner may pay such subcontractor the amount due him from such contractor for such labor and material, and the amount so paid shall be held and deemed a payment of said amount to the original contractor." The foregoing section is the one under which Moore attempted to act when he filed his lien in the office of the clerk of the district court against Joseph Alberti instead of George Alberti, and running the lien upon lot 13, in block 15, instead of lot 13, in block 33. The notice served misspelled the name of Alberti, and it was addressed to Joseph instead of George, and, in addition thereto, likewise gave the wrong description of the property involved. When the suit was brought Joseph Alberti was made defendant, summons was issued to him, and served upon George Alberti, who answered by a general denial. On hearing the cause the errors of the lien statement developed, and the court, on considering the matter, permitted the making and filing of an amended lien statement correcting the error made in the original. To this action the defendant excepted, and his first specification of error is directed to this point.

Section 653, c. 66, St. Okl. 1893, provides: "Any lien provided for by this act may be enforced by civil action in the district court of the county in which the land is situated. * * * The practice, pleading, and proceedings in such action, shall conform to the rules prescribed by the Code of Civil Procedure as far as the same may be applicable; and in case of action brought, any statement may be amended by leave of court in furtherance of justice as pleadings may be in any matter, except as to the amount claimed." In addition to this, section 139, c. 63, St. Okl., provides that: "The court may, before or after judgment, in furtherance of justice, and on such terms as may be proper, amend any pleading, process or proceeding, by adding or striking out the name of any party, or correcting a mistake in the name of a party, or a mistake in any other respect, or by inserting other allegations material to the case." These sections, taken together, in our judgment, give ample authority to the court in the exercise of its discretion to allow the amendment to be made. The plaintiff in error, Alberti, under the contract which he had made with Pierce and Thomas, was in no wise prejudiced by this amendment. In carrying out the contract that he had made for the construction of his building he had paid out prior to the expiration of the 60 days provided for in section 651, c. 66, Okl. St., practically all of the money due on this contract. This it will be seen from the same section he did at his peril; and this money would have been paid out as it was without reference to whether Moore's lien statement was accurate or inaccurate, for it was paid prior to the filing thereof, so that as the amendment in no wise changed the position of plaintiff in error he has no right to complain. The court committed no error in allowing the amended statement to be filed. The statute is a remedial one, and should be liberally construed to effect its purpose. El Reno Electric Light & Telephone Co. v. W. R. Jennison, 5 Okl. 759, 50 Pac. 144. Where in an action foreclosing a subcontractor's or materialman's lien, in which the original statement filed inaccurately states the name of the party sought to be charged, and erroneously described the property intended to be subjected to the lien, the court in the exercise of its discretion, and in the furtherance of justice, may allow such lien claimant to file an amended statement, and foreclose the same. This conclusion disposes of plaintiff's first and fifth assignments of error.

Plaintiff's second and third assignments of error both raise the question of the legality of the personal judgment rendered in favor of Moore and Aldridge against plaintiff in error for the amount found due on their claims. In these objections the court agree.

There was no privity of contract between Moore and Aldridge and Alberti. The owner of the premises (Alberti) had engaged Pierce and Thomas to furnish everything and do the constructing agreed on in the contract. This is consented to be the fact by all parties to this controversy, so Moore and Aldridge were not entitled to a personal judgment against Alberti. "A subcontractor, materialman, or workman between whom and the owner there is no privity of contract, and in whose favor no direct liability has been imposed upon the owner, is not entitled to a personal judgment against the owner." 27 Cyc. 436, and cases cited. There exists no such privity between a materialman or a subcontractor as will permit him to take a personal judgment for the amount of his debt against the owner. The party or parties with whom he contracts are the original contractors, and they alone as between the two are personally responsible to him. By authority of the statute, and this only, he is permitted to subject the property improved to the payment of his claim, but he can do this only in a suit, as provided in section 653, c. 66, St. Okl. 1893, et seq., in which such original contractor is a party defendant and it is essential before he can enforce his lien against the property that he first secure against the original contractor a judgment for the amount which he seeks to have levied on the property. Our statutes provide that: "In actions of this character, all persons whose liens are filed as herein provided, and other incumbrances shall be made parties." The Court of Appeals of Colorado, in the case of Estey v. Hallack & Howard Lumber Company, 4 Colo. App. 165, 34 Pac. 1114, in passing upon a case similar to this, citing the case of Davis v. Lumber Company, 2 Colo. App. 381, 31 Pac. 187, says: "Davis v. Lumber Co., supra, is conclusive of this case. The necessity of making the contractor a party is carefully examined, and discussed fully. The court said: 'It has been often held that the contractor was an indispensable party to the action. With this we agree, and adjudge that the contractor is not only a proper, but a necessary and indispensable, party against whom a debt must be established as the foundation of the decree for the foreclosure of the lien.' This conclusion is well sustained by authority. See Phil. Mech. Liens, art. 397; Vreeland v. Ellsworth, 71 Iowa, 347, 32 N. W. 374; Kerns v. Flynn, 51 Mich. 573, 17 N. W. 62; Sinnickson v. Lynch, 25 N. J. Law, 817; Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 714, 24 L. Ed. 565. The conclusion is founded on principle and sound legal logic. No privity of contract exists between the owner and the subcontractor. The contractor is the primary debtor. If the amount could be collected from him, there would be no resulting claim against the property of the owner. The claim against the property is secondary, ancillary. Not only must there be a primary judgment against the contractor, but there must be an adjudication or settlement of the amount due subcontractors—matters of which the owner can have no knowledge whatever—and, in order to fix the amount for which subcontractors could charge the property, an adjudication or accounting between the owner and the contractor is indispensable." Pierce and Thomas contracted to erect a building for plaintiff in error for a specific sum. They required stone to carry out their contract. Moore furnished this stone. They became indebted to him therefor, and by complying with certain requirements the statute gave Moore by reason of these facts a lien against Alberti's lot and building; but it is a right to subject the property improved to the payment of the debt, not a right to a personal judgment against the owner. "The lien given by the statute to materialmen is neither a jus in re, nor a jus ad rem, but simply a right to charge the property affected by it with the payment of the particular debt, in preference and priority to other debts, on compliance with the requisitions of the statute; and it is inchoate until perfected by the rendition of a judgment in rem in the mode pointed out by the statute." Porter & Co. v. Miles, 67 Ala. 130; 27 Cyc. 430, and cases cited. Furthermore, section 654, c. 66, St. Okl. 1893, provides: "Where such action brought by a subcontractor, or other person not the original contractor, such original contractor shall be made a party defendant, and shall at his own expense defend against the claim of every subcontractor, or other person claiming a lien under this act, and if he fails to make such defense the owner may make same at the expense of such contractor; and until all such claims, costs and expenses, are finally adjudicated, and defeated or satisfied, the owner shall be entitled to retain from the contractor the amount thereof, and such costs and expenses as he may be required to pay." By this it will be seen that our statute precludes the idea of a personal judgment being taken by a subcontractor or materialman against the owner on the foreclosure of a lien filed by them. The judgment rendered should be a personal one against the original contractor, and a decree establishing a lien and ordering the sale of the real estate or other property, as in other cases of sales of real estate. St. Okl. 1893, c. 66, § 656.

Exception is taken to the judgment rendered in favor of Jesse W. Aldridge in the sum of $59.57. Aldridge, as appears from the evidence, was employed by Moore to haul the stone used in the building at $1.65 per cord. Moore had agreed to furnish it for $3.65 per cord. Moore owed Aldridge personally for the hauling of this stone, and filed claim for the same with his original and amended statements. Aldridge filed a mechanics' lien statement in his own behalf for the amount, but his action was not a waiver of his claim against Moore, nor did it relieve Moore of its payment. His remedy was cumulative. He could do both. "The mechanics' lien is a creature of the statute. It exists on certain conditions, independent of any special contract. It is unknown to the common law, and is a cumulative remedy, which may be concurrently pursued in connection with the ordinary actions for the collection of debts." Henry Ehlers, Adm'r, v. S. T. Elder, 51 Miss. 495. "Filing the claim does not create, but simply establishes, the lien. It changes an inchoate and defeasible right to a lien into a fixed and definite incumbrance. * * * A mechanic who files a claim for lien does not thereby release his debtor from personal liability. So, to, a subcontractor, to whom the contractor has given an order on the owner, may still enforce his rights under such order after he has filed his claim." Boisot on Mechanics' Liens, 496. Phillips on Mechanics' Liens, § 9, says: "It is a cumulative remedy which may be concurrently pursued in connection with the ordinary actions for the collection of debts." See, also, 27 Cyc. 432, and cases. Aldridge had a right to file the mechanics' lien statement, and also the right to proceed against Moore for the amount of his debt. On the order of the court he was, on March 30, 1899, made a defendant, but he was not served with summons, nor did he appear or plead in any manner, nor was he present at the trial, either personally or by counsel. Moore asked judgment for the amount which he owed Aldridge, and was entitled to it. Aldridge not being in court was neither entitled to a judgment in his favor, nor would he be liable for one against him. The court had no jurisdiction to render either. Moore, on the other hand, was entitled to recover the money due Aldridge, as he had agreed to pay him, and owed him the amount.

The remaining question in this case is the right of plaintiff in error to be subrogated to the rights of Moore as against the original contractors, Pierce and Thomas, and while we find no adjudicated case in which the specific question here involved has been decided, the general principle applies that: "Subrogation takes place where one pays a debt which another was justly liable to pay, and the payment is made to discharge the property of the person paying from an incumbrance." Lowrey v. Byers, 80 Ind. 443; Davis et al. v. Schlemmer, Adm'r, 150 Ind. 479, 50 N. E. 373; Albert Cole, Respondent, v. Robert Malcolm, Impleaded, etc., Appellant, 66 N. Y. 363; Boisot on Mechanics' Liens, § 263; Phillips on Mechanics' Liens, § 260. In the case of Davis et al. v. Schlemmer, Adm'r, 150 Ind. 478, 50 N. E. 375, the court says: "The right of subrogation is not founded upon contract, expressed or implied, but upon principles of equity and justice, and is broad enough to include every instance in which one party, not a mere volunteer, pays a debt for another, primarily liable, and which in good conscience and equity should have been paid by the latter. Spaulding v. Harvey, 129 Ind. 106, 109, 28 N. E. 323, 13 L. R. A. 619, 28 Am. St. Rep. 176; Huffmond v. Bence, 128 Ind. 131, 137, 27 N. E. 847; Sidener v. Favey, 77 Ind. 241; Gerber v. Sharp, 72 Ind. 553, 556-558; Rooker v. Benson, 83 Ind. 250, 256; Kyner v. Kyner, 6 Watts (Pa.) 221; Harnsberger v. Yancey, 33 Grat. (Va.) 527; Miller v. Winchell, 70 N. Y. 438; Mathews v. Alken, 1 N. Y. 595; Lewis v. Palmer, 28 N. Y. 271; Stevens v. Goodenough, 26 Vt. 676; Smith v. Foran, 43 Conn. 244, 21 Am. Rep. 647; Darst v. Thomas, 87 Ill. 222; Greenwell v. Heritage, 71 Mo. 459; Redington v. Cornwell, 90 Cal. 49, 27 Pac. 40; Sheldon on Subrogation, §§ 1, 11." From the foregoing it will be seen that Alberti is entitled to be subrogated to all the rights of Moore as against Pierce and Thomas, whose debt he has, by virtue of this lien against his property, been compelled to pay.

The plaintiff in error makes a further contention in his brief objecting to the amount of recovery allowed Moore, and calls attention to the different payments alleged to have been made. In view of the fact that this was twice pressed upon the attention of the trial court, and that court modified its judgment, we cannot, in consideration of the uncertain and conflicting statements in reference thereto, enter into this domain of speculation, as the lower court manifestly had better opportunities to determine this accurately than we have.

This defense urged by John Pierce in his separate answer, in which he pleads that he and Jesse Thomas took the contract to construct the building, and that they had a verbal agreement by which Thomas agreed to furnish the stone to erect the building, is one which cannot avail him in this controversy. His remedy is against Thomas.

The cause is accordingly remanded to the district court of Kay county, with instructions to set aside the judgment heretofore rendered, and enter one for O. H. P. Moore against John Pierce and Jesse Thomas for the sum of $204.77, with interest thereon at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum from September 20, 1898, and for his costs, decreeing $176.96 thereof a first lien upon lot 13, block 33, in the town of Newkirk, Kay county, Okl., and the said lien be foreclosed and the said lot sold as in other cases of the sales of real estate, and out of the proceeds thereof paying, first, the costs of this proceeding, second; the amount of judgment herein rendered, and the balance, if any, be paid to plaintiff in error, George Alberti, and enter judgment in favor of George Alberti, plaintiff in error, against John Pierce and Jesse Thomas, defendants in error, for the sum of $176.96, with interest thereon at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum from September 20, 1898, and for the costs of this proceeding, including all costs of foreclosure and sale of the property herein involved. All the Justices concurring.

GOODWIN et al. v. BICKFORD.

(Supreme Court of Oklahoma. Jan. 21, 1908.)

1. COURT—RULES OF COURT—COSTS ON APPEAL.

The district court of the territory of Oklahoma has no power to impose a rule requiring that a party appealing a cause from the probate court to the district court shall deposit with the clerk of the district court five dollars for costs of the clerk, and that a failure to do so within 20 days after the transcript of the trial court is deposited with the clerk shall be ground for dismissal of the appeal.

2. APPEAL—RECORD—RULES OF TRIAL COURT.

The rules of a trial court are part of the record of every cause tried thereat.

3. SAME—ERRORS APPARENT OF RECORD.

Errors apparent upon the judgment roll or record of a cause will be considered by this court, although no exceptions were taken therein in the trial court.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from District Court, Canadian County; C. F. Irwin, Judge.

Action by Will Carlton Bickford against John A. Goodwin and others. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants bring error. Reversed and remanded.

On July 1, 1903, the defendant in error filed his petition in the probate court of Canadian county, alleging, among other things, that he is the adopted son and only heir at law of Mary E. Hortop, who died on or about the 7th day of April, 1903, and that he is entitled to letters of administration upon her estate, and praying that such letters be issued to him. On the 2d day of July, 1903, John A. Goodwin, one of the plaintiffs in error, filed his petition in the probate court of Canadian county, alleging, among other things, the death of Mary E. Hortop, and that Cynthia Rosenberger, Emma J. Masters, Nellie C. Bickford, Mrs. E. Carson Mason, James Dexter, and Mrs. — Walker are heirs at law of the decedent, and praying that letters of administration on the said intestate estate be issued to him. On the 14th day of July, 1903, the two petitions were heard together, and the court adjudged the defendant in error to be the adopted son of Mary E. Hortop, granted the prayer of the petition, appointed him administrator of the estate, and ordered the letters of administration thereon issued to him accordingly. Thereupon the plaintiff in error appealed to the district court of that county. Afterwards, on August 25, 1903, the defendant in error filed a motion to dismiss the appeal of plaintiff in the district court, and assigned as his reasons therefor six grounds. On December 1, 1903, the court granted plaintiff leave to file a new and sufficient appeal bond. On December 4, following, plaintiff filed an af-affidavit in support of their motion resisting the motion to dismiss the appeal, and time to file a counter affidavit was extended until December 9th. On December 9th, as shown by the journal entry, the appeal was dismissed "for failure of the plaintiff to properly perfect his appeal by compliance with rule 14 of this court."

M. D. Libby, for plaintiffs in error. Geo. S. Pearl and J. G. Lowe, for defendant in error.

HAYES, J. (after stating the facts as above). Only one question is presented by the petition in error and argued by counsel for plaintiffs in error in their brief, and that is: Did the court err in dismissing the appeal for the failure of the plaintiffs in error to comply with rule 14 of that court, by making a deposit of five dollars to apply on the cost of the clerk of the district court, within the time prescribed by said rule? The portion of rule 14 affecting this case is: "That in all cases appealed from a lower court to the district court of this district, the appellant shall, within twenty days from the time the papers in such appealed case shall have reached the office of the clerk of this court, deposit with such clerk the sum of five dollars, to apply on costs of clerk in the district court, and the appellee shall, prior to the first day of the next term of the district court of the county in which such appeal arose, deposit with the clerk for costs the sum of three dollars. No appeal shall be placed on the docket of this court until the appellant shall have made the deposit herein provided for. Should the appellant fail to make deposit for the costs as herein required the appellee may pay the costs made in the district court on such appeal, together with the costs of docketing and dismissal, and such appeal shall, on motion of the appellee, be dismissed for failure to prosecute." On August 25, 1903, appellee in the district court filed his motion to dismiss the appeal for failure of appellants to make the deposit as required by said rule 14. On the 7th day of December following, after the expiration of the 20 days provided for in rule 14, appellants deposited with the clerk of the district court five dollars. Plaintiffs in error in their brief assign as reasons why the action of the district court should be reversed that the dismissal of the appeal by the court was an abuse of legal discretion, and that the court had no power to prescribe said rule 14 requiring said deposit for costs, and that, on failure to comply with it, the appeal should be dismissed.

We shall consider the second reason assigned first; for, if it is well founded, it will not be necessary to consider the first reason assigned. It is a well-settled principle of law that courts, independent of any statutory provision, have the inherent power to make rules for the regulation of their practice and business, but they can make no rule that contravenes a statute or the law of the land. Prindeville v. People of the State of Illinois, 42 Ill. 217; August Fisher v. National Bank of Commerce, 73 Ill. 34; Thomas Purcell v. Hannibal & St. Joseph Railroad Company, 50 Mo. 504; United States v. James G. Swan et al. (D. C.) 77 Fed. 473. It cannot be said that, in imposing costs and prescribing rules governing their collection, in the practice of a court a different rule from the one announced above applies, or that a court has control over the same superior to the legislative department of the government, and that a court may make a rule governing the same in conflict with the statute, because courts had no power at common law to impose costs, and such power exists only when authorized by statute, and a court in prescribing rules relative to the costs authorized by statute to be imposed by it cannot, in doing so, contravene a statute. Maggie E. Bradford v. Southern Railroad Company, 195 U. S. 243, 25 Sup. Ct. 53, 49 L. Ed. 178. The Legislature of the territory of Oklahoma has provided a procedure governing an appeal from the judgment, decree, or order of the probate court, to the district court. Chapter 13 of the statutes of 1893, being the chapter on "Probate Procedure," contains the following provisions:

"1483. An appeal may be taken to the district court from a judgment, decree, or order of the probate court: First, granting or refusing, or revoking letters testamentary, or of administration, or of guardianship."

"1437. The appeal must be made: First—by filing a written notice thereof with the judge of the probate court. * * * and, second—by executing and filing within the time limited, * * * such bond as is required in the following sections. It shall not be necessary to notify or summon the appellee or respondent to appear in the district court, but such respondent shall be taken and held to have notice of such appeal in the same manner as he had notice of the pendency of the proceedings in the probate court."

"1495. The judge of the probate court must, within ten days from the filing of the notice of appeal, and the giving of the required bond, cause a certified copy thereof and of the judgment, decree, or order, or specific part thereof appealed from * * * to be transmitted to the clerk of the district court of the county or judicial subdivision, to be filed in his office, and the appeal may be heard and determined at any day thereafter by said court, at any general special or adjourned term; and if the appellant make no appearance when the case is called for trial, or otherwise fail to prosecute his appeal, the respondent may, on motion, have the appeal dismissed. * * *"

"1500. Such appellate court may award to the successful parties the cost of the appeal, or it may direct that such costs abide the event of a new hearing, or of the subsequent proceedings in the probate court. In either case, the costs may be made payable out of the estate or fund, or personally by the unsuccessful party, as directed by the appellate court, or, if no such direction be given, as directed by the probate court."

By these provisions and other sections of the chapter quoted from, the Legislature of the territory of Oklahoma has provided a complete procedure for perfecting an appeal from the probate court to the district court, and has prescribed in detail the things necessary to be done. These provisions of the statute were, on March 3, 1891, c. 543, § 17, 26 Stat. 989, ratified by Congress (Supp. Rev. St. vol. 1 [2d Ed.] p. 929). Wetz v. Elliott et al., 4 Okl. 618, 51 Pac. 657; Decker v. Cahill, 10 Okl. 251, 61 Pac. 1101. But, aside from any virtue or power these provisions may have received from the act of Congress approving them, they are valid enactments of the territorial Legislature. Congress, in establishing a government for the territory of Oklahoma, divided the government into three branches—executive, legislative and judicial. In defining the powers of these different branches of the government it provided: "That the legislative power of the territory shall extend to all rightful subjects of legislation not inconsistent with the Constitution and laws of the United States." It is true that Congress granted, by the organic act, some legislative powers to the Supreme Court; but the subject upon which it could legislate are clearly defined and limited, and matters therein specified as subjects upon which the court can legislate do not include the subjects of the provisions of the statutes cited, supra. It has been the practice of Congress, in establishing governments for territories, to commit to the Territorial Assembly the matter of providing for the manner of taking and perfecting appeals. James Hornbuckle v. John Toombs, 18 Wall (U. S.) 648; 21 L. Ed. 986. In this case Mr. Justice Bradley, in speaking for the court, says: "Whenever Congress has proceeded to organize a government for any of the territories it has merely instituted a general system of courts therefor, and has committed to the Territorial Assembly full power, subject to a few specified or implied conditions, of supplying all details of legislation necessary to put the system into operation, even to the defining of the jurisdictions of the several courts. * * * From a review of the entire past legislation of Congress on the subject under consideration, our conclusion is that the practice, pleadings, and forms and modes of proceedings of territorial courts, as well as their respective jurisdictions, subject, as before said, to a few expressed or implied conditions in the organic act itself, were intended to be left to the legislative action of the Territorial Assemblies, and to the regulations which might be adopted by the courts themselves." The Legislature of the territory of Oklahoma had power to enact laws regulating the procedure in the courts of the territory and prescribing the manner of taking and perfecting appeals from the inferior courts to the superior courts. Territory of Oklahoma v. W. A. Stroud, 6 Okl. 106, 50 Pac. 285; Chas. W. Bailey and Harry Plummer McCool v. Territory of Oklahoma, 9 Okl. 461, 60 Pac. 117.

The plaintiffs in error and the defendant in error have cited the cases of Dooley v. Foster, 5 Kan. 269, and Coleman v. Newby, 7 Kan. 83. Defendant in error insists that the decisions in these cases support the theory of his case. A close examination of Dooley v. Foster will disclose that the court in that case did not decide whether the district court had power to make the rule in question or not. That case was determined upon the theory that the appellee had waived the requirements of the rule in controversy. Justice Valentine, in rendering the opinion in the case, said that he announced the opinion of the court without considering whether the rule in question was valid or invalid. In the case of Coleman v. Newby, supra, no opinion of the majority of the court was given, except a statement made by Justice Brewer affirming the action of the trial court. We cannot infer otherwise than that the majority of the court in that case reached its opinion by deciding that the rule in controversy was not in conflict with the statute of Kansas governing appeals from justices of the peace to the district court. For the court to have held that the district court had power to make a rule contravening the statute would have been against the great weight of authorities. In the case at bar the Legislature of the territory of Oklahoma has, by statute, prescribed in detail how an appeal shall be taken from the probate court to the district court and perfected. It has said that a written notice thereof and a bond must be filed with the probate judge; that within 10 days thereafter a certified copy of certain documents must be transmitted by the probate judge to the clerk of the district court to be filed in his office, and that it shall not be necessary to notify or summon the appellee in the case; that the case may be heard at any time during the next general or special term of the court after the appeal has been transmitted to the clerk's office to be filed; and that, if the appellee make no appearance when the case is called, the appeal may be dismissed. We could hardly conceive of a statute that could prescribe more specifically the detailed requirements necessary to perfect an appeal, and how the same shall be disposed of; but it does not require that any deposit for cost shall be made in order to perfect the appeal. On the contrary, it is specifically provided that after the appeal has been transmitted by the probate judge to the district clerk, to be filed in his office, without even a summons or notice to defendant in error, the case may be heard at any day of any general or special term of the court, and that if, when the case is called, appellant does not appear, the same may be dismissed on motion of the appellee. There is nothing in this statute that will permit the construction that anything else than what is mentioned therein is required to be done, or may be required to be done, by the court before the appeal is perfected; and under the language of the statute, when the appeal has been perfected, it may be heard at any general or special term of the court. Any rule of the court requiring additional things to be done by the appellant than those prescribed by the statute herein quoted would contravene the statute and would be invalid.

The case of Cunningham v. Quinn, 12 Colo. 473, 21 Pac. 488, was a petition to the Supreme Court of Colorado for a writ of mandamus to compel the respondent (Quinn), who was the county judge and acting as county clerk, to accept and file a certain appeal bond and notices of appeal upon the relator's paying the legal fees therefor. Under the rule of the county court, which was as follows: "The clerk of this court may require a party appealing from the judgment or order of this court to the district court, or Supreme Court, that he or she or they pay all accrued costs before taking any further steps in the case," respondent Quinn refused to file the appeal bond and notices unless all accrued costs were first paid by relator. Notwithstanding the statute of Colorado contained a provision that gave the officers of the court the right to collect their legal fees in advance, the court, in awarding the writ of mandamus, said: "The right of appeal from the county courts to this court is also a statutory right, and that statute provides the manner in which such appeal may be perfected, and no rule of court can deprive a party of this right, or impose additional burdens as conditions precedent to its exercise. Under the statute a party praying for an appeal is required to file a bond 'in a reasonable sum sufficient to cover the amount of the judgment appealed from and costs, conditioned for the payment of judgment, costs, interest, and damages in case the judgment shall be affirmed'; but we know of no statute by which he may be required to pay the accrued cost in the case at the time of perfecting the appeal, and in the absence of such statutory authority, the right of the clerk to impose such a condition cannot be maintained."

The case of Wescott v. Eccles, 3 Utah, 261, 2 Pac. 525, is a case commenced in a justice court in the territory of Utah. From a judgment against the appellant he appealed to the district court. After appellant had complied with all the requirements of the statute for perfecting his appeal; the justice before whom the case was tried deposited the files of the case with the clerk of the district court, but the appellant failed to file the transcript from the justice's docket and all papers accompanying the appeal with the clerk of the district court within 30 days before the commencement of the term of court, and to perfect the appeal within the first 2 days of the term as was required by rule of the court. The district court, on motion of the appellee, dismissed the appeal because of appellant's failure to comply with said rule of the court. The Supreme Court of the territory, in reversing the judgment of the district court, said: "When the appellant has complied with the statutory requirements, it then becomes the duty of the justice to transmit the papers to the clerk of the district court, and when they are received by him, they are filed whether he ever indorses the filing on them or not. 'A paper is said to be filed when it is delivered to the proper officer.' Bouv. Law Dic. tit. 'File.' We do not propose to discuss the power of the district court to make rules for its government. It is not necessary to the decision of this case. It is proper, however, to state that no court can by rule deprive a party of a right which is given to him by statute. * * * The decision of this court is placed upon the ground that the appellant having fulfilled all the requirements of the law in order to perfect his appeal, his right to a trial in the district court, so far at least as concerns this motion, had become absolute, a right given by the statute of which he could not be deprived by rule of court. * * *" The same doctrine is announced by the court in the case of City of Pekin v. M. C. Dunkelburg, 40 Ill. App. 184.

The Supreme Court of Utah, in the case of Salt Lake City v. Redwine, 8 Utah, 335, 23 Pac. 756, held that the district court had power to prescribe a rule such as was held in the case of Wescott v. Eccles, supra, could not be prescribed by the district court; but the court in the case of Salt Lake City v. Redwine distinguishes very clearly that case from the case of Wescott v. Eccles by saying that, in holding that the court had such power, its opinion was based on the fact that the court derived such power from a general statute of Utah, which had not been enacted at the time the opinion was rendered in the case of Wescott v. Eccles. The court clearly held that its power in that case to prescribe such a rule was derived from a statute.

If the district court of Oklahoma had been vested with such power by act of Congress, it then probably could be contended that the Legislature was without power to enact such statute; but we have not been able to find any such act of Congress, and from the opinion cited, supra, it is seen that the Legislature of the territory of Oklahoma had power to prescribe by statute procedure in the courts of the territory of Oklahoma. It is therefore our opinion that the district court of Canadian county in dismissing the appeal of plaintiffs in error committed error.

But defendant in error insists that this appeal should be dismissed for the reason that no exception was taken by the plaintiffs in error to the order of the district court in dismissing their appeal. The transcript of the record contains the order of the district court dismissing the appeal and rule 14 of that court. In the order of dismissal it is specifically stated by the court that the appeal was dismissed "for failure of the plaintiff to properly perfect his appeal by a compliance with rule 14 of this court." The ground upon which the order or judgment of dismissal was made having been made a part of the judgment of the district court, this court cannot assume that the trial court may have acted upon a different ground. Holland v. Great Northern Ry. Co., 93 Minn. 373, 101 N. W. 608. Rule 14 was certified by the lower court as a part of the record, and properly so, for the rule of a trial court is a part of the record in every case tried therein. Walla Walla Printing & Publishing Co. v. Budd et al., 2 Wash. T. 336, 5 Pac. 602.

It has been repeatedly held by the Supreme Court of the territory of Oklahoma that it would review and correct errors that were apparent upon the judgment roll or record of the case, although no exceptions had been taken thereto. Territory v. Caffrey, 8 Okl. 193, 57 Pac. 204; Caffrey v. Overholser, 8 Okl. 202, 57 Pac. 206; Kellogg v. School District No. 10, 13 Okl. 285, 74 Pac. 110.

It is therefore the judgment of this court that this cause be reversed and remanded, with instructions that the order of the trial court dismissing the appeal be set aside, and the appeal reinstated. All the Justices concurring.

STATE v. MCGOWAN.

(Supreme Court of Montana. Jan. 25, 1908.)

1. INFORMATION—REQUISITES IN GENERAL.

Under Pen. Code, § 1832, providing that an information must contain a statement in ordinary and concise language and in such a manner as to enable a person of common understanding to know what is intended, the knowledge of what was intended must be capable of being drawn from the language employed.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 27, Indictment and Information, §§ 177-179, 202, 203.]

2. SAME—SURPLUSAGE.

Where an information is sufficient without certain words therein, the words may be treated as surplusage and disregarded.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 27, Indictment and Information, §§ 311-315.]

3. HOMICIDE—INFORMATION—SUFFICIENCY.

Allegations sufficient for a common-law indictment for murder are sufficient for an information under the statute, defining murder as the unlawful killing of a human being with malice aforethought.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 26, Homicide, §§ 192, 193.]

4. SAME—INFORMATION—SUFFICIENCY.

In an information for murder, which charged that the defendant at a certain place and time made an assault on deceased with a shotgun, which was loaded and by defendant held in both his hands, "he the said [defendant] did then and there feloniously * * * shoot off and discharge at and upon the [deceased]," and by thus striking the deceased, inflicting wounds of which deceased died, held, that the omission of the word "which" from the beginning of the quoted clause, so that there was no allegation that the gun was discharged, did not invalidate the information, as the entire quoted clause was surplusage.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 26, Homicide, §§ 215-223; vol. 27, Indictment and Information, §§ 311-315.]

5. CRIMINAL LAW—EVIDENCE—HARMLESS ERROR.

Where, in a homicide case, there was no denial of the killing, and the defense was insanity, the admission in evidence of the shells taken from the gun of accused after he had delivered it to an officer was not substantially erroneous as against the objection that the shells had not been properly identified, where a witness had testified that the shells produced were those taken from the gun, but were not in the same condition as when taken from the gun, where the court expressly permitted counsel for accused to examine the witness whether the shells were in the same condition as when taken from the gun.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 15, Criminal Law, §§ 3137-3143.]

6. SAME.

In a homicide case, the error in excluding evidence that decedent was known by another name than that alleged in the information was harmless, where a witness testified that decedent was known by another name.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 15, Criminal Law, § 3146.]

7. SAME—MISCONDUCT OF PROSECUTING ATTORNEY.

Where, in a homicide case, the county attorney in good faith asked a witness the question whether decedent had, a short time before the killing, charged accused with larceny, and the court sustained an objection to the question and instructed the jury to disregard it, the conduct of the county attorney was not ground for reversal.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 14, Criminal Law, § 1693.]

8. WITNESSES—IMPEACHMENT—LAYING OF PROPER FOUNDATION.

Where, in a homicide case, a witness for accused testified to acts of decedent and the wife of accused while at the hotel of the witness, and the witness on cross-examination denied having told the county attorney that she knew nothing about the case, or about decedent and defendant's wife, except that they came there often for supper, but stated that she had told the county attorney that she knew nothing about the case that would help the state, and that, if she said that accused was jealous of decedent and that there was nothing wrong between decedent and accused's wife, she did not remember it, a proper foundation was laid for the admission of evidence that the witness made the statements that she denied making or denied having any remembrance of.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 50, Witnesses, §§ 1233-1242.]

9. CRIMINAL LAW—EXCLUSION OF EVIDENCE—OFFER OF EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

Where, in a homicide case, an officer testifying for the state stated that he was not friendly with decedent, an objection to a question, asked on cross-examination, whether the officer had had a warrant for the arrest of decedent which he had not served, was properly sustained, in the absence of any showing of the presumed reason for withholding the service of the warrant in such a way that the court might intelligently rule thereon.

10. HOMICIDE—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

Where, in a homicide case, the issue was whether accused had been rendered insane by reason of deceased having been intimate with the wife of accused, it was competent to inquire into the relations existing between accused and his wife as bearing on the probability of accused becoming crazed by the misconduct of decedent and the wife.

11. CRIMINAL LAW—HARMLESS ERROR—LANGUAGE OF COURT.

Where, in a homicide case, defended on the ground that accused had become insane by reason of decedent and accused's wife having maintained intimate relations, the evidence showed that accused and his wife maintained separate establishments, and had divided a part of the property, and had arranged to divide the balance after a specified time, the language of the court, in designating the arrangement as a contract of separation, though technically incorrect, was not ground for reversal.

12. HOMICIDE—INSTRUCTIONS—MISLEADING INSTRUCTIONS.

An instruction, in a homicide case, that if the jury found that accused murdered decedent, and they did not find him guilty of murder in the first degree, they should find him guilty of murder in the second degree, defined as the unlawful killing of a human being with malice aforethought, either express or implied, where the killing is not done deliberately, was not erroneous for failing to state that the word "murder" must be construed to mean the offense defined in the Code.

13. SAME.

An instruction, in a homicide case, that a person, to be criminally responsible, must have intelligence and capacity to have a criminal intent, and that the questions are whether at the time of the killing accused had the mental capacity to entertain "a criminal act," and whether he entertained it, is not erroneous for using the word "act," instead of the word "intent," in the quoted phrase, especially where the court in other instructions distinguished between act and intent.

14. CRIMINAL LAW—INSTRUCTIONS—INVASION OF PROVINCE OF JURY.

An instruction, in a homicide case, that if the jury believed that accused "committed the crime" with which he was charged, etc., he was guilty, was not erroneous for using the word "crime," as the word did not convey to the jury the idea that the court was of the opinion that defendant was guilty of the crime charged.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 14, Criminal Law, § 1731.]

15. SAME.

It is necessary for the trial court, in instructing the jury in criminal cases, to refer to the nature of the accusation made by the state against accused, and the use of the phrase "the crime of which he is accused" is appropriate.

16. HOMICIDE—INSTRUCTIONS.

An instruction, in a homicide case, authorizing a conviction on the jury finding that accused was mentally capable of choosing either to do or not to do the acts constituting the crime, and of governing his conduct in accordance with such choice, though they should believe that he was not entirely sane, was not prejudicial to accused.

17. SAME—EVIDENCE—SUBMISSION OF ISSUE OF MANSLAUGHTER.

On a trial for homicide, defended on the ground of insanity, evidence held not to require the submission of the issue of manslaughter.

18. CRIMINAL LAW—INSTRUCTIONS—DEGREE OF OFFENSE.

The rule that, where the evidence warrants it, the court must instruct on every offense included in the crime charged, applies to cases where the trial court has a reasonable doubt about the propriety of such instruction, in which event the instruction should be given; but where the evidence does not warrant it, and the court has no reasonable doubt about it, the instruction should not be given.

Appeal from District Court, Teton County; J. E. Erickson, Judge.

Daniel McGowan was convicted of murder in the second degree, and he appeals. Affirmed.

J. G. Bair, O. D. Gray, and J. W. Freeman, for appellant. Albert J. Galen, Atty. Gen., and E. M. Hall, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

SMITH, J. The above-named defendant was convicted in the district court of Teton county of the crime of murder in the second degree, and from a judgment of conviction and an order denying his motion for a new trial he has appealed.

The first contention of his counsel is that the information does not state facts sufficient to constitute a public offense, and is not direct and certain as to the particular circumstances of the offense sought to be charged. These questions were raised by demurrer in the court below. The charging part of the information reads as follows: "That the said Daniel McGowan, of the county of Teton, on the 18th day of March, A. D. 1906, at the county of Teton, in the state of Montana, in and upon one Charles Arnold, then and there being, did feloniously, willfully, deliberately, premeditatedly, and of his malice aforethought make an assault with a certain shotgun, which then and there was loaded with gunpowder and leaden bullets, and by him, the said Daniel McGowan, had and held in both his hands, he, the said Daniel McGowan, did then and there feloniously, willfully, deliberately, premeditatedly, and with his malice aforethought shoot off and discharge at and upon the said Charles Arnold thereby, and by thus striking the said Charles Arnold with the said leaden bullets inflicting on his back mortal wounds, of which said mortal wounds the said Charles Arnold died on the 18th day of March, A. D. 1906, in the county of Teton, state of Montana. And so the said Daniel McGowan, in the manner and form aforesaid, did feloniously, willfully, deliberately, premeditatedly, and with his malice aforethought kill and murder the said Charles Arnold," etc. It will be observed that the charge is not expressly made that the shotgun was shot off and discharged at and upon the body of Charles Arnold, and this is the point made by the defendant. It is evident that the pleader omitted the word "which" between the word "hands" and the word "he." The information being so drawn, it becomes necessary to analyze the charging part thereof, in order to determine whether or not the statutory requirements have been complied with. Section 1832 of the Penal Code provides that an information must contain a statement of the facts constituting the offense, in ordinary and concise language, and in such manner as to enable a person of common understanding to know what is intended. This statute embodies two provisions: (1) There must be a "statement in * * * language," and (2) that statement must be so framed as to enable a person of common understanding to know what is intended. Now, we apprehend that, although a person of common understanding may know what is intended to be charged, that knowledge must be based upon the language employed; otherwise, the statute is not satisfied. In this case we undertake to say that a person of common understanding would know that the defendant was charged with murder in the first degree. The defendant is therefore presumed to have had that knowledge, and he was in no way prejudiced by the peculiar phraseology of the information. But, unless the pleader employs language embodying the charge intended to be made, he falls short of compliance with the statute; otherwise, the defendant would be charged by mere inference, which may not be done.

Recurring, then, to the information, and omitting certain parts thereof, we find that defendant is accused of the crime of murder as follows: "That the said Daniel McGowan, on the 18th day of March, 1906, * * * at the county of Teton and state of Montana, in and upon one Charles Arnold, then and there being, did feloniously, willfully, deliberately, premeditatedly, and of his malice aforethought make an assault with a certain shotgun; which then and there was loaded with gunpowder and leaden bullets, and by him, the said Daniel McGowan, had and held in both his hands, * * * thereby and by thus striking the said Charles Arnold with the said leaden bullets inflicting on his back mortal wounds, of which said mortal wounds the said Charles Arnold died on the 18th day of March, 1906." We have omitted these words: "He, the said Daniel McGowan, did then and there feloniously, willfully, deliberately, premeditatedly, and with his malice aforethought, shoot off and discharge at, and upon, the said Charles Arnold." Is it permissible, under the rules of criminal pleading, to omit the foregoing? It will not be contended that the words last quoted mean anything standing alone, because there is no allegation there that McGowan discharged any weapon at Arnold. We are to inquire, then, whether in construing the information we are allowed to treat them as surplusage, and whether without them the information charges murder. Section 1842 of the Penal Code provides that no information is insufficient by reason of any defect or imperfection in matter of form which does not tend to prejudice a substantial right of the defendant upon its merits. If the information, without the words last quoted, sufficiently charges murder, then those words may be treated as surplusage, and disregarded. State v. Phillips, 36 Mont. —, 92 Pac. 299; State v. Mitlen, 36 Mont. —, 92 Pac. 969.

The words that we have in mind to disregard involve simply an attempt to state the manner in which the shotgun was used in the assault. There is no allegation that the gun was discharged. In the case of Ray v. State, 108 Tenn. 282-295, 67 S. W. 553, 556, the court said: "It is insisted that the indictment is too vague as to the manner in which the deceased was killed, because, under the language used in the indictment, he might have been scared to death, which would not be murder in the first degree, or he may have been beaten to death. We think the language is broad enough to convey the idea of a battery. The indictment in this case charges that the prisoner, 'with a certain dangerous weapon, to wit, a gun, which he in his hands then and there had and held, in and upon the body of one Gene Prentiss feloniously, willfully, deliberately, and premeditatedly, and with malice aforethought did make an assault upon the body of said Gene Prentiss, and did then and there unlawfully, * * * by the means and in the manner aforesaid, kill and murder the said Gene Prentiss, against the peace and dignity of the state.' The charge that the defendant did then and there kill and murder him implies battery, and is sufficient. It is true that murder must be committed by an act applied to or affecting the person either directly, as by inflicting a wound, or indirectly, as by exposing the person to a deadly agency or influence, from which death ensues. Commonwealth v. Webster, 5 Cush. (Mass.) 295, 52 Am. Dec. 711. The working upon the fancy of another, or treating him harshly or unkindly, by which he dies of fear or grief, would not constitute this offense. State v. Turner, Wright (Ohio) 20. At common law it was only necessary to charge that A. B., on a certain day and year, feloniously, willfully, and of his malice aforethought, did kill and murder one C. D. * * * In an indictment for murder in the first degree, it is not necessary to state in so many words that the pistol was loaded with powder and ball, or that the wound was made with the ball; nor is it necessary to charge that the wound was inflicted with a particular weapon." See, also, 21 Cyc. 845. In the case of Alexander v. State, 3 Heisk. (Tenn.) 475, it was held that an indictment for murder which did not specify the weapon used was good. The court said: "The assault recited is not the gravamen of the charge. That is only inducement to the real charge, which is that of killing and murdering; and, as the assault was followed by killing and murder as its consequence, it is not necessary to state the weapon with which the assault was made or the killing consummated." The information in the case at bar is much more specific in its allegations than was the indictment in the case last cited. The Supreme Court of Georgia has decided that, in an indictment for murder by shooting with a pistol, it is not necessary to aver that the pistol was loaded with gunpowder and a leaden ball, or that the fatal wound was inflicted with a ball. Peterson v. State, 47 Ga. 524.

Murder, in this state, is the unlawful killing of a human being with malice aforethought. Allegations sufficient for a common-law indictment for murder are sufficient for an information under the statute. Territory v. Stears, 2 Mont. 324; State v. Lu Sing, 34 Mont. 31, 85 Pac. 521. We are of opinion that this information is sufficient to enable a person of common understanding to know what was intended to be charged therein, that that knowledge may be derived from the language employed, and that the defendant was in no wise prejudiced in any of his rights by the peculiar wording thereof or the employment of words unnecessarily inserted therein.

The next contention urged is that the court erred in admitting in evidence a certain shotgun shell, taken by the witness Connelly from the defendant's gun after the defendant had delivered the gun to a deputy sheriff. After the witness had testified that the shells produced at the trial were the same shells taken from the gun, defendant's counsel objected to the admission in evidence of one of them "as not properly identified," and he now argues that it was not shown that the shell was in the same condition as when taken from the gun. That point was not incorporated in his objection, and was only raised by counsel after the shell had been admitted in evidence and the county attorney was about to pass it to the jury, and then only by the statement of counsel as follows: "We object, as the shell is not in the same condition, and may not be the same shell he has testified to." We think there is no merit in the contention, especially in view of the fact that the court expressly stated at the time that, if defendant's counsel so desired, they might examine the witness on the subject, of which privilege they did not see fit to avail themselves. On cross-examination the witness stated that the shell was not in the same condition as when he saw it the night of the shooting; but no further questions were asked him concerning it, and the matter was allowed to rest there. We see no substance to the controversy, viewed from any standpoint, especially in the light of the fact that the defendant did not go upon the witness stand, there was no denial of the killing, and the defense was insanity.

Defendant complains that he was not allowed to prove by the witnesses Stewart and Duffy that the deceased went by, and was known by, another name than Charles Arnold. Even though this ruling of the trial court may have been error, which we do not decide, no harm was done, because the witness Cook testified that Arnold was also known by the name of Webber.

The county attorney asked the witness Lea the following question: "Did you have a conversation with Mr. Chas. Arnold a few months, or a short time, before he was shot, in which he accused McGowan of the crime of grand larceny?" The court not only sustained the defendant's objection to the question, but instructed the jury to disregard it in arriving at their verdict. There was no persistence on the part of counsel for the state in propounding incompetent questions, and it does not appear from the record that any effort was made to convey information to the jury through the medium of irrelevant interrogatories. Rather, the question appears to have been propounded in good faith; counsel urging that it was competent as bearing upon defendant's motive in killing deceased. The court, with abundance of caution in the protection of defendant's rights, told the jury not to consider the question, and we think no prejudice resulted.

On the part of the defense there was testimony tending to show that the deceased, for some time prior to his death, had maintained illicit relations with the defendant's wife, and had frequently been discovered in her company under such circumstances as to leave no doubt that they were together for the purpose of sexual intercourse. Certain witnesses also testified that the deceased had attempted to hire them to kill the defendant. All of these matters were communicated to the defendant prior to the homicide. It appeared, also, that for some time prior to the killing of Arnold Mrs. McGowan and her three children lived at the town of Cut Bank, in Teton county, while the defendant lived on his ranch, some miles from the town, only coming to the house occupied by his wife every Saturday, when he would stay over Sunday, and sometimes two or three days longer. A witness, Mrs. Cook, testified for the defendant as to certain acts of the deceased and Mrs. McGowan while at the hotel of the witness at Cut Bank. On cross-examination she said: "I didn't tell Mr. Cole (the county attorney) that I knew nothing about this case whatever, or about Arnold and Mrs. McGowan, except that they came there often for supper. I told him I knew nothing about this case that would help the state. If I said at that time that Mrs. McGowan had said to me that Dan was jealous of Charley, but there was nothing wrong between them, I don't remember it." In rebuttal, over defendant's objection, the county attorney testified that Mrs. Cook did make the statements that she denied making or having any remembrance of. It appears that the proper foundation was laid for these impeaching questions, and that the subject-matter was material. We find no error in the ruling of the court on this objection.

Robert S. Stewart, a deputy sheriff, testified for the state, and in the course of his testimony stated that he was not very friendly with Arnold. Thereupon defendant's counsel asked him: "Is it not a fact that for some time previous to March 17th you had a warrant for his arrest which you did not serve?" The court sustained an objection to the question, and the ruling is assigned as error. Assuming that it was proper to inquire as to the feeling of the witness for or against either the defendant or the deceased, still this question, in itself, did not show to the trial court that the answer would bear upon that subject, and the court properly ruled thereon. Had the defendant placed the same construction upon the inquiry that he now does, he should either have amended his question by incorporating therein the presumed reason for withholding the service of the warrant, or have made an offer of proof covering the point in such a way that the court might intelligently rule thereon.

The state, also in rebuttal, proved, identified, and offered in evidence a paper writing, reading as follows: "Cut Bank, Mont. Dan McGowan, of Cut Bank, Montana, a rancher, and Elisa McGowan his wife, of Cut Bank, Montana, have agreed together, at Cut Bank, Mont., on this 12th day of December, 1905, and do hereby promise and agree to and with each other, as follows: Dan McGowan, in consideration of the promise and mutual agreement made by Elisa McGowan, does hereby grant, bargain, and sell all of his interest in the following described personal property to wit: [Here follows description of certain cattle and horses, and also one wagon and set of double harness.] And Elisa McGowan, for and in consideration of the above agreement, does hereby sell, assign, and transfer all her interest in the following described personal property, to wit: [Here follows description of certain other cattle and horses and one wagon and team harness.] It being further agreed by and between the parties above mentioned that Elisa McGowan is to have the use of their house in Cut Bank, and that Dan McGowan is and agrees to allow Elisa McGowan 10 dollars for the support of the children she has in her care each month for a period of five months, and after that period a further agreement is to be made by and between Dan McGowan and Elisa McGowan as to the dividing of the balance of their joint personal property and improvements." The writing bears the following certificate of acknowledgment, signed by a notary public: "On this 12th day of December, 1905, before me, the undersigned, a notary public in and for the county of Teton, personally appeared Dan McGowan and Elisa McGowan and acknowledged to me that they did agree to the foregoing division of the personal property as set forth in the foregoing agreement and that is their own free and voluntary act." In overruling defendant's objection to this paper the court said: "I think I will let it go to the jury. It shows that they were living under this contract of separation. That might throw some light upon the question to the jury whether or not the defendant was sane or insane. I think, taken with all the other evidence, it is perhaps competent." It is now contended that the remark of the court, in characterizing the document as a contract of separation, was prejudicial to the defendant. The paper was also objected to as incompetent rebuttal evidence; but we see no force in the objection. The issue being tried was whether the defendant had been rendered insane by the assault of the deceased upon the sanity of his domestic relations. It was certainly competent to inquire as to how intimate and sacred those relations were in fact, as bearing upon the liability or probability of defendant's becoming crazed by their destruction; and in view of the fact that the testimony shows that defendant and his wife maintained separate establishments—had, in fact, divided a part of their personal property, and arranged to divide the balance after five months—we find no prejudice to the defendant in the remark of the court, even though the paper was not technically a contract of separation.

Defendant complains of a part of instruction No. 10. It reads thus: "If you find from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant murdered Charles Arnold, and you do not find him guilty of murder in the first degree, you should find him guilty of murder in the second degree. Murder in the second degree is the unlawful killing of a human being with malice aforethought, either express or implied, where the killing is not done deliberately, or with some degree of coolness, or in any one of the ways specified in the definition of murder in the first degree." It is said that the jury should have been told in the same instruction that the word "murder" must be construed to mean the offense defined in the Code, as set forth in other instructions. We think it would be a sad commentary upon our jury system and upon the intelligence of the good citizens of Teton county if we should hold that there was any possibility that this jury did not understand that the defendant was being tried for the crime set forth in the information and as defined by the court, and we therefore refuse to so hold.

Instruction No. 24 is objected to. It reads as follows: "You are instructed that in order to be criminally responsible a person must have intelligence and capacity to have criminal intent and purpose, and if his mental powers are so deficient that he has no will, or no conscience, or no controlling mental power, or if, from the overwhelming violence of mental disease, his intellectual power is for the time obliterated, so that he has not the power or volition to choose to do right and refrain from doing wrong, he is not criminally responsible; the questions to be determined being whether, at the time of the killing, he had the mental capacity to entertain a criminal act, and whether, in point of fact he did entertain it." It will be observed that in the latter part of the instruction the court inadvertently used the word "act," instead of the word "intent." We cannot imagine that the defendant was in any way prejudiced by this instruction, reading all of it. The jury must have known that the court referred to the intent with which the act was committed. The court in other instructions repeatedly referred to the intent of the defendant as shown by the evidence, as distinguished from the mere act of killing, and told them that in every crime there must exist a union or joint operation of act and intent. It would serve no useful purpose to quote these instructions, as no complaint is made of them. We are satisfied that the giving of this instruction was not reversible error, and that, as the same reads, it did defendant no harm.

Defendant complains of instruction No. 25, which reads as follows: "You are instructed that if, from all the evidence in the case, you believe beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant committed the crime of which he is accused in manner and form as charged in the information, and that at the time of the commission of such crime the defendant knew that it was wrong to commit such crime, and was mentally capable of choosing either to do or not to do the act or acts constituting such crime, and of governing his conduct in accordance with such choice, then it is your duty, under the law, to find him guilty, even though you should believe from the evidence that at the time of the commission of the crime he was not entirely and perfectly sane." It is said that, instead of the word "crime," the court should have employed some such word as "homicide." The defendant's counsel maintain that the use of the word "crime" conveyed to the jury the notion that the court was of opinion that the defendant was guilty of the crime charged against him. While cases may, and sometimes do, arise in which the use of the word "crime" might possibly be construed by the jury as indicating that the court had formed the opinion that the necessary elements of the offense had already been proven against the defendant on trial, we do not think that situation obtained in this case. It is necessary for the trial court, in instructing the jury, to refer to the nature of the accusation made by the state against the defendant, and we think the use of the phrase first employed in this instruction, to wit, "the crime of which he is accused," was appropriate, and that the jury must have understood that the words "of which he is accused" qualified the word "crime" all through the instruction. Counsel also suggest that the words "even though you should believe from the evidence that at the time of the commission of the crime he was not entirely and perfectly sane" are, to quote the language of their brief, "wrong and prejudicial to the rights of the defendant." The use of this language is expressly approved in State v. Peel, 23 Mont. 358-368, 59 Pac. 169, 75 Am. St. Rep. 529.

The last assignment of error set forth in the brief of defendant's counsel relates to the failure of the court of its own motion to submit to the jury the question whether the defendant was guilty of manslaughter. No request was made for such an instruction. So far as the evidence shows, there had been no meeting between defendant and deceased for several days prior to the shooting. Arnold was shot in the back, through the glass of a window of a hotel, while he was sitting quietly at the dining table waiting for food to be served to him. Soon after the occurrence the defendant admitted to several witnesses that he did the shooting. One witness said to him that it was a dirty trick to shoot a man in the back, to which remark defendant replied that he could not take a chance with this man; that he was afraid to. He also told the deputy sheriff that he "got the son of a gun"; and to the witness Woods he said, "I have killed him, and I am not sorry for it." The entire defense was devoted to the question of defendant's mental condition. Under these circumstances, we do not think the court would have been justified in instructing the jury with reference to manslaughter. The defendant was either guilty of murder, or not guilty by reason of insanity. The only effect of an instruction on manslaughter would have been to give the jury an opportunity to return a compromise verdict, probably meaningless from any logical standpoint, and simply a sort of "splitting the difference" between those jurors who thought the defendant guilty and those who were in favor of acquittal. Such a verdict neither does justice to the defendant nor the state. As was said by this court in State v. Shadwell, 28 Mont. 58, 66 Pac. 508, whenever the evidence warrants it, it is the duty of the court to instruct the jury upon every offense included in the crime charged. This rule applies to cases, should any arise, where the trial court has a reasonable doubt about the propriety of such instruction, in which event the instruction should be given. It naturally follows that, where the evidence does not warrant and the court has no reasonable doubt, such instruction should not be given, as the giving would only tend to confuse the jury and obstruct the ends of justice.

The record in this case shows that the defendant had a fair and impartial trial. The judgment and order appealed from are therefore affirmed.

Affirmed.

McINTOSH v. JONES et al.

(Supreme Court of Montana. Feb. 1, 1908.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT—NEGLIGENCE OF FELLOW SERVANTS—MASTER'S LIABILITY.

In the absence of a statute to the contrary, a master is not liable to one servant for injury caused by the negligence of another servant in the same common employment, unless the negligent servant was the master's rep-representative, or the master was negligent in employing or retaining him.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 34, Master and Servant, § 352.]

2. SAME—MASTER'S DUTY.

A transfer company owes the duty to one employed by it in moving pianos, etc., to exercise ordinary care in selecting a helper.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 34, Master and Servant, § 336.]

3. SAME—SELECTION OF FELLOW SERVANT.

An employé of a transfer company cannot recover from his employer for injury caused by a fellow employé negligently releasing a piano which they were moving downstairs, where all the ability required of the negligent employé was strength and ordinary intelligence, which he possessed.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 34, Master and Servant, § 336.]

Appeal from District Court, Silver Bow County; Geo. M. Bourquin, Judge.

Action by Edgar McIntosh against John O. Jones and another, partners under the firm name of the Jones Transfer Company. From a judgment for plaintiff against defendant John O. Jones, and an order denying a new trial, defendant John O. Jones appeals. Reversed, and new trial ordered.

John J. McHatton, for appellant. Maury, Templeman & Hogevoil, for respondent.

SMITH, J. The above-entitled action was instituted in the district court of Silver Bow county to recover damages for personal injuries received by plaintiff through the negligence of a fellow servant. Plaintiff and his fellow servant were engaged in moving a piano. Plaintiff in his complaint alleges: "That the defendant sent the said man and employed him to assist the plaintiff, either knowing him to be lacking in all skill in and about the said business, or negligently failed to find out whether the said man had any skill in and about the said business or not. That, while moving said piano, * * * the plaintiff and said man * * * working together, the said man negligently let go the piano when the plaintiff was under the same, and when the said man, if he had been (a) skillful man at this business, could have held the said piano off of the said plaintiff, and by and through the negligence of said man * * * in thus letting go negligently of the said piano, and through the negligence of the said defendants in either knowing the said man to have no skill at the work, or in negligently failing to find out if he had any skill or did not have any skill, the piano fell upon the plaintiff," and injured him. It is further alleged: "That until the said man * * * negligently let go of the piano * * * plaintiff did not know that he was lacking in skill and believed him to be in all respects a skillful and experienced man at the trade of moving pianos, * * * for which the defendants had employed him to work, and the plaintiff relied, when going to work with said man, upon the defendants that they would and did furnish him with a good and skillful and experienced fellow servant in and about the said work." For answer defendants first denied each and every allegation of the complaint, and thereafter set forth certain affirmative matters, not necessary to be considered in deciding the case, except to this extent: First. The answer contains an allegation "that, while the plaintiff and said man were attempting to move the piano, they did, through their own fault and lack of skill and attention, allow the same to fall upon the plaintiff." Second. It is therein set forth that plaintiff was injured "through his own lack of care in handling the piano, and that he knew all of the facts and circumstances surrounding the attempt to remove the same and the capacity of said man who was assisting him, and that he voluntarily assumed all risk of injury which might result therefrom, and that he himself contributed to his own injury, in that it was, in part, through his own fault that said piano was allowed to slip and fall upon his leg; that the said man who was assisting plaintiff in moving the piano was negligent therein, and that he was a fellow servant with the plaintiff, and that his negligence, together with that of the plaintiff, combined to bring about said accident and injury, and that plaintiff assumed all danger and risk of injury by reason of the employment of said man or any negligence or lack of care upon his part." The replication admits that the man who was assisting plaintiff in moving the piano was negligent therein, and was a fellow servant of plaintiff, but denies every other allegation of the answer. The trial resulted in a verdict in favor of plaintiff and against defendant J. O. Jones for $3,025, and from a judgment entered thereon and an order denying a motion for a new trial that defendant appeals. Many errors are assigned, but it will not be necessary to notice all of the specifications.

Plaintiff testified as follows, in part: "I worked for Jones for about two years prior to my injury, doing all kinds of transfer work, moving furniture, machinery, pianos, and so forth. Men ought to be experienced to move heavy freight and pianos, and should understand their business in order to be successful and not get hurt. * * * It takes experience and a long time for an ordinary man to become ordinarily skillful at that trade. * * * On the 14th day of June, 1905, in the morning, I was instructed to go down and unload a car load of furniture. Mr. Jones told me in the morning to employ another man, and go down there and unload this car load of furniture. So I did so. We worked the forenoon, and at noon Mr. Jones came to me and said, 'Mack, I want to take that man away from you that worked with you in the forenoon,' and he says, 'I will get you another man,' * * * and we went down after dinner, and we had a load of furniture in the car, such as chairs. This new man that Mr. Jones got me and I went down; so we went down there, and had this small load and unloaded it and came back to the city; and before we struck the stand Mr. Jones and his son, who stood on the sidewalk, * * * said to me, 'There is a piano at the Munroe School'; said for me to take this man and move the piano because they were overstocked with work that day, so I did so, according to instructions. We went to the place where the piano was, and * * * put the piano on this truck and rolled the piano to the brim of the stairs, and, of course, I went ahead of the piano and this here fellow. I told him to take the hind end of the piano, and, when I got ready, I said, 'Break the piano over, and be very careful, as we are in a dangerous place,' and he broke it over. While we two were moving the piano, this man acted all right so far as I could see. When we started the piano down the steps, he just merely let go of it, and I was ahead of it, and I couldn't hold it as she broke over. * * * It never landed on the stairs, and shot right ahead. If he had had hold of it until it got over the stairs, we would have had a purchase on it and could have held it. * * * A man of experience in the position in which the other man was as the piano was going over the top step would have had hold of the handles and held back for all his might. By so doing he would have checked the speed, and he and I could both have held the piano and taken it down safely. * * * I judge the piano weighed somewhere in the neighborhood of 800 pounds. * * * When the piano came forward, my limb got underneath the piano truck, and the piano slid down the steps on my limb, and tore my foot off, and bruised my leg and broke some bones. My leg was taken off there, about four or five inches below the knee." On cross-examination he testified: "I started myself and went down the street to see if I could locate a man. I could not locate one suitable for me, so I came back and told Mr. Jones I couldn't get a man. * * * Then Mr. Jones went out for five or ten minutes, and he brought back a man about the same height as myself, fair, and a strong, robust-looking fellow, who weighed 170 pounds, I should judge. He was a stout-looking man. From outward appearances, he seemed to be a capable man, and he was sober, and I thought he was all right, judging from his appearance. While he was helping me to move this load of furniture, he was all right; didn't show any lack of intelligence for work of that kind. I had moved pianos before, quite a number of them. * * * I did not make any objection to moving the piano with this man. I was relying on Mr. Jones. I was satisfied when I started out with him that he was all right and reliable for the doing of that work. * * * Up to the time he let go of the piano, he acted as a man of intelligence, and had done everything in a proper way towards moving the piano, as far as I could judge. Prior to the time we began the operation of the piano, and during the time we were putting the piano on the truck, I told him that that was a dangerous operation—the moving of the piano—as we came downstairs, and I had warned him to be careful, and up to that time he had acted as though he was endeavoring to comply with my request."

Respondent's counsel suggest that appellant has not complied with rule 10 (82 Pac. ix) of this court, in that his brief does not state where in the transcript the judgment can be found, and does not state the questions involved on the appeal, as directed by the rule. We find on page 6 of the brief the statement that the judgment may be found at page 23 of the transcript, and a copy of the judgment is there set forth. We think the statement of the case presents the questions involved substantially in compliance with the rule. At the close of plaintiff's case the defendants moved for a nonsuit, on the grounds, among others, first, that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action; second, that there was no evidence that the man who assisted plaintiff was an incompetent or unskillful man to engage in such work, and, if he was incompetent, the plaintiff either knew it or had reason to know it, and assumed the risk; third, that the evidence fails to show that the man engaged with plaintiff was unskillful, unfit, or incompetent for the work in which he was engaged, and fails to show that the defendants were lacking in the exercise of ordinary care in the selection and employment of said man; and, fourth, that, if plaintiff was injured through the act of the other man, it was a single act of negligence, and did not establish incompetence or lack of skill. This motion was overruled as to the appellant J. O. Jones. We think the motion should have been granted as to him, and our reasons may be stated generally, without taking up, in detail, the different grounds of the motion.

It is a settled rule of law, where not changed by statute, that a master is not bound to indemnify one servant for injuries caused by the negligence of another servant in the same common employment as himself, unless the negligent servant was the master's representative. 2 Labatt, Master and Servant, § 470. While the reason for and origin of the foregoing rule are matters of dispute among courts and law-writers, the rule itself is not doubted. But the doctrine that a servant cannot maintain an action for injuries caused by the negligence of a co-servant has always been conceded to be subject to an exception in cases where negligence on the master's part in employing or retaining in his employ the delinquent co-servant is shown. 2 Labatt, Master and Servant, § 480. Judge Bailey, in his work entitled "Master's Liability for Injuries to Servant" (page 47), states the exception to the rule thus: "The master must exercise due and reasonable care in the selection of his servants, with reference to their fitness and competency." And on page 55: "The presumption is that the master has exercised proper care in the selection of the servant. It is incumbent upon the party charging negligence in this respect to show it by proper evidence." In the case at bar the plaintiff raises no question as to the relations existing between him and his helper. It is admitted that they were fellow servants engaged in a common employment. The allegation which we shall consider is that defendants did not exercise ordinary care in selecting a reasonably competent man to assist the plaintiff. It is true that the defendants alleged in their answer that, "while the plaintiff and said man were attempting to move said piano, they did, through their own fault and lack of skill and attention, allow the same to fall upon and crush the plaintiff's ankle and foot." But the phrase "lack of skill," used in this connection, must be construed to refer to the act of negligence testified to by the plaintiff, and it was evidently so treated at the trial.

The first question to be decided is: What measure of care was required of the defendants in the selection of a man to assist in moving a piano? And in this connection it may be remarked that, if any particular degree of skill is required in moving a piano, that skill, in this case, was furnished by the plaintiff himself. He was the expert in the business, if we may be allowed that expression. He knew how to move pianos, had been engaged for two years in the work, and undertook to instruct the new man as to what was required of him. Those instructions were simple. The assistant was to take the hind end of the piano and be very careful. If these instructions had been followed, the helper would have taken hold of the handles, and held back "with all his might." Plaintiff testified that it requires some skill to move a piano and some experience to acquire that skill. Concede that. Plaintiff himself supplied the skill and experience. All that was required of the helper was strength. That he apparently possessed. McIntosh says he was a strong, robust, and stout-looking fellow, weighing about 170 pounds, apparently sober and intelligent. The duty rested upon defendants to exercise ordinary care in the selection of the helper, in view of the nature of the work to be performed. The work required of the assistant was of an ordinary character, not essentially different from any other heavy laborer's work. It was not "hazardous," as distinguished from "ordinary." A physical inspection of the man was all that was necessary to show his competency, unless he was mentally deficient; and McIntosh says he was not. Indeed, the plaintiff does not claim, in his testimony, that the helper was incompetent. These are his words: "While we two were moving the piano, this man acted all right so far as I could see. When we started the piano down the steps, he just merely let go of it." No inquiry on the part of Jones would have disclosed the fact that the man would neglect to obey McIntosh's orders. A single, exceptional act, like this, will not prove a servant incompetent. It may be permissible to prove a single act of negligence as bearing upon the question of incompetency of the servant, or, at least, as bearing upon defendant's knowledge of the employee's conduct. The courts differ on this question, and we have no occasion to decide it here. But a single act of negligence, committed after the hiring and without the knowledge of the master, cannot possibly charge the master with lack of ordinary care in selecting the servant. Perhaps this case illustrates the principle of the master's nonliability for the negligent act of a fellow servant as aptly as any case could. It involves just such an act of negligence, on the part of a co-servant, as the master is not liable for, provided he has exercised ordinary care in the selection of the co-servant.

In the case of Harvey v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co., 88 N. Y. 481, the court said: "He [the negligent employee] was a man of but 56 years of age, and there is no suggestion that he was not possessed of ordinary intelligence. The duties of a switchman are not complicated or difficult, and there can be no doubt that on the day in question he was entirely competent to perform the duties imposed upon him. It appears from his own evidence that his failure to close the switch on the day in question did not arise from any inability on his part to perform the work he was set to do, but that such failure was the result of sheer inattention and carelessness on his part." And it was held that his employer was not liable for his failure to close a switch, resulting in the death of a fellow servant. This language is employed by the Supreme Court of New York, in the case of Burke v. Syracuse, B. & N. Y. R. R. Co., 69 Hun, 21, 25, 23 N. Y. Supp. 458, 460: "Upon the occasion of the injuries no duty rested upon Clark [a crossing tender] to open the switch. His act in raising the ball and breaking the main track was voluntary, thoughtless, and mistaken. Nothing appears in the case showing that he had not physical power to perform all the acts and duties required of him at the station, or that he was not mentally fit for the position assigned to him by the defendant. * * * The observations made by the learned counsel for the respondent seem appropriate and pertinent where he says: 'The defendant could not make a psychological examination of Clark, or delve into the secret recesses of his brain to ascertain whether, at some future period, he would for an instant become the prey of a delusion and work destruction. It was no more bound to anticipate this unnatural occurrence than it would have been the act of Clark, had he in a moment of temporary aberration drawn a pistol and killed the plaintiff's intestate.'" See, also, Baltimore Elevator Co. v. Neal, 65 Md. 438, 5 Atl. 338; Huffman v. Chicago, R. I. & P. Ry. Co., 78 Mo. 50; Couch v. West- ern Coal Co., 46 Iowa, 17; and, also, Hatt v. Nay, 144 Mass. 186, 10 N. E. 807; Frazier v. Pennsylvania R. R. Co., 38 Pa. 104, 80 Am. Dec. 467. There is no evidence in this case which warranted the jury in finding that any act of neglect on the part of the appellant contributed in any manner to produce the injury to plaintiff.

The judgment and order appealed from should be reversed and a new trial ordered.
Reversed and remanded.

BOWMAN v. OGDEN CITY.

(Supreme Court of Utah. Jan. 9, 1908.)

1. APPEAL—TRANSFER OF CAUSE—TIME OF TAKING APPEAL.

Under the statute providing that an appeal may be taken within six months from entry of the judgment, an appeal may be taken within six months after the overruling of a motion for a new trial, made within the time allowed by law.*

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 2, Appeal and Error, § 1895.]

2. SAME—REVIEW—PRESUMPTIONS—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

It will be presumed that the evidence was sufficient to support the verdict in the absence of a showing that the bill of exceptions contains all the evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, §§ 2911-2915, 8673.]

3. SAME—RECORD—BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—SUFFICIENCY OF CERTIFICATE.

A bill of exceptions was a transcript of the official stenographer's notes, with his certificate that it contained a full transcript of all the evidence. Counsel for respondent accepted service of the transcript, as and for the bill of exceptions, and indorsed thereon that they had no amendments to propose. The bill was thereupon allowed by the court "as a true and correct bill of exceptions." Held that, though the court in the certificate of settlement did not expressly state that the bill contained all the evidence, yet it by necessary implication certified to the truth of the statement of the stenographer that the bill contained all the evidence.††

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, §§ 2918-2925.]

4. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—DEFECTIVE SIDEWALKS—ACTIONS FOR INJURIES—NOTICE OF INJURY—WAIVER OF DEFECTS.

Defects in a claim presented to a city council under Sess. Laws 1903, p. 12, c. 19, in that it was not verified and did not sufficiently describe the extent of claimant's injury, were waived, where the city council did not decline to consider the claim because not properly made out, but acted on it.

5. ACCORD AND SATISFACTION—WHAT CONSTITUTES.

Where one having a personal injury claim against a city having presented the same receives a payment on account thereof, there being no express agreement that it shall be in satisfaction either in full or in part of the claim, the presumption is that it was intended as full recompense for the injury, barring a subsequent action for the same injury.

*Snow v. Rich, 22 Utah, 123, 61 Pac. 336; Felt v. Cook (Utah) 87 Pac. 1092.

†† Mitchell v. Jensen, 29 Utah, 346, 81 Pac. 165.

6. SAME—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

Evidence held insufficient to overcome the presumption that a sum paid by a city to one who had presented a personal injury claim against it was in full satisfaction of the claim.

7. SAME.

Where a personal injury claim against a city is only partially allowed, claimant cannot accept the part allowed, knowing that the rest has been rejected, and then recover in an action for the part rejected, in the absence of an agreement that the acceptance of the allowance shall be regarded as payment only of the part allowed, and that the city is not discharged from the part rejected.

8. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—CARE REQUIRED OF TRAVELER.

A traveler is required to keep a reasonable lookout for defects and dangers which are known to attend particular places, and to make such use of his faculties as will enable him to discover obvious dangers in a highway or sidewalk.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 36, Municipal Corporations, § 1673.]

9. SAME.

A traveler who has knowledge of a defective condition of such a character as renders a walk so unsafe that it cannot be prudently used is guilty of negligence in attempting to use it, if the defect can easily and without substantial inconvenience be avoided by going around it or taking a safer way.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 36, Municipal Corporations, § 1677.]

10. SAME.

It was not negligence per se for a traveler, who knew of a ridge about eight inches above the level of the walk left by filling in an excavation, to attempt to cross it while it was dark.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 36, Municipal Corporations, §§ 1673-1677.]

11. SAME.

That a traveler attempted to cross over a ridge about eight inches above the level of the sidewalk left by filling in an excavation, without thinking of it or the danger, which he knew, was not negligence per se.†

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 36, Municipal Corporations, §§ 1754-1756.]

Appeal from District Court, Second District; J. A. Howell, Judge.

Action by John Bowman against Ogden City. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals, and plaintiff moves to dismiss. Motion to dismiss denied. Reversed, and remanded for a new trial.

Jno. E. Bagley, for appellant. Richards, Rolapp & Pratt, for respondent.

STRAUP, J. Plaintiff brought this action to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been sustained by the negligence of the defendant. An excavation was made across a sidewalk in Ogden city for the laying of water or sewer pipes. After the pipes had been laid the excavation was filled. The surface was left in a rounded condition, and was raised about eight inches above the level of the walk. This condition existed for about one week prior to the accident. It is alleged that the plaintiff, in the nighttime, while walking along the walk, and being wholly unaware of the obstruction, struck or stubbed his toe against it, and was thrown to the ground. The answer contained a general denial, pleas of contributory negligence and accord and satisfaction, and allegations that the plaintiff failed to present a verified claim in compliance with the statute. A trial before the court and jury resulted in a verdict for the plaintiff, which was rendered on the 12th day of December, 1906. On the same day, a judgment was entered on the verdict in favor of the plaintiff, from which the defendant has prosecuted this appeal. On the 15th day of December the trial court granted the defendant 10 days' additional time in which to serve and file a notice of intention to move for a new trial. On the 21st day of December the defendant served and filed such a notice. The motion was overruled February 12, 1907. On July 6, 1907, the defendant served and filed a notice of appeal. The statute provides that notice of a motion for new trial must be filed within 5 days after the rendition of the verdict, but that the time may be extended by the court; that an appeal may be taken within six months from the entry of the judgment. The plaintiff has moved to dismiss the appeal because not taken in time. It is argued that an appeal can only be taken within six months from the entry of judgment, and not within six months from the overruling of a motion for new trial, and that the appeal was not taken within such time. The motion for new trial was filed within time. It has been repeatedly held by this court "that a judgment is not final while a motion for new trial, made within the time allowed by law, is pending and undisposed of, and that an appeal taken and perfected within six months from the date of the overruling of the motion for a new trial is taken in time." Snow v. Rich, 22 Utah, 123, 61 Pac. 336, and cases there cited; Felt v. Cook (Utah) 87 Pac. 1092. The motion to dismiss is denied.

A further question requires consideration before passing to the merits of the case. It is claimed by the respondent that the bill of exceptions does not contain all the evidence. To properly review the principal errors assigned, the bill should show that it contains all the evidence; for, in the absence of such a showing, it will be presumed the evidence was sufficient to support the verdict, the court justified in overruling the defendant's motion for nonsuit, and in refusing the defendant's request to direct a verdict in its favor. The bill of exceptions is a transcript of the official stenographer's notes containing the testimony of the witnesses by questions and answers, exhibits, and records of the city council. To the transcript so furnished by the stenographer is attached his certificate "that the foregoing 112 pages contain a full and correct transcript of all the testimony and other evidence adduced in said cause, and all the objections and exceptions of counsel and rulings of the court thereon, except only the impaneling of the jury, which is not included herein." Counsel for plaintiff accepted service of this transcript as and for the bill of exceptions, and indorsed thereon, "we have no amendments to propose to the foregoing, and consent that the same may be presented for settlement without further notice." The bill was thereupon settled and allowed by the court in the following language: "The foregoing bill of exceptions in the above-entitled cause is hereby settled, allowed, and signed by me as a true and correct bill of exceptions in this case." While the court, in the certificate of settlement, did not say in express language that the bill contains all the evidence, yet such expression was not essential, if the statement that the bill contains all the evidence otherwise sufficiently appears on the face of the bill. If counsel proposing the bill had, at the conclusion of the statement of the evidence, written the words, "the above is all the evidence in the case," and the court had as here certified that the foregoing "is true and correct," the certificate of the court would as necessarily imply the correctness of such statement as the correctness of the evidence set forth, or any other statement contained in the proposed bill. So, too, when the bill contains the statement made by the official stenographer that the foregoing pages "contain a full and correct transcript of all the testimony and other evidence adduced in said cause," the court, in certifying that the foregoing was true and correct by necessary implication, certified to the truth and correctness of such statement. This is not so because it was certified to by the stenographer, but for the reason that the court declared such statement true and correct, as well as every other statement contained in the proposed bill. We are no more authorized to assume such statement was not declared true and correct by the court and to disregard it than to disregard any other statement contained in the bill. We are therefore of the opinion that the bill affirmatively shows that it contains all the evidence in the case. Mitchell v. Jensen, 29 Utah, 346, 81 Pac. 165.

The first assignment of errors presents questions relating to the presentation of plaintiff's claim, and with respect to an accord and satisfaction. The evidence bearing thereon shows: The accident occurred on the 10th day of December, 1903. On the 21st day of the same month the plaintiff sent the following unverified written communication to the city council of Ogden city: "On December 10th going to work between Adams and Washington on Twenty-Third St. I was throwing by a high ridge left by covering by a pipe and was found insensible by Vic. Hestmark and taken hom unconscious because of falling and striking the ridge with head. There are others been hurt, but not so bad. I think it is not just I should lose work and suffer pain because of others carelessness or the city's. I wish to hear from you what you will do." The communication was referred to the law committee, who, on the 2d day of March, 1904, reported to the city council that they found the obstruction referred to; that the said Bowman was an elderly man and with no means of support other than his daily labor; that the injuries sustained by the fall caused him to lose three days time; and recommended that he be paid the sum of $5. The report was adopted by the council, and approved by the mayor on the 24th day of March. The plaintiff also put in evidence the following excerpts, taken from the minutes of the city council:

"Dec. 21, 1903. The petition of Mr. John Bowman for reparation of injuries received by falling over a high ridge left in the street by covering a pipe was referred to the law committee."

"Mar. 21, 1903. The law committee recommended that the sum of $5 be paid to John Bowman for personal injuries sustained by fall due to an obstruction on sidewalk. On motion of Mr. Craig the report was adopted."

A warrant for $5 was issued to the plaintiff on the 28th day of March, 1904. He received it, cashed it, and kept the money. When he received the warrant he gave a receipt. The receipt was not put in evidence. He further testified, on his direct examination, that he received information that there was a warrant of $5 for him, and that he went to the City Hall and got it; that the resolutions and the action taken by the city council were not shown him; that he had a talk with a Mr. Chambers, a member of the city council, but couldn't say whether it was before or after he got the warrant. He testified several times that he understood the warrant was for the time lost by him, and that one of the councilmen said to him the warrant "was for the time I had lost. The $5 was for the time I had lost work"—but each time the testimony was stricken by the court. On cross-examination he was asked to state the conversation had with Chambers. He said: "I spoke to him about the $5 in regard to the $5, and I understood it was for the time that was lost." Further questions were asked him, and answers were made thereto as follows: "Q. You told him you had lost 2½ days' work? A. Yes, sir. Q. You told him you wanted the council to pay you $5? A. They allowed $2 a day for the time I lost. Q. You told Mr. Chambers it would be satisfactory if the city council paid you that. A. Never did. Never said such a thing that I am aware of. * * * Q. Did you talk to other city councilmen about it? A. No, sir. Q. Only with Mr. Chambers? A. To tell you the real truth, you know, I never expected I would be taken down the way I was, else I would have made complaints heavier than I did. But I am one of that kind, and I am a well-known character of that kind. I wouldn't have been after the city if it hadn't been very slow looking after me in time of sickness."

He further testified that he was laid up a few days, and then went back to work until he took sick in April following, at which time he consulted a doctor. He then was asked questions, and made answers as follows: "Q. Isn't it true that when you believed you were injured worse than you thought you were then you thought you would go after the city council for more money? Isn't that right? A. When I believed I was getting worse, it was time to look out for something if possible. Q. And that is the reason you went after the city council? A. Because the accident happened. Q. But you didn't say anything to the city council after they gave you the $5 until you commenced suit. A. No; I didn't say anything to anybody. Q. Now, if you hadn't got sick in April, you wouldn't have brought this suit? A. Well, I don't know. I didn't like to bother them so much; but when I was cut short of income and such like, I thought it was time to look after it, when I knew very well where the complaint came from." On re-direct he was again asked to state the conversation had with Chambers, and he answered: "Why, that conversation was: I went and asked him about what was the intention of the $5, and he said it was for the work I had lost at the time." But he was unable to say whether it was before or after he received the warrant.

Mr. Chambers, for the defendant, testified that four or five days after the accident the plaintiff came to him and said that he had been injured by falling over a raise in the sidewalk, and that he thought the city was responsible; that he should receive his days' wages, which were a dollar and a half; and that he had lost three days. The witness told him that so far as he was concerned he would be in favor of giving him $5, and told him to present his claim to the city council. About a month or six weeks after the claim was allowed and paid the plaintiff called at his house and told him that he was then suffering from the effects of the fall, and thought that he should receive something more for his injuries. He told plaintiff that he did not have anything more to say about it, for when the amount was allowed he did not think anything more would result in the matter. Plaintiff told him that he did not know he was injured as badly as he was, and that he would file suit. The witness told him he had to use his own judgment about that. The testimony of this witness is not denied by plaintiff, except as appears in his testimony already referred to.

From this evidence it is contended, on the part of the defendant, that it was entitled to a directed verdict, on the grounds that the plaintiff failed to present a sufficient and proper claim, and that the plaintiff settled for and was paid in full of all demands. On the other hand, the plaintiff contends that the settlement and payment were only for the time lost by plaintiff, and not for the personal injuries sustained by him, and that he was entitled to have the question submitted to the jury as one of fact. The trial court adopted the views of plaintiff, and instructed the jury as follows: "The court charges you that, if you find from the evidence that upon the presentation of plaintiff's claim for damages to the city council of Ogden city he was allowed and paid both for his personal injuries and loss of time, and that he received such allowance in full payment for both his personal injuries and loss of time, then the court charges you that he is not entitled to recover in this action; but the court charges you that if you find from the evidence that he was allowed and paid only for his loss of time and wages, and not for his personal injuries, and that the city complied with the plaintiff's acceptance of the amount allowed him on condition that the same was to be accepted in full satisfaction for all injuries received, then the plaintiff is entitled to be compensated for the physical injury, pain, suffering, and sickness resulting therefrom in this action," provided they found the defendant guilty of negligence. Chapter 19, p. 12, Sess. Laws 1903, provides that claims of this character must be presented to the city council in writing, signed by the claimant or his agent, properly verified, and describing the time, place, cause, and extent of the damage or injury, and if the city council shall refuse to hear or consider a claim because not properly made out, notice thereof must be given the plaintiff and sufficient time allowed him to have the claim properly itemized and verified. The plaintiff's claim was not properly made out as provided by the statute in several particulars, principally because it was not verified, and the extent of his injury or damage not sufficiently described. The city council, however, did not decline to consider it, nor to investigate the facts, because the claim was not properly made out. On the contrary it treated the claim, and acted upon it, as though it had been in full compliance with the statute. In such case the defects of the claim presented were waived, and were not thereafter available as a defense to the action. But on the ground that the settlement and payment were in satisfaction of plaintiff's claim, a verdict ought to have been directed for the defendant. Plaintiff's cause of action was for a single tort, and all the damages resulting therefrom were required to be reserved and recovered in one suit. In the presentation of his claim the plaintiff was not at liberty to split his demand. He could not present a claim only for a part, and, if it was allowed, accept it, and then present another claim for another part. The fair meaning of plaintiff's claim as presented by him is that it was a presentation of his entire demand. We think it was so intended by him. As such it was received and acted on by the defendant. From the action taken by the city council it is very clear that the payment made was intended by it to be in full of all demands. When it allowed and tendered plaintiff $5, in the absence of any showing to the contrary, he must be held to know that such allowance was in full, or an allowance in part and a rejection in part, and when he accepted the amount tendered it must be presumed that the payment was in full satisfaction of his entire claim. The plaintiff, having a cause of action against the defendant, unliquidated with respect to amount, for personal injuries claimed to have been caused by its negligence, and having presented a claim for his damage or injury as he was required to do, and having received from the city a stated sum of money on his claim, there being no express agreement that it should be in satisfaction either in whole or in part of the cause of action, the presumption is that it was intended by the parties as a full recompense for the injury, and operates as an accord and satisfaction, barring a subsequent action to recover damages for the same injury. Hinkle v. Minneapolis & St. L. Ry. Co., 31 Minn. 434, 18 N. W. 275; Canton Coal Co. v. Parlin, etc., Co., 215 Ill. 244, 74 N. E. 143, 106 Am. St. Rep. 162; Anderson v. Standard Granite Co., 92 Me. 429, 43 Atl. 21, 69 Am. St. Rep. 522.

If the payment was intended by the parties not to be in settlement of all, but only in part, of plaintiff's demand or claim, it was incumbent on him to show it. We have excerpted from the record all the evidence bearing upon this question. We think it wholly insufficient to overcome the presumption. There is no evidence in the record sufficient to support a finding that the payment was intended by the parties to be only for the time lost by plaintiff, and not for his entire demand. It appears from the plaintiff's own testimony that the minds of the parties did not meet on such a proposition. True he testified that he understood the payment was only for such purpose (which testimony was stricken by the court), and that a councilman told him, either before or after he received the warrant, that the $5 was for the work he had lost at the time. But it is not shown that the councilman had authority to bind the city by such a statement. Furthermore the statement made is very far from showing an agreement that the payment was only to be in recompense for the time lost, and that all other matters were left open for future determination and settlement. It is not inconsistent with, nor does it overcome, the presumption referred to, but is entirely consistent with the contention that the councilman regarded the few days' time lost the only damages sustained by plaintiff. The plaintiff could not present a claim, and, if allowed as to time lost, and rejected as to damages for injury to the person, accept the portion allowed, knowing that the rest had been rejected, and then recover in an action, for the portion rejected, in the absence of an express agreement between himself and the defendant that the acceptance of the allowance should be regarded as payment only of the part allowed, and that the defendant was not discharged nor released from the part rejected or disallowed. Such an agreement has not been shown. If the plaintiff was dissatisfied with the allowance, he was required either to forego the portion rejected, or submit his claim as a whole to the courts. He cannot be permitted to accept that part which is to his advantage, and make the other a subject of litigation. If his claim was only partially allowed, as he claims it was, he was required to accept the part so allowed in satisfaction of his whole claim, or litigate it as an entirety. Yavapai County v. O'Niell, 3 Ariz. 303, 29 Pac. 430; Ingram v. State, etc., Commission, 4 Idaho, 130, 36 Pac. 702; Board of Com'rs v. Seawell, 3 Okl. 281, 40 Pac. 592; Zirker v. Hughes, 77 Cal. 235, 19 Pac. 423; Brick v. County of Plymouth, 63 Iowa, 402, 19 N. W. 304.

There is evidence tending to show that the plaintiff, when he presented his claim and received the warrant, did not know his injuries were as serious as later they appeared to be. Appellant has very forcibly urged that such fact alone is not sufficient ground to avoid the settlement. We need not inquire into such matter, for no controversy as to an avoidance of the settlement has arisen. Neither by pleading or otherwise did the plaintiff below, nor does he here, seek to avoid the settlement on such or any other ground. The only controversy which has arisen with respect to the settlement relates to its terms, and involves the question whether the plaintiff settled only a part or the whole of his demand.

The defendant further contends: That the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence. For a week before the accident the plaintiff usually passed along the walk where the raised condition was once or twice a day in going to and from his work. That he observed the height of the raise, and one time remarked that it was a "slovenly job." That at the time of the accident, early in the morning and when dark, he came along at a pretty fair walk, and stubbed his toe against the raise and fell. He further testified that at the time "I never thought about it (the obstruction). If I had thought about it, it would not have happened, perhaps. But a man's mind is not always on such objects as that. * * * I knew it was there, but a man has not always his memory with him. * * * I did not see the mound of earth at the time I stumbled. I did not mind much about it. I tumbled, and I didn't know nothing more." The plaintiff was 79 years of age, but, as stated by him, rather spry for one of his age. It is claimed that the plaintiff was guilty of negligence in using the sidewalk with knowledge of the defect. It is undoubtedly the law that one is required to keep a reasonable lookout for defects and dangers which are known to attend particular places, and that one is bound to make such use of his faculties as will enable him to discover obvious dangers in a highway or sidewalk. And if a traveler has knowledge of a defective condition of such a character as renders the walk so unsafe that it cannot be prudently used, he is guilty of negligence in voluntarily attempting to travel upon it, if the defect could easily and without substantial inconvenience be avoided by going around it or taking a safer way. But the defect here was not such as would or should have turned a prudent traveler off from the walk to seek a better route. Going upon a sidewalk known to be defective or out of repair is not of itself negligence, unless the defect is of such a character that a reasonably prudent person should not have attempted to use the walk. The rule is well stated in the case of the City of Bedford v. Neal, 143 Ind. 425, 41 N. E. 1020, 42 N. E. 815, in the following language: "The appellee knew all about the defect in the sidewalk when she entered upon it the last time in the dark, whereby she received her fall and injury. It is true that it is settled law in this court that, because one has knowledge that a highway or sidewalk is out of repair or even dangerous, he is not therefore bound to forego travel upon such highway or sidewalk. [Citing numerous cases.] But the doctrine to be extracted from these cases is that the person with knowledge of the defect or danger must, in attempting to pass, exercise care proportionate to the known danger to avoid injury. And as a consequence the appellee in the case before us, having knowledge of the defect and unsafe condition of the sidewalk when she entered upon it the last time in the dark, she was required to exercise more care than she would have been required to exercise had she been ignorant of the defect, or there had been no defect and the time had been daylight." (Citing cases.) Nor is the fact that plaintiff did not have the defect in mind at the time of the accident conclusive on the question. In the case of Doan v. Town of Willow Springs, 101 Wis. 112, 76 N. W. 1104, it was said: "Nor was it error for the court to instruct the jury that the fact that the plaintiff had driven over the highway at the point in question with knowledge of its defective and dangerous condition was not conclusive in law that he was guilty of contributory negligence. True the plaintiff testified that he was not thinking when the accident occurred; that he did not know why, but he just happened not to be thinking; that any man was liable to go along the road without thinking of a bad place therein. Within the repeated rulings of this court, this would not have been sufficient to justify the court in taking the case from the jury." To the same effect is the case of Dwyer v. Salt Lake City, 19 Utah, 525, 57 Pac. 535, where it is said: "Although the respondent had previous knowledge of the condition of the sidewalk and embankment, and undertook to cross the embankment on a dark night, and momentarily forgot about it, yet such knowledge, undertaking, and forgetfulness were not conclusive evidence of such contributory negligence as would bar recovery." We are of the opinion that the question of contributory negligence was one of fact for the jury.

Because of the error pointed out, the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial, costs to appellant.

MCCARTY, C. J., and FRICK, J., concur.

(33 Utah, 209)

MANTI CITY SAVINGS BANK v. PETERSON et al.

(Supreme Court of Utah. Jan. 10, 1908.)

1. CONTRACTS—ORAL CONTRACTS—CONSTRUCTION—QUESTIONS FOR COURT AND JURY.

Where the terms of an oral contract are precise and explicit, the language clear and unequivocal, and there is nothing doubtful or ambiguous about it requiring explanation by resorting to extraneous circumstances, the court should leave to the jury merely the question of its existence, as testified to, and not the question of its effect.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 11, Contracts, §§ 767-770.]

2. TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—MATTERS NOT IN ISSUE.

The giving of an instruction as to estoppel, the question of estoppel not being raised by the pleadings or evidence, is error.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 46, Trial, §§ 587-612.]

3. REPLEVIN—MISLEADING INSTRUCTIONS.

Where defendants leased sheep to T., and T. mortgaged them and sheep belonging to himself to plaintiff, an instruction in replevin therefor after the death of T., that plaintiff as mortgagee of T. succeeded to his rights of ownership and possession in the sheep on default in the conditions of the mortgage, and for the purpose of enforcing such rights plaintiff enjoys the same rights, both of ownership and possession, which T. had, while unobjectionable, if by it the court meant to, and did only, say that plaintiff succeeded to whatever ownership T. had and to his right of possession arising from such ownership, might have been understood by the jury, when read in connection with the succeeding instruction, which, even if correct, had no proper place in the case, that any contract in relation to the running of sheep between T. and defendants in force at T.'s death would not be terminated by his death alone, but would remain in force, and its obligations would have to be performed by his executor or administrator, who also would receive the benefits thereof for the estate, to mean that, as T. was given the right of possession of the sheep under the leases or contracts between him and defendants, plaintiff, under its mortgage, also had such a right of possession, to which extent it was misleading and erroneous; T.'s right under his lease being personal to him and not assignable, without consent of the lessors.

4. CONFUSION OF GOODS—EFFECT—TENANCY IN COMMON.

Where leased sheep are intermingled with the sheep of the lessee, and so incapable of identification, the lessors and lessee, as to the flock, become tenants in common.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 10, Confusion of Goods, § 10.]

5. TENANCY IN COMMON—MORTGAGES.

A mortgage of sheep in which the mortgagor has an interest as tenant in common passes such interest.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 45, Tenancy in Common, § 138.]

6. SAME—ACTION BETWEEN CO-TENANTS—REPLEVIN.

While the general rule against a tenant in common maintaining replevin against his cotenant for his individual interest in the common property does not obtain where the property is alike in quality and value, and readily divisible by measurement or weight, and his part is wrongfully detained, and the action is necessary for maintenance of his rights, yet he must show the existence of all these conditions.

Appeal from District Court, Seventh District; F. Erickson, Judge.

Action by the Manti City Savings Bank against Niels Peterson and others. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Reversed, and remanded for new trial.

See 86 Pac. 414.

J. W. Cherry, E. Hansen, and Thurman, Wedgwood & Irvine, for appellants. W. D. Livingston and Willard Hanson, for respondent.

STRAUP, J. This is an action of replevin. On December 5, 1902, one Peter Thompson gave a mortgage to the plaintiff on 1,600 head of stock sheep to secure the payment of a promissory note for $1,594.16 payable August 1, 1903. The note and mortgage evidenced a renewal of a loan theretofore made by plaintiff to Thompson. Peter Thompson was engaged in the business of running sheep and farming. He died August 2, 1903. No part of the note had been paid. The mortgage contains a provision giving the mortgagee the right to take possession of the sheep on default of payments or breach of the mortgage covenants. The sheep described in the mortgage were "stock sheep marked with two upper bits in the left ear and an upper bit and under bit in the right, and branded with a 'T' wool brand on the back." On September 2d, the sheep then being in the possession of the defendants, the plaintiff demanded possession, which was refused. It then commenced this action, and the sheriff, under the order of seizure, took possession of 2,160 head of sheep marked as described in the mortgage, and delivered them to the plaintiff. The defendants, in their answer, denied plaintiff's ownership and right of possession, and alleged ownership and right of possession in themselves to 2,163 head of sheep, marked as described in the mortgage. The case was tried before the court and a jury. A verdict was rendered in favor of plaintiff. The defendants appeal.

The plaintiff gave evidence showing the execution and delivery of the note and mortgage, and nonpayment of the note; that

Peter Thompson, at the time of his death, was in the possession of about 2,900 head of sheep; that about 2,163 head, including increase, were marked as described in the mortgage; a demand on, and a refusal by, the defendants to give possession; and that the plaintiff sold of the sheep so taken from the defendants and out of the herd 2,141 head, in satisfaction of the mortgage. The defendants gave evidence that of the 2,900 head of sheep in the possession of Peter Thompson at the time of his death something over 2,000 head belonged to them, and which had been leased to him by them. With respect to the number owned by the defendant Fisher he testified that he first leased sheep to the deceased in 1897; that in 1901 he leased 387 head to him; and that the terms of the lease were evidenced by a writing, signed and delivered by the deceased, as follows: "Ephraim, Utah, October 1st, 1901. This certifies that I have leased and received of C. J. Fisher of Ephraim, Utah, three hundred and eighty-seven head of stock sheep for one year, and agree to pay to said C. J. Fisher ten head of sheep increase on each one hundred, also one and one-half pounds of wool on each head for the lease and use of said sheep. Said 387 sheep, together with the ten on each hundred increase when returned to said C. J. Fisher, to be an average of all the sheep in my herd, and to be received by him or delivered to him within thirty miles of Ephraim, Utah, on October 1st, 1902; said sheep to be separated from my herd in presence of said C. J. Fisher or a representative duly authorized by him to receive them. [Signed] Peter Thompson." He further testified that the contract was renewed in the fall of 1902; that he had received the wool rentals, but not any sheep, from the deceased; that in the fall of 1903 he was entitled to and owned 468 head in the herd; that the deceased was to have the care and management of the sheep and pay the taxes on them, but that he was not to sell any of them without his permission; that the sheep and their increase were to be marked with Peter Thompson's mark (the same mark described in mortgage), and that the sheep were to be mixed with Thompson's sheep; and that the witness could not identify his sheep nor distinguish them from the rest of the herd.

The defendant Niels Thompson testified: That he leased sheep to the deceased commencing in 1896 on the same terms as testified to by defendant Fisher, but that his lease was verbal. Each year they had a settlement and determined the number of sheep belonging to him. In the fall of 1901 he had 832 head. In 1902 a settlement was had, and he had 915 head, and in 1903 he was entitled to and owned about 1,000 head.

The defendant Albert Thompson testified that he also leased sheep to the deceased commencing in 1896 upon terms similar to those of the other defendants; that at the end of each year a settlement was had; that in 1901 he leased 489.2 head, which was evidenced by a writing, signed and delivered to him by the deceased, as follows: "Ephraim, Utah, October 1, 1901. This certifies that I have 489.2 sheep on shares belonging to Albert Thompson, for which I agree to pay 1½ pounds of wool and 10 sheep increase per hundred, the sheep when delivered to be at or near Ephraim, Utah, and to be an average of my herd. [Signed] Peter Thompson." He further testified that in the fall of 1902 the contract was renewed.

The defendant Caroline Linberg testified that she leased sheep to the deceased under the following terms:

"Ephraim, Utah, July 6, 1897.

"This certifies that I have 21 head of sheep on shares belonging to Caroline Linberg and agree to pay 1¼ lbs. of wool per head and one increase on ten head. Received said sheep October 1, 1898, from Ezra Madsen.

"[Signed] Peter Thompson.

"Sheep due October 1, 1898, 25.4 and to be kept one year for ten increase per hundred and 1½ pounds of wool per head. Sheep due October 1, 1899.

"[Signed] Peter Thompson.

"Sheep due October, 1900, 30.74 head, to be kept one year from October 1900, at above terms.

"[Signed] Peter Thompson.

"Ephraim, July 1, 1902.

"Have 37.19 head of sheep in herd of Caroline Linberg. Due October 1, 1902, and if left in herd to be on above terms, one in ten increase and one and one-half pounds of wool.

"[Signed] Peter Thompson."

The defendant Johnson testified that he leased sheep to the deceased commencing in 1896 on the same terms as those of the other defendants; that the contract was renewed each year; that in the fall of 1902 the deceased had 178 head of sheep, and in the fall of 1903, 193 head.

All of the defendants testified that they received the wool rentals but no sheep from the deceased; that the sheep leased by them were mingled with Peter Thompson's sheep, and were marked with his mark for convenience and identification. The defendants also introduced in evidence book entries made by the deceased, and accounts kept by him between the defendants and himself from 1896 to 1901. Among others were the following:

"Oct. 1, 1901. Albert Johnson. Sheep on shares: 160.9."

"Oct. 1, 1901. N. Thompson. Sheep on shares: 915."

"Oct. 1, 1901. Albert Thompson. Sheep on shares: 489.2."

"Oct. 1, 1901. C. J. Fisher. Sheep in herd: 320. John Lindberg 27.95."

The defendants further testified that they had no knowledge or notice that the deceased had given a mortgage on the sheep.

The case was here on a former appeal upon substantially the same facts. 30 Utah. 475, 86 Pac. 414, 116 Am. St. Rep. 862. On the first trial, which was before the court, all the evidence of the defendants as above set forth was stricken on the theory that, as the identical sheep leased by them to the deceased were not to be returned, and were not capable of identification, the transactions were to be regarded as sales, and not as bailments or as creating a tenancy in common, and that the title of the sheep passed to the deceased, and he therefore conveyed mortgage title to the plaintiff, who thereafter became entitled to the possession of them. In so ruling and in striking the evidence we held the court erred, for which, among other reasons, the judgment was reversed, and the cause remanded. On a retrial of the case, the court instructed the jury as follows: "The defendants assert title to the sheep in controversy in this action, and each of them claim to have delivered certain sheep to Peter Thompson before the execution of plaintiff's mortgage, upon the terms that Thompson was to run them and allow a certain percentage of increase and pay a certain amount of wool each year as rent, and return the original number, with the increase added, at the termination of the lease, and that for convenience the sheep were all to be marked with Peter Thompson's mark. You are instructed that if you find from the evidence that the defendants did deliver any sheep to Peter Thompson upon those terms, the title to any such sheep would remain in the defendants, unless you find from the evidence that the parties to the transaction intended the contract as a sale and not a lease. In order to determine the right of possession in this action you should determine the intention of the contracts, whether verbal or in writing, between the defendants and Peter Thompson, the mortgagor of the plaintiff. In so doing you may consider all the circumstances attending the making of the same and the effect given to them by the parties thereto. If you find from the evidence that it was the intention of the parties to the respective contracts to pass the title to the sheep therein described to Peter Thompson, then such contracts are contracts of sale, and they give the ownership and also the right of possession of said sheep to Peter Thompson. If, on the other hand, you find that the intention of the parties was not to pass the title of said sheep to Peter Thompson, but that the delivery of the same to him, if there was ever such a delivery, was merely for the purpose of ranging and caring for the same, then such contracts are contracts of bailment, and do not give the right of ownership to Peter Thompson." By these instructions the court permitted the jury to determine whether the deceased and the defendants, by the terms of their contracts, intended to pass the title of the sheep to the deceased, or whether they intended them as mere contracts of bailment. It was in effect casting the duty on the jury to determine whether the contracts were contracts of sale or bailment. In this we think the court erred.

Upon this question the case of Spragins v. White, 108 N. C. 449, 13 S. E. 171, is very pertinent. There an action was brought to recover the price of shoes sold. The defendant testified that, after having a conversation with the plaintiff's representative, he "agreed to buy a bill of shoes upon his promise to have them in Aulander in two weeks. Without this promise I would not have taken the goods. I had a contract to fill within two weeks. Plaintiff sent me an invoice of the goods and shipped them." The trial court there charged the jury: "If you should believe that this agreement and bargain were made, then you must inquire and determine what was meant and understood by it by the parties making it. Did it mean that the plaintiffs were to insure at all events the delivery by the transportation company of the goods in two weeks, and that in failure of such delivery in two weeks the sale was to be void at the option of the defendant, and he might return the goods to plaintiffs? If so, plaintiffs are not entitled to recover. But if it meant that plaintiffs were to use all due diligence in forwarding the order, in packing and shipping the goods by the common carrier, and plaintiffs did all these things, then plaintiffs are entitled to recover the bill and interest, as before stated." In reviewing the charge, the appellate court, in quoting from Young v. Jeffreys, 20 N. C. 361, said: "Where a contract is wholly in writing, and the intention of the framers is by law to be collected from the document itself, then the entire construction of the contract, that is, the ascertainment of the intention of the parties as well as the effect of that intention, is a pure question of law, and the whole office of the jury is to pass on the existence of the alleged written agreement. Where the contract is by parol, that is, oral, the terms of the agreement are of course a matter of fact, and if those terms be obscure, or equivocal, or are susceptible of explanation from extrinsic evidence, it is for the jury to find also the meaning of the terms employed; but the effect of a parol agreement, when its terms are given and their meaning fixed, is as much a question of law as the construction of a written agreement." It was there further stated that, if there be no dispute as to the terms of oral contracts, and they be precise and explicit, it is for the court to declare their effect, and in such case the rule is the same as if the contract were in writing. To the same effect is Gassett v. Glazier, 165 Mass. 473, 43 N. E. 193.

The terms of the contracts here were necessarily to be ascertained from the evidence. Some of the contracts were in writing. Others were oral. But in all the terms were precise and explicit; the language used, clear and unequivocal. There was not anything doubtful or ambiguous about them which required explanation by resorting to extraneous circumstances. It was the duty of the court to instruct the jury that, if they found the existence of the contracts as testified to by the defendants, the effect of such contracts did not constitute a sale of the sheep; that the title did not pass to the deceased (Savings Bank v. Peterson, 30 Utah, 480, 86 Pac. 414, 118 Am. St. Rep. 862, and cases there cited); and that he, as against the defendants, could not, without their consent, give a binding mortgage upon the sheep which he had received and held under the terms disclosed by such contracts.

The court further charged the jury: "You are instructed that, as a general rule of law, Peter Thompson could not, by his mortgage, convey to the plaintiff a better title to the sheep in controversy than he himself may have had; or, in other words, no one without title can convey a title to any property and defeat the claim of the rightful owner. But under some circumstances the owner of property is estopped to assert his title to such property against an innocent purchaser or mortgagee for value, and in such circumstances the rights of innocent third parties do not depend upon the actual title or authority of the party with whom they deal directly, but are derived from the acts of the real owner, which preclude him from disputing, as against them, the existence of the title or power which, through negligence or mistaken confidence, he caused or allowed to appear vested in the party making the mortgage or other conveyance. In other words where one of two innocent persons suffers from the wrong of a third person, he must suffer by the wrong who puts it in the power of the wrongdoer to cause the loss." This charge should not have been given. Neither the pleadings nor the evidence raised a question of estoppel. It was not alleged, nor was it proven, that the defendants had knowledge of the execution of the mortgage, or that they misrepresented or concealed any fact with respect to their title or ownership, or that they induced the giving of the mortgage, or that the plaintiff in any particular was misled or deceived by any act or conduct on their part or by anything said or done by them. The giving of the instruction may well have led the jury to believe that there was evidence in the case upon which they were at liberty to find that the defendants were estopped from asserting their title or right of possession to the sheep.

The court also instructed the jury (No. 13) as follows: "You are instructed that the plaintiff herein, as mortgagee of Peter Thompson, succeeded to his rights of ownership and possession in the sheep in controversy upon default of the conditions of the mortgage under which the plaintiff claims its right of possession, and for the purpose of enforcing and defending such rights the plaintiff enjoys the same rights, both of ownership and possession, which Peter Thompson had." And (13a) as follows: "I instruct you that any contracts in relation to the running of sheep between Peter Thompson and any of the defendants in force at the time of Peter Thompson's death would not be terminated by reason of his death alone, but the same would remain in force and effect, and the obligations thereof would have to be performed by his executor or administrator, who also would receive the benefits of such contracts for and in behalf of said estate." If by instruction No. 13 the court meant to, and did only, say that the plaintiff succeeded to whatever ownership the deceased had, and to his right of possession arising from such ownership, the instruction would not be open to criticism. But when it is read in connection with 13a the jury might well have understood it to mean that, inasmuch as the deceased was given the right of possession of the sheep under the contracts or leases between him and the defendants, the plaintiff, under its mortgage, also had such a right of possession. To that extent the instruction was misleading and erroneous. The only right of possession which the plaintiff had was dependent upon its mortgage, and upon the title and ownership of the deceased. It was entitled to the possession of whatever sheep the deceased owned and was mortgaged to it by him. It was not, however, entitled to the possession of any sheep which the defendants had leased to him. Because the deceased was in possession of the defendants' sheep under the terms of the leases, the plaintiff, by virtue of its mortgage, did not succeed to such a right of possession. The leasing of the sheep by the defendants to the deceased was personal to him. His right thereunder was not assignable to a third party without the consent of the defendants. Lewis v. Sheldon, 103 Mich. 102, 61 N. W. 269; Randall v. Chubb, 46 Mich. 311, 9 N. W. 429, 41 Am. Rep. 165. His right of possession, depending upon the leases, ended with his death. It was wholly unnecessary to inform the jury as to what rights possessed by the deceased would, or would not, be succeeded to by his executor or administrator, as was done in instruction No. 13a.

Furthermore, we very much doubt the correctness of the law as therein stated. While the administrator undoubtedly succeeded to whatever interest the deceased had in and to the sheep, yet it would seem the leases, being personal with the deceased, and calling for his personal care and attention, ended with his death, and that the administrator would not be authorized, against the consent of the defendants, to step into the shoes of the deceased and run the sheep as he might have done had he lived. Edwin Booth's administrator might quite as well have claimed the right to play Hamlet under a part-performed contract of his intestate, or the executor of James Whistler to paint an unfinished painting of his testator. If the testimony of the defendants concerning the leases and the number of sheep leased by them to the deceased is believed and found to be true, then the deceased at the time of his death had in his possession something like 2,100 head of sheep—the exact number we do not undertake to say—belonging to the defendants. The remainder of the herd of 2,900 head of sheep belonged to the deceased. If the sheep which the defendants had leased were mixed with the sheep of the deceased so as to be incapable of identification, the deceased and the defendants, as to the herd, became tenants in common. Whatever interest the deceased as such tenant in common had in and to the herd the plaintiff succeeded to under its mortgage. Generally one tenant in common cannot maintain replevin against his co-tenant for his individual interest in the common property. Such undoubtedly is the rule where the common property consists of a specific chattel or a single piece of property, as was the case in Hill v. Seager, 3 Utah, 379, 3 Pac. 545, or where the things in their nature are so far indivisible that the share of one is not susceptible of delivery without the whole. But it has been frequently held that the rule should not obtain in a case where the intermingled property is alike in quality and value and readily divisible by measurement or weight. It has been quite generally held that tenants in common, or persons who are separate owners of articles stored in mass, such as corn, wheat, coal, logs, etc., each article being of like nature and quality with the others, may have replevin for his proportionate part of the intermingled chattels if the same is wrongfully detained and the action is necessary for the maintenance of his rights, subject to deductions for any loss or waste properly falling to his share while the property remained in mass. 20 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law, 493, and cases; Shinn on Replevin, § 183, and cases.

If the testimony of the defendants is true, and the sheep were intermingled and incapable of identification, they and the plaintiff at the time of its demand were tenants in common, but before it was entitled to maintain the action it was necessary to show that the property was alike in quality and value; was easily divisible; that the defendants asserted ownership to the entire herd, or attempted to remove or convert the common property, or otherwise wrongfully held it antagonistic and hostile to the rights of the plaintiff; that they refused, on plaintiff's demand, to deliver; and that the action was necessary for the maintenance of plaintiff's rights. When such is shown it is entitled to the possession of whatever interest the deceased, as tenant in common, had in and to the herd at the time of his death. It is entitled to no more. It in no event was entitled to the possession of the interests which the defendants, or either of them, had in and to the herd.

The judgment of the court below is therefore reversed, and the cause remanded for new trial. Costs to appellants.

(33 Utah, 222)

BROWN v. SALT LAKE CITY.

(Supreme Court of Utah. Jan. 9, 1908.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—PRESENTATION OF CLAIMS—CONDITION PRECEDENT.

The presentation to a city of claims against it, when required by statute stipulating that no action shall be brought on a claim against a city unless the same has been presented to the council thereof, is a condition precedent and unless done no recovery can be had.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 36, Municipal Corporations, § 1697.]

2. SAME.

An action against a city by a mother for the death of her minor son, through the negligence of the city in failing to guard the entrance to a conduit constructed and maintained by it as a part of its waterworks system, is not based on a claim within the statute providing that claims arising out of defective streets, sidewalks, etc., or for negligence of the city with respect thereto, or claims arising out of transactions with the city, shall be presented to the council, or no action thereon can be maintained, and the presentation to the city of a claim for damages for the death of the son is not necessary to the maintenance of the action.

3. SAME.

The statute providing that claims against a municipality for damages arising from a defective street or sidewalk, or through the negligence of the municipality in respect to any street or sidewalk, shall be presented within a specified time after the happening of such injury or damage, etc., does not include damages for negligent death.

4. SAME—TORTS—EXERCISE OF GOVERNMENTAL POWERS.

A city maintaining a waterworks system supplying water to its inhabitants for domestic use at established rates, and furnishing water for fire protection and irrigation free of charge, does not do so in its governmental capacity, though so far as it furnishes water for fire protection it acts in its governmental capacity, and it is liable to the same extent as any private owner would be.*

5. SAME.

A city maintained a system of waterworks, supplying water to its inhabitants for domestic use at fixed rates, and furnishing water for fire protection and irrigation free of charge. It maintained a conduit which was not used in the distribution of water for pay, but it was a part of the system and necessary thereto. The water flowing through the conduit was used for irrigation. Held, that the city was liable for an accident occurring in the conduit to the same extent that a private owner would be.

6. NEGLIGENCE—USE OF PROPERTY—CARE AS TO PERSONS INVITED.

An owner owes the duty of reasonable care for the safety of a person coming on his premises by invitation, express or implied.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 37, Negligence, §§ 42-44.]

7. SAME—TRESPASSERS—PLACES ATTRACTIVE TO CHILDREN.

Though an owner need not as against an adult intruder or licensee maintain his premises in a reasonably safe condition, yet he must on placing something on his premises which is easily accessible, and which is alluring to children, exercise reasonable care for their safety.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 37, Negligence, § 55.]

8. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—NEGLIGENCE—QUESTION FOR JURY.

Whether a city failing to guard the entrance into a conduit maintained by it as a part of its waterworks system was negligent and liable for the death of a child passing into the conduit with other children to play, held, under the evidence, for the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 36, Municipal Corporations, § 1800.]

9. APPEAL—VERDICT—CONCLUSIVENESS.

The Supreme Court can neither disturb a verdict on conflicting evidence which would support a verdict either way, nor where there is doubt as to whether the jury should have found a particular act constituted negligence or otherwise.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, §§ 3935-3937.]

10. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — INJURY TO PERSON ON MUNICIPAL PROPERTY — CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

In an action by a mother for the negligent death of her minor child about eight years of age, while playing in an unguarded conduit maintained by a city as a part of its waterworks system, the question of the contributory negligence of the mother and the child held, under the evidence, for the jury.

Appeal from District Court, Third District; T. D. Lewis, Judge.

Action by Lettie A. Brown against Salt Lake City. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Ogden Hills and H. J. Dininney, for appellant. Dey & Hoppaugh and E. A. Walton, for respondent.

FRICK, J. The plaintiff brought this action to recover damages for the death of her son, a lad about eight years of age, alleged to have been caused through the negligence of the defendant in failing to guard the entrance into a certain waterway or conduit constructed and maintained by it. The pleadings require no special attention. The allegations of the complaint were sufficient to admit proof of all the facts hereinafter stated, and the answer set forth all the matters in defense referred to in this opinion. The evidence coming from both sides fairly tends to establish the following facts: The city, in September, 1904, and for many years prior thereto, owned and maintained a system of waterworks together with a source of water supply which came from the mountains lying to the north and east of the city. It furnished water to the inhabitants for domestic purposes through a system of pipe lines, and for the water so used it collected pay in accordance with established rates. It also, through the same pipes, furnished the inhabitants water for fire protection, for which no special charges were made. It also, by means of open ditches and laterals, distributed, without charge, certain water among the inhabitants for irrigation purposes. One source of water supply came through what is known as "City Creek," which enters the city from the north and flows in a southwesterly direction through the northwesterly part of the city, and finally empties into the Jordan river west of the corporate limits. City Creek, like all mountain streams, has considerable fall, and the water flows rather swiftly and with considerable force. Some distance north of the city dams are placed across the stream, and by means of gates and weirs the water is forced into pipe lines for distribution. In the low-water season all the water is forced into these pipes, and none flows down the creek below the intake of the pipes; but in the spring and early summer months there is more water in the creek than the pipes will carry, and, when such is the case, the surplus flows down the stream through the city as stated above. In case of heavy rains, or when the tanks are flushed, or if for any reason water is not wanted in the pipes, it is likewise permitted to flow down the creek. This flow of water through the creek in its natural state has a tendency to erode or wash away the banks of the stream, and, to prevent this, the city, in 1891 or 1892, constructed a conduit or underground waterway of solid masonry 5½ feet in diameter on the inside, and cylindrical in form. The entrance to this conduit was immediately east of the east margin of State street. From there the conduit passed under ground to the corner of State and North Temple streets, thence west along and under that street to the west margin of Main, or West Temple, street, at which point it terminated. The water thence flowed in an open stream to the Jordan river. The entire length of the conduit was 915 feet. At a point 628 feet from the entrance the Jordan Canal, which was also underground, emptied its water into the conduit. The conduit, by reason of its sharp turns, was quite dark on the inside. There was one place about 225 feet from the entrance where, by means of a covered manhole, a little natural light came through into the conduit. Below this point the remainder of the distance was dark, except when the gates were up at the west end. These gates, however, were usually down; for the reason that the water at that point, by means of them, was diverted into irrigating ditches to the north and south. It may be stated, therefore, that the conduit represented a practically dark cavern or tunnel for a distance of about 400 feet below the manhole referred to, and to the point where the Jordan Canal entered it. Along the east margin of State street the city had constructed a tight board fence, and this fence was continued on the north bank of the stream, and also on the south bank, for some little distance up the stream, and beyond the entrance to the conduit. There were two passage ways leading from the street, one on the north of the entrance, the other to the south. Immediately across the street from the entrance, and a little north of west, a large school building was erected, at which a large number of children attended during the school year. This school was opened to the public early in September, 1904. About five years before the latter date the city placed strong bars of iron vertically across the entrance, which were fastened at the top by means of clamps to another bar of iron placed horizontally across the top of the entrance. The lower ends of the vertical bars were driven into the bed of the stream. The spaces between the bars were $5\frac{1}{2}$ inches at the top and 8 inches at the bottom. One of these bars in some way became loose at the top and was shifted against another so that the space between the two bars was such that boys, or even adults, could pass into the conduit. For a number of years the boys in the neighborhood, which was somewhat thickly settled, in playing around the entrance of the conduit in the bed of the stream during the dry or waterless season, would enter the conduit and play "jail" or "train" therein. Some time during the year 1903 different delegations of citizens living near the entrance of the conduit went before the city council and complained of the condition of the entrance, and called the council's attention to the danger to which the boys were exposed. An employé of the city, who for some years had charge of the entrance of the conduit, testified that he saw some boys in the conduit, drove them out, and replaced and fastened the bar. On numerous times thereafter he saw the boys about the entrance, found the bar again misplaced, and replaced it, but did not fasten it, nor have it fastened. There is no evidence, however, that Marcus Brown, the deceased, or any of the boys who testified at the trial, was ever driven from the conduit or warned by an employé of the city, or any one in its behalf, to keep out of it. During the early part of September, 1904, after the fall term of the school had opened, Marcus Brown, the son of the plaintiff, without her knowledge or consent, entered and played in the conduit with quite a number of other boys. On the evening of the 21st day of that month he was last seen in the conduit about 6 or half past 6 o'clock. He could not be found that night, but the next morning his body was found at the west gate of the conduit. The water from the Jordan Canal entered the conduit in large volume, and with considerable force, and, while it could not be seen in the conduit, it, on account of the loud noise from rushing into the conduit, could be heard for some little distance before reaching it. The inference is that Marcus Brown either went into the water, or in some way fell into it and met death. Marcus was a bright boy, and above the average in intelligence and physical development for boys of his age. It developed at the trial that the boys had a lantern which they used in playing in the conduit, and by means of the light obtained from it they would go down to where the water rushed in from the Jordan Canal; that they had been doing this for a period of about three years; and that the bar was in its displaced condition for about a year before the accident occurred. The plaintiff had moved into the neighborhood about four months before the accident, and did not know anything about the conduit. During the spring or high water season the conduit required the constant attention of one man to remove the floating débris in the stream, which, if not removed, would cause the entrance to be clogged, and the water to back up in the stream. During the dry season it required no special guarding nor attention. We have stated the foregoing facts in detail, so that all questions raised by counsel, and discussed in the opinion, may be better understood. Upon substantially the foregoing facts the court submitted the case to a jury. A verdict was returned in favor of plaintiff. From the judgment entered upon the verdict, this appeal is taken.

The defendant requested the court to direct a verdict in its favor, which the court refused to do. While numerous errors are assigned, all that are important may be considered upon the alleged error based upon the refusal of the court to direct a verdict. The reasons argued by counsel why a verdict should have been directed in this case may be stated as follows: (1) That the plaintiff at no time, nor in any manner presented a claim to the city council as required by the statutes of this state; (2) that the city conducted its system of waterworks, of which the conduit was a part, in a governmental capacity; (3) that if it be held that the city conducted its system of waterworks in its corporate capacity merely, then, under the undisputed facts, the city is not shown to have been guilty of any negligence to warrant a recovery as matter of law; (4) that if such negligence existed on the part of the city, then both the boy and his mother were guilty of contributory negligence as matter of law; and, further, that the boy was a trespasser, and as to such a person the city was not liable for mere passive negligence.

Referring to the first reason stated, the record discloses that the plaintiff neither alleged nor proved the presentation of a claim to the city council. Counsel for the city assert that she was required to allege and prove such presentation as a condition precedent to her right of recovery. The statute in force at the time of the accident, so far as material, provides as follows: "All claims against a city or town for damages or injury alleged to have arisen from the defective, unsafe, dangerous or obstructed condition of any street, alley, cross-walk, sidewalk, culvert or bridge of any city or town, or through the negligence of the city or town authorities in respect to any such street, alley, cross-walk, sidewalk, culvert or bridge shall within ninety days after the happening of such injury or damage be presented to the city council, * * * in writing, signed by the claimant or by some authorized person, properly verified, describing the time, place, cause and extent of the damage or injury; and no action shall be maintained against any city * * * for injury to person or property, unless it appears that the claim for which the action was brought was presented to the council as aforesaid, and that the council * * * did not, within ninety days thereafter, audit and allow the same. Every other claim against the city * * * must be presented to the city council * * * within one year after the last item of the account or claim accrued." (Italics ours.) The section following provides, in substance, that it should be a sufficient bar to any action against a city that any claim mentioned in the preceding section had not been presented to the city council in the manner and within the time specified. Under these provisions it is asserted that the claim upon which this action is based should have been presented to the city council, and as no allegation nor proof of such presentation was made there is no right of action. Is this contention sound? It has been frequently held that, under statutes similar to the foregoing, the presentation of claims falling within the provisions of such statutes is a condition precedent, and unless presented no recovery can be had. We have no disposition to modify the rule so announced, or depart from it. Does the claim in question here come within the provisions of the section above quoted? We think not. It will be observed the claims that require presentation are of two kinds: (1) Claims arising out of defective or obstructed streets, alleys, cross-walks, sidewalks, culverts or bridges, or for negligence of the city authorities with respect thereto; (2) claims consisting of various items of account or otherwise that may arise out of transactions with the city, and not arising in tort. This seems manifest from the language used with respect to the character of the claims that must be presented to the city council under the second class mentioned in the statute. It seems reasonably clear to us that, in view of the case of Dawes v. City of Great Falls, 31 Mont. 9, 77 Pac. 309, the claim in this case does not belong to the class last above noticed. Does it come within the first class? It is not a claim which arose out of any matters specially enumerated in the first class. Those are limited to defects in, or the obstructed condition of, streets, alleys, cross-walks, sidewalks, culverts or bridges. All these pertain to places and things which the city is bound by law to maintain in a reasonably safe condition, and the statute makes it liable for a neglect of duty with respect thereto. The claim in question does not come within this class. It is one which arose out of the defective condition of the city's property, which is owned and maintained in its corporate capacity merely, and over which it had dominion the same as any property owner. Moreover, the language of the statute does not cover such a claim. A claim included within the statute is one pertaining to a personal injury or damage to property, and must be presented "within ninety days after the happening of such injury or damage." In an action to recover damages for negligently causing the death of one a presentation of a claim is not required, for the right of action does not arise until the injury results in death. While the injury may be said to be the cause of death, the injury without death would not give a right of action such as we are now considering. If we should assume a case where the injury did not result in death until the ninety-first day after the injury, or thereafter, no claim could be presented at all, for the reason that the time runs from the date of injury, and not from the time the full consequences resulting therefrom are known. The words "or damage" relate to the damages that arise immediately out of the injury to the party or to his property, and not to such as may be sustained by a third person as a secondary result, although caused by the original injury. The statute must receive a reasonable construction, and such as will make it possible to present a claim. If, therefore, a claim may not arise until the time has elapsed in which it must be presented, the statute should not be held to apply, unless the language used therein permits of no other construction. We are firmly of the opinion that it was not the intention of the Legislature to include within the statute secondary claims or damages arising out of death, which are suffered by third parties by reason of such death. This view, we think, is amply sustained by the authorities. McKeigue v. Janesville, 68 Wis. 50, 31 N. W. 291; Pye v. Mankato, 38 Minn. 536, 38 N. W. 621; Moran v. City of St. Paul, 54 Minn. 279, 56 N. W. 80; Dawes v. City of Great Falls, 31 Mont. 9, 77 Pac. 309; Maylone v. City of St. Paul, 40 Minn. 406, 42 N. W. 88. The cases cited by counsel for the city to the contrary are all based upon statutes, the terms of which are much broader than our own. In many states all claims must be presented before action can be maintained; in other states, like Utah, claims need be presented only in specified instances. An examination of the authorities will disclose that, where specific matters are mentioned in a statute for which a claim must be presented as a condition precedent to a right of action, claims arising out of matters not so mentioned are excluded and require no presentation before an action may be maintained. The claim in the case at bar falls clearly within the latter class, and therefore the court did not err in refusing to direct the jury as requested upon this ground.

Recurring now to the second reason advanced by counsel for the city, namely, that the city owned and conducted its waterworks in a governmental capacity, and for that reason is not liable, we think, under the authorities, it is likewise untenable. It may be conceded, for the purposes of this discussion, that, in so far as the city provides apparatus and water for fire protection, it acts in a governmental capacity. The city, however, was not required to assume the duty of furnishing its inhabitants water for all uses and purposes. When it acquired property, and constructed the system of waterworks for that purpose, however, it did so voluntarily, and with a view of deriving revenue therefrom. It, therefore, acquired, owned, and conducted its water system and the property connected therewith, except as stated above, as any other private corporation or owner would, and is liable in like manner and to the same extent as such owners would be. Mr. Thompson, in his Commentaries on the Law of Negligence, vol. 5, § 5788, clearly shows that it is optional with a municipal corporation whether it will assume certain duties or exercise certain powers or not, and that it cannot be called to account in any way for not assuming or exercising them. After stating the law in this regard, the author proceeds to state the rule in case the duties are in fact assumed, and the power is exercised, as follows: "But if it [the city] undertakes to open, improve, or grade the highway, street, or sidewalk, dig the sewer or drain, build the bridge, construct the culvert, open the park, plant the shade trees, light the street or bridge, erect the public building, or waterworks, or wharf, or pier, or dock, and its officers and agents do the work negligently or unskillfully, or negligently suffer it to get out of repair, and in consequence of such negligence or unskillfulness and not in consequence of the mere fact that the work was done, damage accrues to a private person, he may maintain an action against the city therefor." The rule with regard to the liability of municipal corporations is stated in conformity with the foregoing quotation in 20 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law (2d Ed.) 1205. The distinction with respect to the liability of a municipal corporation to provide water and apparatus for fire protection and in the ownership and control of waterworks for general purposes is clearly pointed out by the Supreme Court of Minnesota in the case of Miller v. Minneapolis, 75 Minn. 132, 77 N. W. 788. The following well-considered cases clearly demonstrate that the waterworks system of the city and the property connected therewith are not owned, maintained, nor operated in a governmental capacity, and the text as quoted from Thompson, supra, is illustrated and applied therein: Lynch v. Springfield, 174 Mass. 430, 54 N. E. 871; Galveston v. Posnainsky, 62 Tex. 127, 50 Am. Rep. 517; Wilkins v. Rutland, 61 Vt. 336, 17 Atl. 735; Lloyd v. Mayor, 5 N. Y. 374, 55 Am. Dec. 347; City of Pekin v. McMahon, 154 Ill. 141, 39 N. E. 484, 27 L. R. A. 206, 45 Am. St. Rep. 114; Brigel v. Philadelphia, 135 Pa. 451, 19 Atl. 1038, 20 Am. St. Rep. 885; Wagner v. Rock Island, 146 Ill. 139, 34 N. E. 545, 21 L. R. A. 519; Ogden City v. Waterworks & Irrigation Co., 28 Utah, 25, 76 Pac. 1069. Nor does it make any difference that the conduit in which the accident occurred was not a part of the waterworks system which was used in the distribution of water to the inhabitants for pay. It was still a part of the system, and a necessary part thereof. That the water flowing through the conduit was used for irrigation without charge to the user makes no difference. When the city assumed the right of conducting the water and of distributing it, it was required to exercise the same degree of care with respect to the maintenance and use of property devoted to that purpose as any private owner would have been. City v. Babbitt, 8 Tex. Civ. App. 432, 28 S. W. 702; 2 Dillon on Mun. Corps. (4th Ed.) § 980. We are of the opinion that the court committed no error in refusing to direct a verdict for the city upon this ground.

The third ground upon which the city based its request for a directed verdict in its favor is one that is not entirely free from difficulty with respect to the law, nor is it free from doubt with regard to the sufficiency of the facts to sustain the verdict. The trial court submitted the case to the jury upon the doctrine announced in what are termed the "turntable" cases. Railroad Co. v. Stout, 17 Wall. (U. S.) 657, 21 L. Ed. 745, Keffe v. Milwaukee, St. P. Ry., 21 Minn. 207, 18 Am. Rep. 393, and Barrett v. So. Pac. Co., 91 Cal. 296, 27 Pac. 666, 25 Am. St. Rep. 186, may be classed as some of the leading cases upon that subject, and as presenting a fair illustration of the principles upon which the doctrine of the turntable cases rests. Since the first of the foregoing cases was decided, a large number of states have followed the doctrine therein announced, and it has become so generally known and recognized by both bench and bar that it is not deemed necessary to cite or refer to the numerous cases wherein the doctrine is illustrated and discussed. In some states, however, namely, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, New York, and, perhaps, a few others, the doctrine has not been adopted by the courts. In some states where the doctrine prevails the courts have sought to limit its application to open and dangerous machinery and appliances. Of this class Sullivan v. Huidekoper, 27 App. D. C. 154, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 263, Overholt v. Velthea, 93 Mo. 422, 6 S. W. 74, 3 Am. St. Rep. 557, Richards v. Connell, 45 Neb. 467, 63 N. W. 915, and Stendal v. Boyd, 73 Minn. 53, 75 N. W. 735, 42 L. R. A. 288, 72 Am. St. Rep. 597, are fair examples. The more recent adjudications, however, seem to apply the doctrine of the turntable cases to artificial structures and things other than machinery, when such structures and things are in themselves dangerous and are alluring or attractive to children of immature judgment and discretion. This class is well illustrated by the following, among other, cases: City of Pekin v. McMahon, 154 Ill. 141, 39 N. E. 484, 27 L. R. A. 206, 45 Am. St. Rep. 114; Brinkley Car Works & Mfg. Co. v. Cooper, 60 Ark. 545, 31 S. W. 154, 46 Am. St. Rep. 216. A large number of cases of each class might be cited in which the various grounds upon which the courts rest their decisions are stated, but the foregoing cases are deemed sufficient as illustrative of each class. In this connection, however, we desire to present a quotation from the opinion of Chief Justice Beatty, found in the case of Peters v. Bowman, 115 Cal. at page 356, 47 Pac. at page 599, 58 Am. St. Rep. 106, which briefly and clearly states the grounds upon which the cases last above referred to are based. He says: "The owner of a thing dangerous and attractive to children is not always and universally liable for an injury to a child tempted by the attraction. His liability bears a relation to the character of the thing, whether natural and common, or artificial and uncommon, to the comparative ease or difficulty of preventing the danger without destroying or impairing the usefulness of the thing, and, in short, to the reasonableness and propriety of his own conduct, in view of all surrounding circumstances and conditions. As to common dangers existing in the order of nature, it is the duty of parents to guard and warn their children, and, failing to do so, they should not expect to hold others responsible for their own want of care. But, with respect to dangers specially created by the act of the owner, novel in character, attractive and dangerous to children, easily guarded and rendered safe, the rule is, as it ought to be, different."

If the doctrine of the turntable cases is to be adopted in this jurisdiction—and we think it should be—it seems to us that it should be applied in accordance with the principles laid down by Chief Justice Beatty. We are not unmindful of, nor do we underestimate, the difficulty that may arise in the application of the doctrine to all kinds of cases and under all circumstances. Neither are we willing to relax the general rule of law which permits owners of property to use it in accordance with their own judgment and to place upon the surface, or otherwise, structures, machinery, and appliances in such manner and to such extent as to them may seem proper and necessary, or convenient in the conduct of their own affairs. So long as such use, whatever it may be, does not interfere with nor injure another's property, or in some way interfere with his personal or property rights, the law does not, and cannot, interfere. As against mere intruders or licensees, the owner need not maintain his premises in a reasonably safe condition; but as to those who come upon them by invitation, express or implied, he owes the duty of reasonable care for their safety. That is the general rule, and to depart from it in favor of adult persons would cast a burden upon the ownership and dominion of private property which would be intolerable. But is this right of dominion and use really invaded when an exception is made in favor of children of immature judgment and discretion? We have already pointed out that, as to adults or children who may come upon another's premises either by express or implied invitation, the law imposes the duty upon the owner to exercise reasonable care for their safety. If, therefore, the owner places something upon his premises which is easily accessible to children, and which is alluring and attractive to their childish propensities, and excites their curiosity and desire for play, it, in effect, amounts to an implied invitation to them to come upon the premises. If in connection with the attractiveness the thing is inherently dangerous to a child of immature judgment, it may well be that the owner of premises may, under particular circumstances, be held liable for his neglect of duty to the child going thereon by reason of such allurement. It is true that a child has no greater legal right to intrude upon another's premises than has an adult; but duties may, and, under particular conditions, do, arise, even in favor of adults who are exposed to danger at places where they have no legal right to be. While a child may know that it ought not to go on another's land, it cannot resist the childish instincts that lead it to inspect and play with what is attractive. It is wholly unmindful of the danger, and has little, if any, real appreciation of the consequences that may come from its acts. These propensities and instincts are known to all, and hence must be guarded against by all. It is no answer to say to a child: "This property is mine. I can do with it as I please so long as I do not interfere with another's personal or property rights. You are a mere intruder. I have not infringed upon your rights. Therefore you have no claim upon me." The question in such a case is, has the owner made his property so attractive as to allure children? Did he leave the attractive thing so that it was easily accessible to them? And did it expose them to uncommon and peculiar dangers? These, as a general rule, are questions of fact for a jury to pass on. We are aware that there are some courts that severely criticize the doctrine when applied in this class of cases.

It is urged that the rights of property cannot be burdened or curtailed in this way. Moreover, it is said by some courts that to follow the doctrine to its logical conclusion leads to absurdity; that if it is applied to one instrumentality, it should be applied to all; and that this would lead to holding owners of property liable, if a child were attracted by a wheelbarrow, a plow, a fruit tree, and many other common implements and objects. But this does not follow. All of these things are common. Neither are they specially attractive nor dangerous. That some may attract and be of some danger it is true. But it is not an uncommon danger, and not such as must be guarded against. As to all such and like things no court would permit a recovery as matter of law. This is well illustrated in the case of Harris v. Cowles, 38 Wash. 331, 90 Pac. 537, 107 Am. St. Rep.

847, where the Supreme Court of Washington refused to permit a child to recover for an injury received by it while playing with a revolving door. But it is otherwise with respect to unusual dangers and specially attractive things such as are artificial and uncommon—such as are pointed out by Chief Justice Beatty in the case quoted from. Indeed that case is a practical illustration of the extent of the rule. A recovery was denied in that case upon the ground that, while the pond or pool of water in question was artificially produced, and while it was alluring and attractive, it was no more so than a natural pond would have been, and because it was not practical to guard against bodies or streams of water. It is, however, pointed out that, if the thing is artificial, uncommon, attractive, and dangerous, and may, with reasonable effort and expense, be guarded and made reasonably safe, then the duty to make it so may not be disregarded, and the jury, under all the facts and circumstances of a particular case, may so find. It seems to us that these principles underlie the doctrine of the turntable cases, and if that doctrine is sound—and we think it is—it should not be limited to turntables and machinery of like character. To so limit it, in effect, applies one standard of care to one kind of dangerous things, and a different standard to another equally attractive and equally dangerous, which is placed upon premises and there maintained under similar circumstances and conditions. We are unwilling to either promulgate or adopt such a rule. We are constrained to hold, therefore, that the doctrine of the turntable cases should be applied to all things that are uncommon and are artificially produced, and which are attractive and alluring to children of immature judgment and discretion, and are inherently dangerous, and where it is practical to guard them without serious inconvenience and without great expense to the owner. Applying this doctrine to the facts of this case, is the city liable?

The trial court (whose instructions are generally well considered), in an exceptionally full and explicit charge, directed the jury's attention to the particular matters that they were required to find in order to return a verdict for the plaintiff. Among other things the court specially emphasized that before they could find for the plaintiff they must find from the evidence that the inside of the conduit was attractive and dangerous; that the danger relied on by the plaintiff arose out of the flow of water into the conduit from the Jordan Canal some 628 feet distant from the entrance of the conduit; and that the officers and agents of the city, in the exercise of reasonable care and prudence, should have foreseen that the inflow of such water was dangerous, and that some such injury might be occasioned to the boys, or some of them, entering into the conduit and playing therein. The jury, with all the facts and circumstances before them, found all these in favor of the plaintiff. We have no hesitancy in saying that, if the facts were for us to pass upon, we should be forced to arrive at a conclusion different from that reached by the jury; for it would be quite difficult for us to see how the officers of the city, as reasonably prudent men, should have foreseen that boys would go down a dark passage way of over 600 feet in length, nearly 400 feet of which was totally dark, and play therein, and that, although they did so, they would go or fall into the water coming into the conduit from the Jordan Canal. And if childish instincts induced them to resort to the conduit to play "jail" or otherwise, one would naturally assume that they would instinctively avoid going into the dark passage way to the length of nearly two ordinary city blocks. In the statement herein made that, were we permitted to pass on the facts and determine the question, not as matter of law but of fact, we would arrive at a conclusion different from that found by the jury, the Chief Justice authorizes us to say that he is not prepared to say that, if he were a trier of the fact, he would find in favor of the defendant on the question of negligence (upon this question he expresses no opinion); but that he is, however, clearly of the opinion that the facts amply justified the court in submitting the question of negligence to the jury. In this connection it must, however, be said that the entering into and playing in the conduit by the boys continued for quite a number of years; that the employees of the city knew the boys were doing so; that the city council, about a year before the accident, was advised, by delegations of citizens living in the neighborhood, of the actual conditions; and that the defendant knew, or ought to have known, that the boys, in view of their familiarity with the conduit, might lose their native fear and might finally go and continue to go to the point of danger, as the testimony disclosed they did. Notwithstanding all this, in view of all the facts and circumstances, as triers of the facts, the majority of this court would still be impelled to hold that the accident could not reasonably have been anticipated by ordinarily careful and prudent men. But is the question so clear and free from doubt that reasonable men cannot differ upon it? May not reasonable men, in considering all the facts and circumstances, arrive at different conclusions? The mere fact that the men who passed upon the facts have found against the city upon this point is not conclusive. But such a finding always requires a close scrutiny of the record to ascertain whether or not there may not be some inferences arising out of the particular facts upon which reasonable men may draw different conclusions. While the mere finding is not conclusive that there is evidence in support thereof, nor conclusive that all reasonable men should agree with it or dissent therefrom, it presents a question that merits a most careful consideration; and after giving it such consideration, and after much reflection, we have been forced to the conclusion that we cannot say as a matter of law that there is no evidence which reasonably tends to support the verdict. We cannot say that all reasonable men ought to have declared a result different from that reached by the jury. To authorize this requires a clear case, and not one where there is a serious doubt. The jury in some cases may misjudge the facts. Courts might do likewise. Members of the court may arrive at different conclusions even upon undisputed facts. While we are satisfied that the facts present what may be termed a "border-line case," and upon them a majority of this court should find for the city, yet we are equally well satisfied that the facts and circumstances, together with all the inferences that may be deduced therefrom, do not leave it so clear that we have a right to say, as matter of law, that the findings of the jury are wholly unsupported. In this regard we are also required to give some weight to the judgment of the trial court in sustaining the verdict by overruling the motion for a new trial. If we should interfere with the verdicts in all doubtful cases simply because upon the evidence we would have arrived at an opposite conclusion, then the proposition would be reduced to this: In any doubtful case, if we agreed with the findings of the jury, we would approve the verdict, but if we did not, we would set it aside. If we have no authority to do this in cases where there is a strong conflict in the evidence, which would support a verdict either way, what greater right have we to do so in a case where there is doubt as to whether the jury should have found a particular act or omission to act, or particular conduct, to have constituted negligence, or otherwise? We, therefore, cannot disturb the verdict upon this ground.

The last question presented, namely, that of contributory negligence upon the part of the mother and the deceased, was peculiarly a question of fact for the jury. The instructions upon this question were full and clear, and in accordance with the law upon the subject.

The question that the boy was a trespasser, and therefore no recovery can be had, was involved in the third proposition discussed, and needs no further consideration.

There are other questions presented, but no error as to any of them is perceived; nor are they of such character or importance as to require discussion.

In view of what we have said, it follows that the judgment should be, and it accordingly is, affirmed, with costs to plaintiff.

SHEETS v. HENDERSON.

(Supreme Court of Kansas. Jan. 11, 1908.)

1. NEW TRIAL—SUBMISSION OF CAUSE.

Where a case is submitted to the court on an agreed statement of facts alone, there can be no new trial; the decision involving only a question of law.

2. APPEAL—CASE-MADE—TIME FOR MAKING AND SERVING.

The filing of a motion for a new trial, when no new trial is necessary, does not extend the time for making and serving a case-made for appeal.

Error from District Court, Atchison County; B. F. Hudson, Judge.

Action by Elizabeth L. V. Sheets, executrix, against C. B. Henderson. There was a judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Dismissed.

Sheffield Ingalls, for plaintiff in error.
Jackson & Jackson, for defendant in error.

PER CURIAM. The case was submitted to the court, a jury having been waived, upon an agreed statement of facts, on the 2d day of June, 1906, and no other evidence was produced or offered. On the 16th day of the same month, the court having taken the case under advisement, judgment was rendered in favor of the defendant and against the plaintiff for costs. No order extending the time for making and serving a case-made for appeal was asked for or was entered by the court. A motion for a new trial, however, was filed within the time prescribed by statute, and this motion was heard and overruled November 14, 1906. A case-made was served within 10 days thereafter, and was settled and signed December 4, 1906. Held that, as there was no issue of fact tried, there could be no new trial of such an issue (Darling v. A. T. & S. F. Ry. Co. [decided November, 1907] 94 Pac. 202); also that, as the decision involved only the determination of a question of law, no new trial was necessary, and the filing of such motion did not extend the time for making and serving a case-made (Wagner v. Railway Co., 73 Kan. 283, 85 Pac. 299). It follows that the judgment became final, and the court lost jurisdiction to settle and sign a case-made, on the expiration of 10 days after the rendition of the judgment.

The proceeding in error is dismissed.

HALLOWAY v. ARKANSAS CITY MILLING CO.

(Supreme Court of Kansas. Jan. 11, 1908.)

1. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT—UNAUTHORIZED ACT—RATIFICATION.

If an agent to sell goods report to his principal that he has made a sale for a price less than he is authorized to take, it is the duty of the principal to examine the report, and disaffirm the sale within a reasonable time or he will be held to have ratified it.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 40, Principal and Agent, §§ 638-643.]

2. SAME.

The question of what is a reasonable time is one of fact and depends upon circumstances. In this case a delay of five months was unreasonable.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 40, Principal and Agent, §§ 638-643.]

3. SAME—LIABILITY OF AGENT.

If a sale by an agent at a price below that which the principal has authorized be ratified, the agent is not liable to the principal for the difference between the authorized price and that at which the sale was made.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from District Court, Cowley County; C. L. Swarts, Judge.

Action by H. M. Holloway against the Arkansas City Milling Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

H. S. Rogers, for plaintiff in error. J. Mack Love and C. M. Wright, for defendant in error.

BURCH, J. The defendant, who resides at Arkansas City, gratuitously undertook to dispose of a car load of flour for the plaintiff, who resides at Larned, agreeing to confer with the plaintiff before closing a deal. The flour was in the possession of the United States Indian Agent at San Carlos, Ariz. An offer of $2.50 per hundredweight was made for the flour by Brookner & Duncan of San Carlos. The defendant replied they could have the flour at $2.75 per hundredweight, and requested an answer by telegraph. A copy of the letter to Brookner & Duncan was sent to the plaintiff. Brookner & Duncan telegraphed the defendant they could not use the flour, and the plaintiff was so advised. Some days later the plaintiff wrote the defendant as follows: "In regard to the San Carlos car will say while I think it an outrage to sell the flour at the price offered—$2.50—it may be best to do so rather than try to move it. I wish you would proceed to place it and get the matter settled up." On February 23, 1904, the defendant wrote Brookner & Duncan as follows: "We received your telegram the other day, saying you could not use the car of flour at $2.75 per bbl. Would say that we are handling this flour for the Keystone Mills at Larned, Kans., who made the shipment, and have no interest in it at present, except to try to see that they get a fair price for the flour. The price you offered us of $2.50 would net the mill just about $1.00 per cwt. for the flour, which was not the cost of the wheat when the flour was made, since which time wheat has advanced about 20 c. per bushel, which is equivalent to at least $1.00 per barrel on flour, and we trust you can see your way clear to handle this flour at $2.75 per barrel, which is very much less than the flour could be made for at this time. Please wire us at our expense if you can use it at $2.75." On February 29th Brookner & Duncan wired the defendant as follows: "Accept flour at two seventy-five per barrel. Regular terms." On the same day the defendant wrote to Brookner & Duncan as follows: "We have your telegram of to-day, accepting the rejected flour at San Carlos at $2.75 per barrel, and we have wired the Indian agent to deliver same to you." On the same day the defendant wired the Indian agent to deliver the flour to Brookner & Duncan, and mailed a copy of Brookner & Duncan's telegram and a copy of the letter to Brookner & Duncan, which elicited the telegram, to the plaintiff. In due course of mail these copies should have been, and it is not disputed were, received by plaintiff on March 1st or March 2d. On March 5th the Indian agent wrote to the defendant as follows: "According to request contained in your telegram dated February 29, 1904, I delivered to Brookner & Duncan 29,446 lbs. of rejected flour." On March 14, 1904, the plaintiff instructed the defendant to collect from purchasers of rejected flour including the Indian Department, C. F. Weldemeyer, and Brookner & Duncan, which they did. About the middle of August, 1904, on a settlement of accounts between the parties, the mistake in selling at a price per barrel instead of at a price per hundredweight was discovered. The plaintiff sued to recover for the difference, and judgment was rendered against him upon substantially the foregoing facts. It is claimed here that the judgment is erroneous.

That the act of the agent was negligent and wholly unauthorized cannot be questioned, but this fact does not establish liability. The agent was acting for its principal, and immediately notified the principal of its conduct. The principal then had the option of affirming or of repudiating the unauthorized act, and was called upon to do one or the other. Prompt action by the plaintiff might have averted loss. It is not certain but that delivery of the flour might have been prevented. The right to rescind was clear, since the letter to Brookner & Duncan containing the offer at a price per barrel disclosed upon its face that a mistake had been made, besides affording some notice that the defendant was not a general agent. It is said the plaintiff did not discover the mistake until months had passed. The agent, however, made a prompt statement of its conduct for the information of its principal, and it was the duty of the principal to examine the report, and determine whether or not he was satisfied, and would be bound. The law allows a reasonable time for this purpose, but in commercial transactions of this character a brief time is a reasonable time in the absence of special circumstances extending it. The letter reporting the sale to Brookner & Duncan was indubitably read as early as March 14th, and the plaintiff cannot be heard to say that, having examined his agent's report, he did not observe its contents. He had knowledge of the unauthorized sale shortly after it was made. With such knowledge he made no attempt to disavow it, remained silent for some five months, and, according to the record, still has the proceeds in his possession. This being true, he ratified the transaction, and cannot now repudiate it. The principles involved are all fundamental in the law of agency.

The judgment of the district court is affirmed.

SALINA IMPLEMENT & SEED CO. v. HALEY.

(Supreme Court of Kansas. Jan. 11, 1908.)

1. SALE—BREACH OF WARRANTY—RETURN TO SELLER.

What is a reasonable time within which a purchaser should return a machine, sold to him on condition that he can return it if it does not meet the warranty and work satisfactorily, is ordinarily a question for the jury, where there is conflicting testimony on the proposition.

2. SAME—RETURN IN REASONABLE TIME.

While such purchaser, in order to rescind, is required to return the machine with reasonable promptness, after giving it a fair test and learning of its defects, the seller is not in a position to insist that there was unreasonable delay where the purchaser was induced to keep the machine for a time by assurances of the seller that he would put it in working order, and by his attempts to do so if the machine is promptly returned after the last ineffectual attempt of the seller to make it work satisfactorily.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from District Court, Ottawa County; R. R. Rees, Judge.

Action by the Salina Implement & Seed Company against W. E. Haley. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

H. O. Tobey, for plaintiff in error. J. L. King, for defendant in error.

JOHNSTON, C. J. On August 26, 1905, the Salina Implement & Seed Company, through its agent S. A. Dixon, sold a corn harvester to W. E. Haley, the price being $125 if paid in cash and $130 if notes promising payment in the future were given. Haley took the machine to his farm and undertook to operate it, and after using it more or less until September 4, 1905, he decided that it did not serve the purpose for which it was purchased, nor come up to the conditions of the warranty under which it was sold. The company, claiming that there was an unconditional sale, brought this action to recover the price of the machine, contending, also, that Haley kept the machine an unreasonable time—much longer than was necessary for a test of its working qualities—and also that when Haley complained of the machine Dixon demanded that if he was not satisfied he should return the machine, but that he had then refused to do so or to rescind the contract, and by continuing thereafter to use the machine he waived any right he might have had to rescind the sale. There was proof, and plenty of it, tending to show that the sale was made under a warranty that it would do good work, and that Haley should take and test the machine by use until he was satisfied that it met the requirements of the warranty, and if it did not work to his satisfaction he could return it to the plaintiff. There was a conflict in the testimony as to the warranty, and also as to whether Dixon had requested Haley to return the machine if he was not satisfied with it, but the findings of the jury were that the machine was warranted to do good work but did not; that Haley was to run the machine until he was satisfied that it would work well before accepting it; and that if it did not work to his satisfaction he had the privilege of returning it to the company.

It is contended that the testimony of disinterested witnesses, and that which is most credible, shows that the sale was made without a warranty. The jury has decided what testimony is most worthy of credit, and its findings, based as they are on legal evidence, puts that question at rest. The principal contention is that the test of the machine was not honestly made, and that Haley kept and used it too long after discovering that it was unsatisfactory to justify a rescission of the contract and the return of the machine. It was the duty of Haley to give the machine a fair test, availing himself of such suggestions and assistance as the seller could render, and if it proved defective and unsatisfactory he was then entitled to rescind the contract and return the machine, providing it was done within a reasonable time. In speaking of the return of the machine in case it was found that the sale was made upon an agreement that if the machine did not prove satisfactory to Haley it might be returned, the court properly charged the jury that: "If in his honest judgment it did not so operate he would have a right to return the machine and cancel the contract, but, under such circumstances, it would be his duty to return the machine with reasonable promptness, after having used the machine for such a reasonable time as would be required to give the machine a fair test, and, if he failed to return the machine within a reasonable time after having discovered the defects, he will be deemed to have waived them, unless his delay in returning the machine and rescinding the contract was occasioned by the promises of the plaintiff to fix the machine so that it would work. In a transaction of this kind both parties are required to act in good faith, and neither can be permitted to take advantage of his own wrong."

What is a reasonable time within which to return property so sold, and accomplish a rescission, is a question of fact for the jury where there is supporting testimony. Cookingham v. Dusa, 41 Kan. 229, 21 Pac. 95.

Here, as we have seen, the trial of the machine was begun on Saturday, August 26th, and upon the following Tuesday Haley notified the agent that it did not work properly. On Wednesday Dixon sent his man to Haley's farm to adjust the machine, and, not succeeding, it was brought in to Dixon's store for repairs. Afterwards, Haley took it out and worked with it most of the time until Saturday, but as it would not bind satisfactorily he brought it back to Dixon for other repairs and adjustment. Dixon put on a new chain tightener, which it was hoped would remedy the defect. It would not work well, however, and on Monday, September 4th, Haley and Dixon took the machine to a blacksmith, who put on a new knotter for them. Again Haley tried the machine for a short time, but finding that the defects had not been overcome he abandoned any further tests, and turned the machine back to Dixon. Under the testimony it was a fair question for the jury whether the test was made in good faith, and whether under the circumstances the machine was returned within a reasonable time. It is true that Haley used the machine from time to time for more than a week, and actually cut considerable corn, but at no time did the machine properly bind the corn. At first Haley appears to have thought that the failure was due to the new paint and that after the machine was operated for a time it would do better work. Dixon appears to have proceeded on the theory that the defects could be remedied, as he made repeated efforts to repair the machine, which continued until it was finally returned to him. The plaintiff is hardly in a position to insist that the test was unreasonably long when it and its agent were assisting Haley in making the test until the last day, and holding out assurances that they could remedy the defects. It is fairly inferable that the delay in returning the machine was induced, in great part by the assurances of Dixon that the machine could be made to work satisfactorily, and his continued efforts to adjust it. Since the machine was returned promptly after the last ineffectual attempt of plaintiff to adjust the machine and put it in working order, the plaintiff has no right to insist that the delay was unreasonable. There is nothing substantial in the objections to the rulings on the admission of evidence or to the instructions given by the court.

The judgment will be affirmed.

BELKNAP HARDWARE CO. v. SLEETH et al.

(Supreme Court of Kansas. Jan. 11, 1908.)

1. WRIT OF ERROR—FINDINGS—REVIEW.

This court may re-examine the findings of the district court based entirely upon written and documentary evidence, when the case is presented here in practically the same aspect as in the trial court.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, § 3903.]

2. EVIDENCE—PRESUMPTIONS—REFUSAL TO TESTIFY.

Where the deposition of a nonresident party is taken at the instance of the adverse party, the refusal of such witness to testify to material matters appearing to be within his knowledge, where no sufficient reason is given for such refusal, is the denial of a substantial right, and warrants the inference that the matter or information so withheld, would, if divulged, have been unfavorable to such witness, and of benefit to the party seeking it.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 20, Evidence, § 96.]

3. SAME.

Usually, fraud, if it exists, is disclosed by the condition of the parties, the details of the transaction, and the surrounding circumstances, and the presumption arising from the refusal of a party when examined as a witness, to give the material details of a transaction under investigation, within his knowledge, should be added to the facts and circumstances proven, in determining the good faith of such transaction.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from District Court, Greenwood County; G. I. Altkman, Judge.

Action by the Belknap Hardware Company against Henry E. Sleeth and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

This was an action in the nature of ejectment by the Belknap Hardware Manufacturing Company, to recover 320 acres of land, from Henry E. Sleeth and Jessie Sleeth, his wife, who claim to be the owners, and W. L. Jost and wife, tenants upon the land. The following undisputed facts appeared upon the trial: Ross Burget of Brookston, Ind., was engaged in the hardware business at that place until December 19, 1901, when he traded his stock for the land in question. The consideration named in the deed was $6,400. Of this he paid $1,000 in money, the remaining $5,400 was the amount of the goods. At the time of this exchange he was indebted to various wholesale houses for goods purchased, among others to the plaintiff company of Louisville, Ky. On September 1, 1902, he made a mortgage upon the land to Henderson Burget, his father, purporting to secure an indebtedness of $8,000. The plaintiff sued Ross Burget in a circuit court in Indiana, and on May 1, 1903, recovered a judgment for $472.30 and costs, upon its claim for goods so furnished. On May 22, 1903, the plaintiff sued Burget upon this judgment in the district court of Greenwood county, attached this land, and caused constructive service to be made upon Burget; the first publication was June 11, 1903. Judgment was rendered in that action September 3, 1903, finding $479.30 due to the plaintiff, and ordering the land so attached to be sold to satisfy that amount and the costs. Such further proceedings were had in that action that the lands were sold, the sale confirmed, a certificate issued, and on May 22, 1905, a sheriff's deed was executed to the plaintiff, conveying the land, and thereupon this action was commenced.

ed. Sleeth and wife claim to have purchased this land, and it was conveyed to them by a deed bearing date March 28, 1903, expressing a consideration of $9,600—recorded in Greenwood county June 4, 1903. Ross Burget inspected this land about the time he purchased it, and rented it to Jost, and the latter remained in possession as tenant until January 1, 1904. Neither of the Sleeths ever saw the land. The rents were paid by Jost to Ross Burget, as the alleged agent of the Sleeths, and by such agent paid over to Henderson Burget, and credited on the mortgage. Jost had not accounted for the rents except to Ross Burget. On November 25, 1904, Ross Burget was adjudged a bankrupt in the proper court in Indiana, and was discharged from his debts as a bankrupt, May 18, 1906. The plaintiff company claims that the conveyance to the Sleeths was fraudulent and void, while they claim that it was a valid transfer. The action was tried without a jury, and judgment was rendered for the defendants. The plaintiff brings the case here for review.

Howard J. Hodgson, for plaintiff in error.
D. B. Fuller, for defendants in error.

BENSON, J. (after stating the facts as above). The only question in this case is whether the conveyance from Ross Burget to Henry E. Sleeth and wife was made in good faith, or whether it was fraudulent as to creditors. The evidence bearing upon this issue was written, consisting of depositions and documents; only one witness testified orally, and his testimony related solely to the value of the land. The case is presented here in about the same attitude as in the district court. While the findings of the trial court in such a situation are entitled to careful consideration, and in doubtful cases will turn the scale in favor of affirmance, still where all the material testimony is in writing, and the case is presented here in practically the same aspect as in the trial court, such findings are not absolutely controlling, and will not be sustained if clearly overborne by the weight of the evidence. Robinson v. Melvin, 14 Kan. 484; Durham v. Carbon Coal & Min. Co., 22 Kan. 232; Bank v. McIntosh, 72 Kan. 603, 84 Pac. 535. The depositions consisted of the testimony of the defendant, Henry E. Sleeth, Ross Burget, his grantor, and, as Sleeth testified, his agent, and Henderson Burget the father of Ross Burget. The testimony of the last-named witness was however quite unimportant upon the issue tried. Thus it appears that the case was practically submitted on the depositions of the defendant and his agent. The admissions of a party are, as stated by Justice Brewer in Durham v. Carbon Coal & Min. Co., supra, good against him.

In addition to the facts above stated the evidence disclosed that Ross Burget rented this land to Mr. Jost, who occupied it under such contract from March 1, 1902, until the spring of 1905, and all rents were paid to Burget during that time after allowing credits for expenses and improvements. The Sleeths had no communications or dealings with the tenant whatever. Burget visited this land in February, 1903, and in March, 1903, made the deed to the Sleeths in Indiana, where they all resided. Henry E. Sleeth was a farm hand, working for Henderson Burget part of the time. He had no property except an unimproved town lot. He never saw the land and made no inquiries about it except of Ross Burget and Henderson Burget. He testified that he verbally appointed Ross Burget his agent to collect the rents, and that the rents were turned over to Henderson Burget to apply on the mortgage upon the land. He was not able to give a statement of rents so received and applied on the mortgage. The deed to Sleeth bears date March 20, 1903, and the depositions show that it was delivered April 15, 1903. The consideration expressed is $9,600. Sleeth testified that he paid $2,600 in cash some time in 1903, and assumed a mortgage of $7,000 to Henderson Burget, and that this money was from the savings of wages and from gifts, but that the largest gift he ever received was $50. He gave vague and indefinite testimony about doing business with banks, and when asked from which bank or either he had drawn the money he said: "It might have been drawn from either, but not all of it from either bank or any bank." In a later deposition he was asked, "Where did you have this money on deposit or in safety prior to the time you made payment to Mr. Burget?" His answer was: "I didn't have it on deposit." It does not appear that he sold the lot referred to to raise the money, and he gave no other explanation of the source from which he received it. He heard of the litigation affecting this land in the summer of 1903, but took no action in the matter. Ross Burget testified that he collected the rents and applied them on the mortgage down to the spring of 1905, and that the mortgage debt was reduced from $7,000 to $4,000, between April 15, 1903, to the spring of 1905, but that he made no payment thereon except the application of the rents, from which the cost of fencing and other expenses were deducted, but neither Sleeth nor Burget presented any account or statement of such rents or expenses, although repeatedly called for in their examination as witnesses. The land appears to have remained in the control and dominion of Burget down to the spring of 1905, when Sleeth himself made a lease upon it. During the two years between the date of the deed and that time, Burget had attended to the rents, improvements, and expenses, and applied the proceeds upon the mortgage exactly as he might have done had the deed not been made, except he says that he exhibited the statements, accounts of rents, etc., to Sleeth.

The evidence discloses a transaction of such nature and with such circumstances as to challenge careful scrutiny to ascertain whether the conveyance was in good faith. It seems that Mr. Sleeth never visited this farm for which he claims to have paid $2,600 cash, and agreed to pay $7,000 more; that he made no inquiries of the tenant or of others in the locality; that he could not or would not disclose how he obtained the money; that his statements about having part of it in bank were contradicted by his later deposition; that he took no steps to protect his interest when informed that the property was in litigation; that his grantor was financially embarrassed, and soon became bankrupt; that he could not or would not give a statement of rents received and expenses paid; that the entire management down to the spring of 1905 was left with the grantor, even to the making and allowance for improvements; that without showing any money received except the rents for two years, less expenses and cost of improvements, the amount of which he refused to give, he had still reduced the mortgage by $3,000, but would give no account of payments thereon; that the deed was dated in March, 1903, and yet no claim was made of any payment until April 15th; and that he refused to account for the delay in recording it. These are among the circumstances that demanded attention, and called for explanation.

A still more serious matter, however, is presented. Both Henry E. Sleeth and Ross Burget were twice examined touching these matters from which the foregoing facts appear. In the course of the examinations of Mr. Sleeth in December, 1905, as a witness for the plaintiff, the following appears in the record: "Q. Who occupied this farm at the time you received it? A. Mr. Jost. Q. State the nature of your contract with Mr. Jost? (Question objected to by defendant as incompetent, and on the advice of counsel witness refuses to answer.) Q. What accounting, if any, has Mr. Jost made to you; if any, so state? A. Made none, except through agents. Q. What agent or agents other than Mr. Ross Burget have you employed to look after the farm? (Defendant objects to question for the reason it is not proper examination in chief, and is not relevant or material, and witness is therefore advised not to answer.)" In his subsequent examination in August, 1906, appears the following: "Q. If you had any conversation with Mr. Ross Burget with reference to the purchase of this land prior to March 28th, 1903, you may so state, and what that conversation was. (Witness refuses to answer on advice of his counsel.) Q. If you disposed of any property for the purpose of raising the twenty-six hundred dollars purchase money, you may so state, what properties it were, and when disposed of. (Witness refuses to answer on advice of counsel.) Q. Who present[ed] you the note of eight thousand dollars which the mortgage secured and what was the total amount of credit, set out on the note, with reference to the final accounting? (Witness refuses to answer on advice of counsel. The attorney for the plaintiff insists, and demands that the foregoing question be answered because of its materiality.) Q. Why do you know that all the rents and profits from this land has been applied on said note? (Witness refuses to answer on advice of counsel.) Q. If Ross Burget ever tendered to you a receipt or memoranda in his accounting to you as your agent, you may so state, and what the receipt or memorandum was? (Witness refuses to answer on advice of counsel.) Q. What compensation, if any, did you make to Mr. Ross Burget for his services as your agent? (Witness refuses to answer on advice of counsel.) Q. Upon what terms and conditions was this land renting for at the time you received the deed? (Defendant objects to the question. Witness refuses to answer on advice of his counsel.) Q. State how much credit has been given you on this note at the present time? (Witness refuses to answer.) Q. What terms and conditions did you authorize Mr. Burget to contract with Mr. Jost for the rent of this land? (The defendant objects to the question, and witness refuses to answer on advice of counsel.) Q. Explain why you did not forward the deed to Greenwood county, Kansas, for record immediately upon its receipt from Ross Burget? (Witness refuses to answer on advice of counsel.) Q. If Jesse Sleeth, your wife, paid no part of this purchase money, and had no other interest in the purchase of the land other than your wife, explain why the deed of conveyance was made to you and Jesse Sleeth jointly. (Defendant objects to the question and witness refuses to answer on advice of counsel.)" In taking the deposition of Ross Burget the plaintiff encountered like evasions and refusals in several instances.

In the course of these examinations Mr. Sleeth testified generally that he had acted in good faith and without fraud, and the pertinency of the foregoing question is apparent. He was the principal party defendant and a nonresident of Kansas. The Civil Code provides: "Any party to a civil action or proceeding may compel any adverse party or person for whose benefit such action or proceeding is instituted, prosecuted or defended, at the trial or by deposition to testify as a witness in the same manner and subject to the same rules, as other witnesses." The plaintiff therefore had a clear right to the evidence, not to such only as the witness felt inclined to give, but to all that was within his knowledge pertinent to the issue. He had no right to withhold such testimony "on the advice of counsel," or otherwise. This is now conceded, and counsel representing him on the trial and in this court (but not in the taking of the deposition) says, in his brief, regarding these strictures of opposing counsel, concerning such refusal: "No exception can be taken to the strictures of counsel in this regard. But he should remember that when he scores Sleeth's counsel he exonerates Sleeth. These depositions were taken about the time the news of the taking of the depositions of H. H. Rogers in New York in the Standard Oil investigation reached Indiana. The matter of objecting to testimony 'on the advice of counsel' was new, and Sleeth's counsel could not resist the temptation to try his hand at it. The temptation was very great to a young lawyer." This may explain the misconduct, but does not obviate the consequences. The fact remains that the defendant, in a proceeding in the action, wrongfully deprived the plaintiff of a substantial right. We are not advised what procedure is provided in the jurisdiction where the depositions were taken to compel a refractory witness to answer. We may suppose that it is ample, but the question remains, what effect should such conduct have in the consideration of a case where the successful party thus living beyond the jurisdiction of the court has refused to testify in a material matter in behalf of the opposing party? It must be conceded that the benefit of all reasonable presumptions arising from his refusal should be given to the other party. The conduct of a party in omitting to produce evidence peculiarly within his knowledge frequently affords occasion for presumptions against him. Kirby v. Tallmadge, 160 U. S. 379, 16 Sup. Ct. 349, 40 L. Ed. 463. This rule has been often applied where a party withholds evidence within his exclusive possession, where the circumstances were such as to impel an honest man to produce the testimony. In this case the witness not only failed, but refused, to testify concerning material matters that must have been within his knowledge. In a case involving such contumacy of a party as a witness it was said: "It seems plain to us that there is a stronger presumption to be raised against a party in whose possession the facts must be, if they exist, by which suspicion would be removed, and all question as to the propriety of his conduct be set at rest, who stolidly refuses, without the suggestion of a reason, to aid the court in arriving at the truth." Aragon Coffee Co. v. Rogers, 105 Va. 51, 52 S. E. 843, 846. In that case the witness testified that he had given full value for the note in suit, but when called upon to explain the transaction, he met the inquiries with evasion, equivocation, and refusal to answer. "When a witness who evades cross-examination is the chief party in interest, or one who is plainly seeking to screen him, his testimony in his own favor ought to be disregarded when it needs explanation. It is to be presumed that, when a witness refuses to explain what he can explain, the explanation would be to his prejudice." Heath v. Waters, 40 Mich. 457, Syl. "It has been more than once said that the testimony in a case often consists in what is not proved as well as in what is proved. Where withholding testimony raises a violent presumption that a fact not clearly proved or disproved exists, it is not error to allude to the fact of withholding, as a circumstance strengthening the proof. That was all that was done here." Frick v. Barbour, 64 Pa. 120. "The consciousness indicated by conduct may be, not an indefinite one affecting the weakness of the cause at large, but a specific one concerning the defects of a particular element in the cause. The failure to bring before the tribunal some circumstance, document, or witness, when either the party himself or his opponent claims that the facts would thereby be elucidated, serves to indicate, as the most natural inference, that the party fears to do so, and this fear is some evidence that the circumstances or document or witness, if brought, would have exposed facts unfavorable to the party. These inferences, to be sure, cannot fairly be made except upon certain conditions; and they are also open always to explanation by circumstances which make some other hypothesis a more natural one than the party's fear of exposure. But the propriety of such an inference in general is not doubted. The nonproduction of evidence that would naturally have been produced by an honest and therefore fearless claimant permits the inference that its tenor is unfavorable to the party's cause. Ever since the case of the chimney sweeper's jewel, this has been a recognized principle." Wigmore on Evidence, § 235. The conduct of a party as a witness, and his refusal to give frank explanations of the transaction under investigation, are commented on by Mr. Justice Burch in Fincke v. Bundrick, 72 Kan. 182, 83 Pac. 403, 4 L. R. A. (N. S.) 820, where the reasonable inferences from evasions were drawn and applied.

A careful reading of the testimony of the defendant in error, contained in the two depositions, convinces us that the principles embraced in the foregoing quotations are applicable, and the natural inference is that the details and explanations called for and withheld would have shown the falsity of his claim that the transaction was in good faith, in view also of their inherent improbability, as evinced by his entire conduct. Little need be said about the like refusals of Ross Burget. He was the defendant's grantor, and both testified that he was the defendant's agent. His refusals were prompted by the same advice, and presumably were rooted in the same reason, and the same presumption must apply.

This was an action where the greatest liberality in the presentation of the evidence consistent with orderly practice ought to have been allowed. The transaction was in a distant state, and between persons whose interests were hostile to the plaintiff. Commenting upon such a situation, the Supreme Court of the United States has said: "Parties contemplating a fraud frequently pursue such devious courses to conceal their designs, and resort to such subtle practices to mislead their unsecured creditors, that the fraud becomes impossible to detect, unless the door be swung wide open for the admission of all testimony having any possible bearing upon the question. Facts which to the court might seem of no pertinence and be rejected as having no legal tendency to show knowledge of the fraud might be considered by the jury as significant and indicative of a guilty participation. Even negative evidence may sometimes have a positive value." Sonnentheil v. Moerlein Brewing Co., 172 U. S. 401, 410, 19 Sup. Ct. 233, 43 L. Ed. 492. "It is true, as contended, that honesty and fair dealing are presumed, and that one charging fraud must prove the same; but direct proof of a dishonest transfer of property can seldom be procured. 'A fraudulent purpose is known only to the parties to the transaction, and they do not hasten to tell it. As a rule, therefore, fraud is disclosed only by the condition of the parties, the details of the transaction, and the surrounding circumstances.'" Cox v. Cox, 39 Kan. 121, 17 Pac. 847.

The conditions of the parties and the details and circumstances of this transaction were all proper subjects of evidence, and the defendant having wrongfully refused to give such evidence ought not to profit thereby. The presumption against him arising upon such refusal must be added to all the facts and circumstances proven, and, upon the whole case thus presented, we are constrained to hold that the finding in favor of the defendant cannot be sustained.

Wherefore the judgment is reversed, and a new trial ordered.

CARTER v. BOTTS et al.

(Supreme Court of Kansas. Jan. 11, 1908.)

1. ADOPTION—PROCEEDINGS THEREFOR—VALIDITY.

Under Laws 1905, p. 264, c. 190, establishing juvenile courts, and providing in section 5 (page 267) that on the filing of a petition setting forth that a child is dependent, neglected or delinquent, the parents of the child, if living and their residence known, shall be notified of the proceedings, where the residence of the mother of a child was known at the time of the proceedings, and she was not notified, the proceedings were void for want of jurisdiction, and hence the probation officer was in no sense the child's guardian, could not bind the mother by his consent to an adoption, and the adoption proceedings were void.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 1, Adoption, §§ 7-10, 18-21.]

2. HABEAS CORPUS—CUSTODY AND CONTROL OF CHILD.

A mother of high character who was well able to take care of her infant daughter was entitled to her custody, though parties who had attempted to adopt the child under proceedings subsequently declared void were in better pecuniary circumstances than the mother.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 25, Habeas Corpus, § 84; vol. 37, Parent and Child, §§ 4-32.]

Original proceedings in habeas corpus by Patsy Carter against J. F. Botts and another. Writ allowed.

D. E. Henderson and L. A. Knox, for plaintiff. H. L. Burgess and J. R. Thorn, for defendants.

PER CURIAM. This is an original proceeding in habeas corpus, brought by a mother to obtain the custody of her daughter nine years old. The uncontested findings of fact made by a commissioner appointed to take the evidence leave little to be decided.

The findings are conclusive that the petitioner, Patsy Carter, has done nothing which would operate as a relinquishment or abandonment of her child to the respondents. The findings are further conclusive that the respondents knew very well where Patsy Carter lived at the time of the juvenile court proceedings. She was not notified, therefore the proceedings are void for want of jurisdiction. Laws 1905, p. 267, c. 190, § 5. This being true, the probation officer was in no sense the child's guardian, he could not bind her mother by his consent to an adoption, and the adoption proceedings are utterly void. It would seem that after the respondent J. F. Botts had taken the child, as he thought permanently, had assumed all the obligations of a parent to her, had undertaken to guard and keep her, to furnish her a home, supply her needs, nourish her and cherish her, he ought not to have sworn she was "destitute, homeless, abandoned, and dependent upon the public for support," branded her a waif and a stray, and procured a juvenile court judgment to that effect, especially when he knew a good home and a devoted mother were waiting for the child only a few miles away. Doubtless he is unlearned in the law, and does not understand the character of the proceeding; but it was in fact an outrageous attempt to prostitute a beneficent statute to fraudulent uses.

There remains only the welfare of the child to be considered. The court knows of no better custodian for a little girl than her mother, when the mother is of high character, well situated to take care of her, has proved her ability to rear a daughter, and bears for her children the full measure of a mother's love. The search for some one to stand "in loco parentis" is very brief when a capable, worthy, and affectionate mother, who has done nothing to impair her right, pleads for the privilege in respect to the child she bore. The better financial resources of the respondents cannot be allowed to turn the scale. Children born in mangers and in the humblest log cabins have been known to do well.

The initial misunderstanding between the contestants is greatly to be regretted. The respondents are accorded the highest praise in the findings of fact for their treatment of Ruth, and she would doubtless be safe with them. But the mother is shown to be equally well qualified to discharge every duty, and to bear every responsibility, and in such cases the mother-right, which has never been surrendered or forfeited, must prevail.

The custody of the child Ruth Botts is awarded to her mother, Patsy Carter, who also recovers her costs.

BRADLEY v. PINNEY.

(Supreme Court of Kansas. Jan. 11, 1908.)

1. PLEADING—COMPLAINT—AMENDMENT.

Where a petition on a note recited that a copy of the note was attached, marked "Exhibit A," but by mistake the original note instead of a copy was attached, plaintiff after answer was entitled to amend by striking the reference to a copy and inserting a recital that the original note was attached.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 39, Pleading, §§ 653-675.]

2. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS—PLEADING — COMPLAINT.

Where plaintiff sued on a note before it was barred by limitations, an amendment of the complaint after limitations had run merely for the purpose of correcting a recital that a copy of the note was attached to the complaint as Exhibit A so as to allege that the original instead of a copy was attached did not state a new cause of action, and was therefore not barred.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 33, Limitation of Actions, §§ 543-547.]

Error from District Court, Stafford County; J. W. Brinkerhoff, Judge.

Action by Jay Pinney against Charles A. Bradley. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Robert Garvin, for plaintiff in error. Frank J. Benscoter and T. W. Moseley, for defendant in error.

PER CURIAM. The action in the district court was upon a promissory note. The petition contained a recital that "a copy of said note is hereto attached, marked 'Exhibit A.'" By mistake the original note was attached instead of a copy. The defendant answered by a qualified denial of the execution of the note described. The plaintiff asked leave to amend, which was granted on payment of costs, and upon proof of the mistake or inadvertence of the attorney in attaching the original. The only amendment consisted in striking out from the recital the words "a copy of," and inserting the words "said original." Thereupon the defendant demurred to the amended petition on the ground "that it failed to state a cause of action, in that said amended petition shows on its face that the pretended cause of action is barred by the statute of limitations." This demurrer was overruled, and, the defendant electing to stand upon it, judgment was awarded against him for the amount due on the note. He complains of the allowance of the amendment, and of the order overruling the demurrer. Both were right. The court might well have allowed the amendment, which was merely formal, without the imposition of terms. When the action was commenced it was not barred, although if it had been commenced at the date of the amendment it would have been too late.

The contention that the amendment should be treated as a new action is without merit, and the judgment is affirmed.

HUDSON v. CONKLIN.

(Supreme Court of Kansas. Jan. 11, 1908.)

1. QUO WARRANTO—RIGHT TO SUE—PRIVATE PERSONS.

That the incumbent was ineligible to accept or hold the office to which he was elected did not confer on a minority candidate any claim to the office.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 41, Quo Warranto, § 41.]

2. SAME.

Where plaintiff had no title to the office of councilman of a city to which defendant was elected, he had no interest, personal or peculiar, to himself, which entitled him to challenge the incumbent's right to hold the office.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 41, Quo Warranto, § 41.]

3. SAME.

A person having no interest in an office held by defendant different from other members of the general public could not maintain quo warranto to try defendant's title to the office, such proceeding being required to be brought by some officer authorized to appear for and represent the general public.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 41, Quo Warranto, § 41.]

Quo warranto by A. J. Hudson against C. E. Conklin. Writ dismissed.

Otto J. Briley, for plaintiff. H. P. Farrelly and T. R. Evans, for defendant.

PER CURIAM. Action in quo warranto brought by A. J. Hudson, who was a candidate for councilman of the city of Chanute, against C. E. Conklin, another candidate for the same office who received a majority of the votes cast, and is in possession of the office. The ground of contest is that Conklin was ineligible to accept or hold the office because he was not an owner of real estate within the city; but the ineligibility of Conklin, if it exists, does not give a minority candidate any claim to the office. Wood v. Bartling, 16 Kan. 109; Privett v. Bickford, 26 Kan. 52, 40 Am. Rep. 301. Since it is conceded that Hudson has no title to the office he has no interest, personal or peculiar, to himself, which warrants him in challenging the right of the incumbent to hold the office. Having no interest which differs from other members of the general public, he must leave the maintenance of the action, if there be grounds for one, to some one authorized to appear for and represent the general public. The proceeding must therefore be dismissed.

ST. LOUIS & S. F. R. CO. v. MADDEN.

(Supreme Court of Kansas. Jan. 11, 1908.)

1. NEGLIGENCE—ACTS OF INDEPENDENT CONTRACTOR.

It is a general rule that one who employs another to do a piece of work is not liable for the other's collateral negligence unless the relation of master and servant existed between them. The following exceptions to the general rule apply to and govern this case:

(a) Whenever an injury to a third party results from the failure of the employer to perform a duty which he owes to such party, he will not be permitted to avoid his liability by letting the performance of the work to another.

(b) One who has a piece of work to perform which in its nature is dangerous to others is under obligation to see that it is carefully performed so as to avoid such injury, and he cannot delegate the obligation to an independent contractor, and thus avoid his liability in case the work is negligently done to the injury of another.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 34, Master and Servant, § 1241.]

2. RAILROADS—FIRES—NEGLIGENCE OF INDEPENDENT CONTRACTOR.

A railroad company let a contract to another to burn a fire guard along its right of way. Through the negligence of the contractor, the fire escaped his control and damaged the property of the plaintiff.

Held: (a) That the work was performed as a part of the operation of the railroad, and that the railroad company could not by delegating the work to an independent contractor avoid the liability placed upon it by statute. Gen. St. 1901, § 5923.

(b) That the work being of a character from which in the natural course of things injurious consequences to others might be expected to result, unless means were adopted to prevent such consequences, the railroad company was bound to see that measures were taken to prevent such injury, and could not avoid the obligation by letting the work to an independent contractor.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from District Court, Butler County; G. P. Alkman, Judge.

Action by R. M. Madden against the St. Louis & San Francisco Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant brings error. Affirmed.

L. F. Parker, H. C. Sluss, and W. F. Evans, for plaintiff in error. T. A. Kramer, for defendant in error.

PORTER, J. In 1904 plaintiff in error entered into a contract with Isaac Gregory to burn the grass on a strip 300 feet wide on each side of its right of way in Cowley county for a distance of 7 miles. While engaged in burning the strip the fire escaped from his control, ran over the land of defendant in error, and destroyed the grass on the ground and the hay in stack. The owner of the land recovered a judgment against the railroad company for the amount of the damages and attorney's fees. The railroad company brings error.

The sole contention of the railroad company is that Gregory was an independent contractor, not an employé of the company, and, inasmuch as the relation of master and servant did not exist, the company is not responsible for his negligence. The contract between the railroad company and Gregory was in writing, but was not put in evidence. It appears, however, that he had no other employment with the company, and the work was to be completed within a specified time for which he was to be paid the sum of $12 per mile. He testified that he was his own boss; that he procured from the owners of adjacent lands their consent to enter thereon for the purpose of burning the fire guard. On the day the fire was set out there was a strong wind blowing in the direction of the land of plaintiff, and it was this which caused the fire to escape control. Gregory testified that he was ordered by the foreman of the section gang of defendant company to do the work that day; and that in pursuance of such order he set out the fire which caused the damage.

The single question to be determined, therefore, is whether under the circumstances of this case the railroad company is liable for the negligence of Gregory. The general rule is that the employer cannot be held responsible for the negligence of an independent contractor. The party injured must look to the person whose actual negligence caused the injury. Kas. Cent. Ry. Co. v. Flitzsimmons, 18 Kan. 34; St. L., Ft. S. & W. R. Co. v. Willis, Adm'r, 38 Kan. 330, 339, 16 Pac. 728; Engel v. Eureka Club, 137 N. Y. 100, 32 N. E. 1052, 33 Am. St. Rep. 692; Hexamer v. Webb, 101 N. Y. 377, 4 N. E. 755, 54 Am. Rep. 703; Uppington v. City of New York, 165 N. Y. 222, 59 N. E. 91, 53 L. R. A. 550; Wabash, St. Louis & Pacific Railway Company v. Farver, 111 Ind. 195, 12 N. E. 296, 60 Am. Rep. 696. For additional authorities, see note to Central Coal & Iron Co. v. Grider's Adm'r, 65 L. R. A. 455. There are, however, numerous well-established exceptions to the general rule. One of these is said to be that, where the employer retains the right to exercise authority as to the manner and method in which the work shall be performed, he will be held liable for injuries to third parties the same as though the relation of master and servant existed between him and the contractor. With respect to this exception, the test most usually applied is not whether the owner actually exercised control over the work, but did he have the right to exercise direction or control? Atlantic Transport Co. v. Coneys, 82 Fed. 177, 28 C. C. A. 388; Hardaker v. Idle District Council, L. R. 1 Q. B. Div. 335; Pickens & Plummer v. Diecker & Bro., 21 Ohio St. 212, 8 Am. Rep. 55; Linnehan v. Rollins, 137 Mass. 123, 50 Am. Rep. 287. Of course, the fact that the owner exercised control over the work during its performance would furnish some ground for the inference that he had reserved the right to do so by the terms of the contract itself. It is also apparent that in a case where the injuries resulted directly from his interference it would make no difference whether or not the relation of master and servant existed, because, under such circumstances, he would be regarded as the principal tort-feasor. Davle v. Levy & Sons, 39 La. Ann. 551, 2 South. 395, 4 Am. St. Rep. 257; Faren v. Sellers & Co., 39 La. Ann. 1011, 3 South. 363, 4 Am. St. Rep. 256; Mahar v. Steuer, 170 Mass. 454, 49 N. E. 741.

On precisely the same principles rests the exception to the general rule which was recognized in Cloud County v. Vickers, 62 Kan. 25, 29, 61 Pac. 391, that where the injury is caused by defective construction inherent in the original plan of the employer, or where defective plans and specifications for the work have been adopted by the employer, the latter is liable. Again, where the work to be done is in its nature dangerous to others, however carefully performed, the employer will be held liable; because it is incumbent upon him to foresee such danger, and to take precautions against it. Atlanta Railroad Co. v. Kimberly, 87 Ga. 161, 13 S. E. 277, 27 Am. St. Rep. 231, 234; Bower v. Peate, L. R. 1 Q. B. Div. 321; Covington & Cincinnati Bridge Co. v. Steinbrock & Patrick, 61 Ohio St. 215, 55 N. E. 618, 76 Am. St. Rep. 375. Nor is a person permitted to escape liability for his failure to perform a duty imposed upon him by law. This principle is true whether the duty arises by virtue of a statute as in C. K. & W. R. Co. v. Hutchinson, 45 Kan. 180, 25 Pac. 576, or where the duty is one imposed upon him by law. Fowler v. Saks, 18 D. C. 570, 7 L. R. A. 649. The cases illustrating the general rule and the numerous exceptions thereto may be found in a monographic note to Covington & Cincinnati Bridge Co. v. Steinbrock & Patrick, 61 Ohio St. 215, 55 N. E. 618, 76 Am. St. Rep. 375. See, also, extensive note to the case of Central Coal & Iron Co. v. Grider's Adm'r, 65 L. R. A. 455, and note to Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Tow, 66 L. R. A. 941.

Some of the exceptions we have noted above apply with more or less force to the present case. It is the contention that the railroad company made itself liable by directing that the work should be done at a time when a strong wind was blowing. It directed the work to be done on a certain day. Presumably this was in accordance with the contract. There was evidence showing that the fire escaped from the control of Gregory on account of the high wind, and that except for the order and direction of the foreman the fire would not have been set out on that day. The fire was set out on Monday; the order of the foreman was given on the Saturday before, and there was no reason to suppose at that time that Monday would not be a suitable day for the work. It is not reasonable to presume that when the foreman directed Gregory to begin the work on the following Monday it was the intention thereby to deprive him of the use of all discretion in the matter, or that the order meant that he should begin the work on that day regardless of wind and weather. The right of the employer to exercise a limited control over the work without thereby destroying the independent character of the contract has been recognized by the courts in numerous cases. The rule seems to be well established that where the control reserved does not apply to the mode or manner of having the work done and does not in any way take the work out of the hands of the contractor it will not destroy the independent nature of the contract. K. C. M. & O. Ry. Co. v. Loosely (Kan.) 90 Pac. 990. In other words, the relation of master and servant is not to be inferred from the reservation by the employer of powers which do not deprive the contractor of his right to use his own methods in accordance with his contract. See cases cited in note to Central Coal & I. Co. v. Grider's Adm'r, supra. It would hardly be a safe rule to establish to say that the mere direction of an employer that he wanted the work done at a certain time should render him liable for injuries resulting to third parties unless it were shown that the injuries were such as might reasonably be expected to result from the giving of the order.

There are two exceptions, however, to the general rule relieving an employer from liability caused by the negligence of an independent contractor, which, in our opinion, govern this case, and take it out of the operation of the rule. Whenever an injury to a third party results from the failure of the employer to perform a duty which he owes to such party he will not be permitted to avoid his liability by letting the performance of the work to another. A familiar illustration is found in the law of master and servant. Where the master owes to the servant the duty of providing a safe place to work, or there is imposed upon him by the law any duty or obligation to the servant, he cannot by letting out the performance of the work to an independent contractor, escape liability for injuries to the servant, caused by his failure to perform the obligation. And it makes no difference whether the duty is imposed by statute or by the common law. Pickard v. Smith, 10 C. B. (N. S.) 470; Gray v. Pullen, 5 B. & S. 970.

A railroad company is liable in damages to any person whose property is injured by fire caused by the negligent operation of its railroad. Our statute (section 5923, Gen. St. 1901) recognizes this common-law liability, and provides that in actions against railroad companies to recover such damages certain rules of evidence shall obtain. It also allows the person injured to recover a reasonable attorney's fee in prosecution of the action. Thus there is cast upon the railroad company an obligation to the owner of property injured by fire, caused by the operation of the railroad, which is in many respects different from the obligation resting upon an individual who negligently permits fire to escape. This obligation is one which the railroad company cannot escape by farming out the contract for a part of the operation of its railroad to an independent contractor. In Fowler v. Saks, supra, the owner of a building who let a contract to repair his building, which required the taking down of a party wall, was held liable to the adjoining owner for damages resulting therefrom. It appeared in that case that there was a building regulation in the District of Columbia requiring the owner of a building taking down a party wall to respond in damages to the adjacent owner for any injuries occasioned thereby. In the opinion the court uses this language: "A party under an antecedent obligation to do a thing, or to do it in a particular way, cannot get rid of his responsibility by deputing it to somebody else." It was also said that the duty in that case rested upon defendant by operation of the common law aside from any building regulation, and was one which could not be delegated to an independent contractor. The object of burning the fire guard which caused the injury to plaintiff's property was to enable the railroad company to operate its railroad without injury to the property of others. The purpose for which the work was performed was the same a railroad company has in view when it provides screens and sparks arresters upon its engines. The work was therefore performed by the company in the operation of its railroad. Thus, in Pound v. Port Huron & S. W. Ry. Co., 54 Mich. 13, 19 N. W. 570, the railroad company employed a contractor to grade its roadbed. Cattle escaped upon the right of way by reason of his failure to keep up the fences along the right of way. The company was held not to be released from its liability for the damage for the reason that the duty to keep its right of way fenced was imposed upon it by law.

The present case falls within another exception to the general rule which may be stated as follows: One who has a piece of work, the performance of which is in its nature dangerous to others, is under an obligation to see that it is carefully performed so as to avoid such injury, and he cannot delegate the obligation to an independent contractor, and thus avoid his liability in case the work is negligently done to the injury of another. That such is the law is settled by the weight of reason and authority. Thus, in Bower v. Peate, L. R. 1 Q. B. 321, 326, a leading case, Cockburn, Chief Justice, used the following language: "That a man who orders a work to be executed, from which, in the natural course of things, injurious consequences to his neighbor must be expected to arise, unless means are adopted by which such consequences may be prevented, is bound to see to the doing of that which is necessary to prevent the mischief, and cannot relieve himself of his responsibility by employing someone else—whether it be the contractor employed to do the work from which the danger arises, or some independent person—to do what is necessary to prevent the act he has ordered to be done from becoming wrongful. There is an obvious difference between committing work to a contractor to be executed from which, if properly done, no injurious consequences can arise, and handing over to him work to be done from which mischievous consequences will arise unless preventive measures are adopted."

In Hardaker v. Idle District Council, L. R. 1 Q. B. Div. 335, the contractor was employed to construct a sewer for defendant. Owing to his negligence a gas main was broken, and gas escaped into the house where plaintiffs resided, causing injury to them and their property. Defendant was held liable because it owed a duty to the public, including plaintiffs, so to construct the sewer as not to injure the gas main, and it was said that this duty could not be delegated to another so as to relieve it from liability. To the same effect, see Tarry v. Ashton, 1 Q. B. Div. 314; Dalton v. Angus, L. R. 6 App. Cases, 740; Storrs v. City of Utica, 17 N. Y. 104, 72 Am. Dec. 437; Water Co. v. Ware, 18 Wall. (U. S.) 563, 21 L. Ed. 485; Black v. Christchurch Finance Co., App. Cases, 48; Covington & Cincinnati Bridge Co. v. Steinbrock, 61 Ohio St. 215, 55 N. E. 618, 76 Am. St. Rep. 375, also a party wall case, was ruled the same way. In this case the court says: "The duty need not be imposed by statute, though such is frequently the case. If it be a duty imposed by law, the principle is the same as if required by statute." Citing Bower v. Peate, L. R. 1 Q. B. Div. 321. "It arises at law in all cases where more or less danger to others is necessarily incident to the performance of the work let to contract. It is the danger to others, incident to the performance of the work let to contract, that raises the duty, and which the employer cannot shift from himself to another, so as to avoid liability, should injury result to another from negligence in doing the work."

In Circleville v. Neuding, 41 Ohio St. 463, and Railroad Company v. Morey, 47 Ohio St. 207, 24 N. E. 269, 7 L. R. A. 701, the same doctrine is declared. In the latter case the railroad company employed a contractor to do for it certain plumbing which involved the opening of the public highway for the purpose of laying a drain. Plaintiff, in the nighttime, fell into the ditch by the negligence of the contractor in not protecting it. The railroad company was held liable. It was stated in the syllabus, as follows: "One who causes work to be done is not liable, ordinarily, for injuries that result from carelessness in its performance by the employees of an independent contractor to whom he has let the work, without reserving to himself any control over the execution of it. But this principle has no application where a resulting injury, instead of being collateral and flowing from the negligent act of the employé alone, is one that might have been anticipated as a direct or probable consequence of the performance of the work contracted for, if reasonable care is omitted in the course of its performance. In such case the person causing the work to be done will be liable, though the negligence is that of an independent contractor." The same principle is also one of the grounds upon which the exception is predicated in Fowler v. Saks, supra. Indeed, authorities might be multiplied in support of the proposition that, where the work is inherently dangerous to others, the employer is under an obligation to see that it is carefully performed, and cannot escape the liability by the employment of an independent contractor. In the following cases, most of which involved damages occasioned by fires set out by contractors, the railroad company or employer was relieved of liability on the ground that the negligence was that of an independent contractor; but, so far as we have examined the cases, in none of them does it appear that the contractor was employed for the purpose of setting out fires as in the present case; the fires were either set out to facilitate the work of clearing the land or right of way or for some incidental purpose, and escaped through the negligence of the contractor or his employes: Eaton v. European & North American Railway Company, 59 Me. 520, 8 Am. Rep. 430; Callahan v. Burlington & Missouri River R. Co., 23 Iowa, 562; Burbank v. Bethel Steam Mill Co., 75 Me. 373, 46 Am. Rep. 400; Woodhill v. Great Western Railway Co., 4 U. C. C. P. 449, 451; Carroll v. Corporation of Plympton, 9 U. C. C. P. 345; Ferguson v. Hubbell, 97 N. Y. 507, 49 Am. Rep. 544; Gillson v. North Grey Railway Co., 35 U. C. Q. B. R. 475. In the last-mentioned case two of the judges dissented, and one of the questions involved was whether there was such an interference on the part of the employer as to destroy the independent character of the contract.

The case of Wabash, St. Louis & Pacific Railway Company v. Farver, 111 Ind. 195, 12 N. E. 296, 60 Am. Rep. 696, is apparently opposed to this doctrine. There the railroad company was engaged in constructing a well from which to supply water for its engines. The running water interfered with the work, and the railroad company contracted with the owner of a small, portable, steam engine to pump the accumulating water in order to keep it out of the way. The plaintiff driving on the highway was injured by reason of his horses' fright at the engine. It was held that as the railroad company had no control over the use of the engine it was not liable. Upon examination, however, it will be found that the principles upon which the decision turned are not in conflict with the doctrine we are considering. Here was an independent contract to do something which might be said to be a part of the operation of the railroad; but obviously the question whether the work was a part of the operation of the road was unimportant, for the reason that the company owed no particular duty by statute or common law to the public or to the plaintiff. The work was not dangerous, nor did it constitute a nuisance. In the opinion it was said that the use of a portable steam engine for the purpose of pumping water in close proximity to a public highway was not necessarily a nuisance if the engine was used in the proper manner. Injury could only result from its negligent use. It was also remarked that the work was not of a character which imposed upon the employer any peculiar obligation to the plaintiff or others using the highway, and that if the employer had been under peculiar obligations to the person injured it would have been liable for a breach of that duty, regardless of the relation between the employer and the person whose negligence caused the injury. In other words, the company might let to an independent contractor the performance of work in connection with the operation of its road without necessarily becoming liable to third persons for the negligence of the contractor. It is only where the company owes some duty or obligation to the third party, placed upon it by statute or arising out of the peculiar nature of the work itself, which prevents it from escaping liability by an independent contract.

The general rule and the particular exception we are considering was well stated by Lord Blackburn in Dalton v. Angus, supra, in the following language: "Ever since Quarman v. Burnett" (6 M. & W. 499) "it has been considered settled law that one employing another is not liable for his collateral negligence unless the relation of master and servant existed between them. So that a person employing a contractor to do work is not liable for the negligence of that contractor or his servants. On the other hand, a person causing something to be done, the doing of which casts on him a duty, cannot escape from the responsibility attaching on him of seeing that duty performed by delegating it to a contractor. He may bargain with the contractor that he shall perform the duty and stipulate for an indemnity from him if it is not performed, but he cannot thereby relieve himself from liability to those injured by the failure to perform it." Let it be conceded that the burning of the fire guard was a part of the operation of the railroad, and the conclusion irresistibly follows that the defense of an independent contract is of no avail. The statute placed upon the company an additional and peculiar obligation to the owner of property injured by fire in the operation of its road; it is made liable, not only for all damage sustained, but for reasonable attorney's fees in an action brought to recover therefor. No obligation to pay attorney's fees rested upon an individual through whose negligence damages by fire should result to the property of another; and in order to recover against the individual the plaintiff would be obliged to prove negligence, while the statute provides that where the action is brought against the company, and the fire was caused by the operation of the road, negligence is presumed as soon as these facts are shown.

We find no difficulty in determining that the work of burning the fire guard was a part of the operation of the road. The company could not, therefore, absolve itself from the liability by letting out the work to an independent contractor, for the reason that it owed to the plaintiff an obligation placed upon it by the law to respond in damages for all injuries by fire thus caused; and for the further reason that it employed a dangerous agency, which, in the experience of every one, required that precautions be taken to prevent damage to the property of others. Thus, a second duty was cast upon the railroad company not to cause the work to be done either directly by its employees or indirectly by a contractor, without seeing that precautions were taken to prevent the escape of fire and consequent injury to the property of plaintiff. Neither of these obligations or duties could be avoided by delegating the performance of the work to another.

It follows that the judgment must be affirmed.

ATCHISON, T. & S. F. RY. CO. v. BILLINGS.

(Supreme Court of Kansas. Jan. 11, 1908.)

1. INJUNCTION—MANDATORY INJUNCTION TO RAILROAD—BUILDING CATTLE GUARDS.

Where a railway company neglects for a long time to construct cattle guards where its road enters and leaves improved or fenced land, a mandatory injunction may properly issue commanding and compelling it to construct and maintain cattle guards, as the statute requires.

2. RAILROADS—FAILURE TO ERECT CATTLE GUARDS—DAMAGES.

The record of that branch of the case seeking a recovery of damages for losses already sustained examined, and it is held that there was no duplication of damages in the award made by the jury.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from District Court, Montgomery County; Thos. J. Flannelly, Judge.

Action by Lewis Billings against the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant brings error. Affirmed.

W. R. Smith, O. J. Wood, and A. A. Scott, for plaintiff in error. A. L. Billings, for defendant in error.

JOHNSTON, J. This action was brought by Lewis Billings against the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Railway Company to recover damages resulting from the failure of the company to maintain proper cattle guards where the railway enters and leaves the fenced fields of his farm, and also to enjoin the company from hereafter operating its road through the farm without completing the inclosures on his farm with cattle guards, as the law prescribes. As the railroad is constructed it intersects the fenced boundaries of Billings' farm of 533 acres at eight places. His land had been fenced and arranged for farming and stock raising, provision having been made for the rotation of crops and the handling of stock so that water, shade, and shelter were available. It was shown beyond cavil that the railway company neglected to maintain cattle guards at the intersection of the boundaries of Billings' farm for a period of two years prior to the commencement of this action. At some places there were no cattle guards of any kind for a time, and at other places unsuitable guards were maintained, which did not prevent stock entering his fields and passing from one field to another along the right of way. The verdict of the jury awarded Billings damages in the sum of $410.50, made up of the following items: For labor expended in guarding cattle in 1903, $34; for the guarding of cattle 60 days in 1904, $60; for loss of pasturage, $50; for diminished rental or usable value of the entire farm two years, 25 cents per annum per acre, amounting to $266.50.

That Billings was entitled to some damages is not contested; but it is argued in behalf of the railway company that there is a duplication of damages in the verdict, and that the item of $266.50 for depreciation in the rental value of the farm should be deducted. An examination of the testimony and findings, however, does not lead to the opinion that there was a double allowance for the same loss. In his petition Billings alleged and offered proof showing specific expenses or losses for watching cattle at particular times, made necessary by the openings which the railway company left in his fenced fields. The item of pasturage was apparently allowed for the complete loss of grass and fodder in particular fields which Billings was unable to use because of the absence of cattle guards at the intersections of his fences. The allowance of 25 cents an acre appears to be for depreciation and loss from the inability of Billings to use his farm as it was designed to be used, and the increased inconvenience and expense of carrying on the business in which he was engaged. The testimony is that his plans were deranged, and that his farm, which had been arranged and fenced to carry on a cattle business, was rendered unfit for that use, so that, instead of keeping and feeding from 200 to 300 head of cattle as before, he was compelled to practically abandon the business, and had only been able to handle about 20 head of cattle. For this depreciation and loss the jury allowed, on a per acre basis, $266.50 for the period of two years. These items were pleaded separately. They were treated as separate and distinct losses in the testimony, and the court in instructing the jury treated this depreciation of rental value as something wholly apart from the specific losses of guarding cattle as well as that arising from the loss of a particular pasture. Although complaining of the allowance of the item of $206.50, the railway company does not ask for a reversal of the judgment because testimony was admitted on the basis that these items were distinct losses, nor that they were so submitted in charging the jury. All that is asked in behalf of the railway company is that the last item be stricken out. A reading of the record does not convince us that double damages were allowed for any loss arising out of the neglect of the company; and, considering the evidence as to the loss sustained in consequence of the company's neglect, the award is far from excessive.

It is next contended that the court was not justified in issuing a mandatory injunction. Upon the testimony it was found that the operation of the railroad through the Billings' farm, without cattle guards, and the railroad's persistent and long-continued neglect and refusal to close up the openings with cattle guards, after due notice, was a continuing nuisance. The decree of the court enjoins the company from continuing the nuisance, and commands it to keep and maintain proper guards at all points where the railroad enters and leaves the fenced lands of Billings. It is true, as contended, that the particular function of the remedy of injunction is to restrain and prevent rather than to command and compel, but there is unquestioned power in a court of equity to issue mandatory injunctions on proper occasions. It is a remedy to be sparingly exercised, one that is rarely granted until after a final hearing, and except in cases where the injury is irreparable, the remedy at law inadequate, or to prevent a multiplicity of suits. It has been granted where a railway company in constructing its road built an embankment which wrongfully diverted the running water from the land of a person through whose land the water naturally flowed before the road was built. It was contended there as here that the damages inflicted were measurable, and that the exigencies of the case were not such as to warrant the exercise of the mandatory power of a court of equity. This court, recognizing the rule that the remedy can only be employed in extreme cases, held that it was a proper occasion for issuing a mandatory injunction, and affirmed the decree compelling the opening of the waterway. A. T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Long, 46 Kan. 701, 27 Pac. 182, 26 Am. St. Rep. 165. A railway company has been compelled to perform the duty to receive and move the cars of another company. Chicago, B. & Q. Ry. Co. v. Burlington, C. R. & N. Ry. Co. (C. C.) 34 Fed. 481. A consumer of gas, who had affixed a governor to a meter without the consent of the gas company, was commanded to remove the same by a mandatory injunction. The act of attaching the governor to the meter belonging to another was designated as a trespass of such a character as to justify a mandatory order. Blondell v. Consol. Gas Co., 89 Md. 732, 43 Atl. 817, 46 L. R. A. 187. A patron of a natural gas company, who had contracted with the company to furnish a supply of gas to manufacture glass, and had expended much money in fitting his factory with appliances for using gas, was granted an injunction preventing the company from shutting off the supply, and also compelling it to restore the flow of gas as it existed before the wrongful interference and stoppage of the flow, and this on the ground that the loss was incapable of accurate adjustment. Whiteman v. Fuel-Gas Co., 139 Pa. 492, 20 Atl. 1062. In Scofield v. Railway Company, 43 Ohio St. 571, 3 N. E. 907, 54 Am. Rep. 846, an injunction was issued compelling a railway company to give a shipper equal facilities and rates such as were given to other more favored shippers, and it was issued largely upon the theory that to obtain relief at law would necessitate a multiplicity of suits. The writ has also been allowed to compel the removal of inclosures around public school lands, which it was held constituted a nuisance. State v. Goodnight, 70 Tex. 682, 11 S. W. 119. In United States v. Brighton Ranch Co. (C. C.) 26 Fed. 218, Judge Brewer held that an action of injunction is the appropriate remedy to compel the removal of a fence which had been erected on government land. The mandatory injunction was awarded, although it was conceded that the government had a right to proceed by an action of ejectment to remove the defendant from the occupancy of the land. It was remarked that, "whether the act of the defendant comes within the technical definition of purpresture, or that of a public nuisance, we are of the opinion that the government can come into a court of equity, and by its orders have an end put to this trespass on the public rights." Where one person built a wall partly projecting on the land of another, who applied to a court of equity to secure the removal of the wall, it was ruled that there was no plain and adequate remedy at law for the wrong, and that a mandatory injunction should issue requiring the offender to remove the structure. Norton v. Elwert, 29 Ore. 583, 41 Pac. 926. In Wheeler v. Rochester & Syracuse Railroad Co., 12 Barb. (N. Y.) 227, a railroad company was proceeding to construct its road across the farm of Wheeler without providing such farm crossings as the law required, and the court held that the company should be enjoined from proceeding with the construction of the railroad without providing suitable crossings. It is not uncommon for courts of equity to grant writs, prohibitory in form, which are mandatory in character and effect. So it was said by the Vice Chancellor in North of Eng. Junc. Railway Co. v. Clarence Railway Co., 1 Coll.

507: "That injunctions, in substance mandatory, though in form only prohibitory, have been and may be granted by the courts is clear. This branch of its jurisdiction is not fit to be exercised without particular caution, but certainly is one fit and necessary under certain circumstances." The foregoing are only a few of the many cases which might be cited wherein mandatory injunctions have been issued. Other examples which illustrate the circumstances under which the remedy may be employed are collated in the note to Moundsville v. Ohio R. R. Co., 37 W. Va. 92, 16 S. E. 514, 20 L. R. A. 161.

In this case it was developed that several years before the bringing of this action Billings had been compelled to bring another action, and had recovered damages resulting from the neglect of the railway company to maintain cattle guards at the intersections of his farm. Before bringing the present action he had given notice of the defects, and unsuccessfully endeavored to induce the agents and officers of the railway company to provide and maintain cattle guards. The opening of these gaps in his fields, and the operation of the railroad through them, without maintaining cattle guards, was contrary to the express provision of the statute, and a direct invasion of Billings' rights. It was a wrong of such a character, and had continued for so long a time, as to constitute a nuisance, and one which justified the issuance of a mandatory injunction. It is argued that in his petition the plaintiff did not designate the wrong as a nuisance, nor ask that the court declare it to be a nuisance. The allegations of the petition, however, describing the wrong and injury charged a course of conduct and such an invasion of the plaintiff's rights as would constitute a nuisance, and upon proof of the same the court was justified in the finding that was made. Apart from that finding the injury was of such a character that any other remedy would have been wholly inadequate, and under the authorities cited a mandatory injunction was an appropriate remedy. The statute, it is true, provides that, where a railway company neglects to maintain cattle guards, the injured party may recover damages from the wrongdoer; but it is plain that he cannot be adequately compensated in damages for the injury inflicted. For his protection many actions at law would be necessary, and in none of them could adequate compensation be recovered. In one sense the injunction restrains as well as commands. It restrains the railway company from operating its road through the plaintiff's fenced fields without closing the openings with cattle guards; and from continuing the nuisance. But of course it is substantially mandatory in character, and proceeds on the assumption that the company will continue to operate its road, and commands it to construct and maintain cattle guards during the time of operation. The facts in the case furnish an example of one of the extreme cases which justify the issuance of a mandatory injunction.

The judgment of the district court will be affirmed.

CHICAGO, R. I. & P. RY. CO. v. RALSTON.

(Supreme Court of Kansas. Jan. 11, 1908.)

1. CARRIERS — INJURIES TO PASSENGERS — INSTRUCTION.

In an action to recover damages for injuries sustained while riding as a passenger in a caboose attached to a local freight train, an instruction which reads: "It is the duty of a railroad company transporting passengers on a freight train to exercise the highest possible degree of care and diligence to which such trains are susceptible, and a failure to use such degree of care is negligence on the part of the railway company," is erroneous, where no modification or explanation thereof is elsewhere given.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 9, Carriers, §§ 1326-1337.]

2. SAME—CARE REQUIRED.

It is the duty of a railroad company when it carries passengers in a caboose or other car attached to a local freight train to use the highest possible degree of care and diligence in the protection of the safety of such passengers to which such train is susceptible considering its construction, equipment, and use as a carrier of freight.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 9, Carriers, § 1098.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from District Court, Reno County; P. J. Galle, Judge.

Action by W. H. Ralston against the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

M. A. Low and Paul E. Walker, for plaintiff in error. Prigg & Williams, for defendant in error.

GRAVES, J. This action was commenced in the district court of Reno county July 21, 1905, by the defendant in error against the plaintiff in error, to recover damages for injuries sustained by him while a passenger in a caboose attached to a local freight train. On January 27, 1906, the plaintiff obtained judgment in the district court, and the defendant, as plaintiff in error, brings the case here for review.

The plaintiff in error complains of the trial court for refusing to give instructions to the jury which were requested by it, and for giving others to which it objected. The instruction specially objected to reads: "It is the duty of a railroad company transporting passengers on a freight train to exercise the highest possible degree of care and diligence to which such trains are susceptible, and a failure to use such degree of care is negligence on the part of the railway company." There is nothing in the entire charge of an explanatory nature by which the jury could properly interpret this instruction, or correctly apply it to the facts being considered. This instruction is criticised as being misleading and erroneous, for the reason that the language used therein might easily be understood by the jury as a direction from the court to measure the care and diligence of the railroad company by a higher standard than the law requires. It is within the range of possibility to operate a local freight train quite smoothly and gently with little or no jolting or jarring; and, in the exercise of the highest possible degree of care and diligence as required by the court's instruction, it would be negligence on the part of the company not to operate its trains in that manner. To do so, however, would destroy the train's usefulness as a carrier of freight, and make passenger traffic thereon undesirable because of its lack of speed. It is not the purpose of the law to require railroad companies operating local freight trains on which passengers are carried to manage the train in a way to destroy or materially injure the principal business for which such a train is designed. Carrying freight is the chief purpose of local freight trains. They are constructed and equipped for that business only. In the conduct of such business it is necessary to start and stop often, to take in and set out cars, shift the train on side tracks, couple and uncouple cars, load and unload freight of all kinds, each of which takes time. These movements necessarily cause more or less jolting and jarring. All persons who ride as passengers in a caboose know this, and expect the delays, discomforts, and inconveniences which are unavoidable in the operation of such trains. In determining the degree of care and diligence required of railroad companies in the operation of trains of this character, these conditions should be recognized. We understand the rule to be that, when a railroad company carries passengers on its local freight trains as a business, it must use the highest possible degree of care and diligence of which such a train is susceptible in view of its construction, equipment, and use as a carrier of freight. To say that such a train shall be operated with the highest possible degree of care and diligence of which it is susceptible, without regard to the considerations named, places a duty upon the company operating such train which the law does not recognize.

The instruction given, and here criticised, was copied from the case of M. P. Ry. Co. v. Holcomb, 44 Kan. 332, 24 Pac. 467. The statement as a legal proposition is correct, but as used in that case the words "to which such trains are susceptible" were intended to include the conditions heretofore mentioned. The decision was made upon the authority of the case of I. & St. L. R. R. Co. v. Horst, 93 U. S. 201, 23 L. Ed. 898, and a large part of the opinion in that case was copied, adopted, and followed. A part of the opinion reads: "The terms in question do not mean all the care and diligence the human mind can conceive of, nor such as will render the transportation free from any possible peril, nor such as would drive the carrier from his business; * * * but it does emphatically require everything necessary to the security of the passenger, * * * and reasonably consistent with the business of the carrier, and the means of conveyance employed." From this it will be seen that this court, in the case above mentioned, held as it does now that a railroad company, when carrying passengers on a local freight train, is held to the highest possible degree of care and diligence in the protection of the safety of its passengers, but when determining whether that duty has been performed or not, the nature of the train, its construction, equipment, its duties as a carrier of freight, and other circumstances necessarily involved in its operation should be considered. We conceive this to be the rule supported by the authorities generally: Mo. Pac. R. R. Co. v. Holcomb, 44 Kan. 332, 24 Pac. 467; Railroad Co. v. Horst, 93 U. S. 291, 23 L. Ed. 898.

In case of Portuchek v. Wabash R. Co., 101 Mo. App. 52, 74 S. W. 368, the Supreme Court of the state of Missouri said: "A passenger on a freight train takes it with all the incidentals usual in the operation of such a train, and submits himself to the inconveniences, and assumes the perils ordinarily attending such method of transportation; but by consenting to carry passengers on such trains the responsibility of the railroad for their safe transportation is not restricted or lessened, and the same degree of care is required in the management of a freight train carrying passengers as in the operation of a train exclusively for passenger service. In the words of Justice Swayne, 'Life and limb are as valuable, and there is the same right to safety in the caboose as in the palace car.' Indianapolis, etc., R. Co. v. Horst, 93 U. S. 296, 23 L. Ed. 898. But in the language approved in many of the decisions upon the subject, from the composition of freight trains and the appliances necessary in their operation there cannot, in the nature of things, be the same immunity from peril in travelling by freight trains as there is by passenger trains. The primary purpose of such trains is the transportation of freight, and the equipments, therefore, are adapted to such business; and such of the traveling public as elect to journey by freight trains are charged with the knowledge of such fact. It is not to be expected that there will be the same exactness in drawing up to a station by a freight train as by a train devoted to passenger service; and precisely the same degree of care exercised in the operation of both may produce different results respecting the safety of the passengers from the dangers inseparably connected with the conduct of one train, and not with the other, and this the public presumably understands, and conducts itself accordingly, and such inherent hazards the passenger is held to assume in taking a freight train." In case of Erwin v. K., Ft. S. & M. R. Ry. Co., 94 Mo. App. 289, 68 S. W. 90, is to the same effect.

In the case of Olds v. N. Y., etc., Railroad, 172 Mass. 77, 51 N. E. 451, it is said: "It is the duty of a carrier of passengers to exercise the utmost care consistent with the nature of the carrier's undertaking, and with a due regard for all the other matters which ought to be considered in conducting the business. * * * If the business of a given line is the running of trains for freight with a car attached for passengers, the care required is such as ought to be exercised in running such trains."

In the case of Railroad Co. v. Arnol, 144 Ill. 261, 33 N. E. 204, 19 L. R. A. 315, it is said: "But it is insisted that the rule announced in these cases has no application here, for the reason that appellee, having voluntarily taken passage upon a freight train, assumed all risks incident to the operation of such train in the usual and ordinary manner in which such trains are managed and operated. Persons taking passage upon freight trains, or in a caboose or car attached to a freight train, cannot expect or require the conveniences, or all of the safeguards against danger, that they may demand upon trains devoted to passenger service, and are accordingly held to have accepted the accommodation provided by the company, subject to all of the ordinary inconveniences, delays, and hazards incident to such trains when made up and equipped in the ordinary manner of making up and equipping such trains, and managed with proper care and skill. The passenger has a right to presume that the train is thus made up and equipped, and that the cars, machinery, and appliances are not, of their kind, so materially defective as to increase the ordinary hazards of transportation by such trains. He may take the train or not at his option; and if he voluntarily selects such a train, he should be, and is, held to have accepted it in discharge of the liability of the carrier to provide a safer and better mode of conveyance, and to have assumed the risk and inconvenience incident to its proper management and operation. But, if a railway company consents to carry passengers for hire by such trains, the general rule of its responsibility for their safe carriage is not otherwise relaxed. From the composition of such a train, and the appliances necessarily used in its efficient operation, there cannot, in the nature of things, be the same immunity from peril in traveling by freight train as there is by passenger train; but the same degree of care can be exercised in the operation of each. The result in respect of the safety of the passenger may be wholly different because of the inherent hazards incident to the operation of one train and not to the other, and it is this hazard or peril arising from the negligence or want of proper care of those in charge of it. Ordinarily carriers of passengers for hire, while not insurers of absolute safe carriage, are held to the exercise of the highest degree of care, skill, and diligence practically consistent with the efficient use and operation of the mode of transportation adopted."

In the case of Dunn v. Grand Trunk Railway, 58 Me. 197, 4 Am. Rep. 267, it is said: "Undoubtedly a passenger taking a freight train takes it with the increased risks and diminution of comfort incident thereto, and if it is managed with the care requisite for such trains, it is all those who embark in it have a right to demand. * * * That a passenger takes all the risks incident to the mode of travel, and the character of the means of conveyance which he selects, the party furnishing the conveyance being only required to adapt the proper care, vigilance, and skill to that particular means, for this, and this only, was the defendant responsible. The passengers can only expect such security as the mode of conveyance affords." See, also, McGee v. M. P. Ry. Co., 92 Mo. 208, 4 S. W. 739, 1 Am. St. Rep. 706; O. & M. Ry. Co. v. Dickerson, 59 Ind. 322; Whitehead v. St. L. & I. M. R. R., 99 Mo. 263, 11 S. W. 751, 6 L. R. A. 409; Dodge v. B. & B. Steamship Co., 148 Mass. 207, 19 N. E. 373, 2 L. R. A. 83, 12 Am. St. Rep. 541.

The trial court may have given these instructions upon the supposition that the language used included all the conditions above suggested. In the case from which the instruction was taken the court doubtless so understood it. But we think as an instruction to a jury the language is misleading and likely to give the jury an erroneous idea of the law applicable to such cases when used without modification or explanation as was done in this case.

The judgment is reversed, with direction to grant a new trial, and proceed with the case in accordance with the views herein expressed.

PIERCE v. ADAMS.

(Supreme Court of Kansas. Jan. 11, 1908.)

1. TAXATION—TAX SALE—REDEMPTION.

A landowner has three years from the day of sale, and any additional time which may elapse until the tax deed is executed, in which to redeem from a sale for taxes.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 45, Taxation, § 1402.]

2. SAME.

If the tax deed be executed on the last day of the three-year period for redemption, the landowner has no additional time after that day in which to redeem.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 45, Taxation, §§ 1402-1405.]

3. SAME—VOID TAX DEED—RIGHTS OF GRANTEE.

Such a tax deed, although void on its face as a conveyance, vests in the grantee the lien for taxes.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 45, Taxation, § 1630.]

4. SAME—REDEMPTION—TENDER.

After three years from the day of sale have elapsed, and the tax deed has been executed, a tender to the county treasurer of the amount necessary to redeem the land is unavailing to prevent the grantee from taking out a second deed to correct defects in the first one.

5. SAME—TAX DEED—SUBSEQUENT TAXES.

The clause in the statutory form for a tax deed relating to the payment of subsequent taxes by the purchaser should be inserted in a deed based upon a sale to the county and an assignment of the certificate, only when the purchaser has paid taxes subsequent to the assignment of the certificate.

6. SAME—CONTENTS OF DEED.

A tax deed which recites a sale to the county, and an assignment of the tax sale certificate, need not give a separate statement of the amount of taxes for each year, if there be more than one, which make up the consideration for the assignment. The statutory form merely requires that a gross sum, which equals the amount necessary to redeem, be stated.

7. SAME—IMPEACHMENT.

If the recitals of a tax deed which has been of record less than five years do not themselves impeach its validity, evidence is necessary to overthrow it. An assumption of something which may or may not be true will not be indulged to defeat it.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Benson, J., dissenting.

Error from District Court, Meade County;
E. H. Madison, Judge.

Action by S. W. Pierce against H. G. Adams. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Peters & Peters, for plaintiff in error.
Sutton & Scates and Albert Watkins, for defendant in error.

BURCH, J. The plaintiff commenced an action to quiet his title against two tax deeds. The first one was issued on September 4, 1904, the last day of the three-year period for redemption, and consequently was void on its face as an instrument conveying title. On May 22, 1905, the plaintiff tendered to the county treasurer the amount necessary to redeem, if redemption by payment to the treasurer were then permissible. On June 6, 1905, the tax deed holder procured a second deed to correct the defect in the other. Judgment was rendered for the tax deed holder, and the plaintiff prosecutes error.

The tender to the county treasurer was unavailing. Section 7662, Gen. St. 1901, reads as follows: "Any owner, his agent or attorney, may at any time within three years from the day of the sale, and at any time before the execution of the deed, redeem any land or town lot or any part thereof or interest thereon." This statute allows the landowner three full years from the day of sale within which to redeem, and as much additional time as may elapse before the deed is executed. In the case of English v. Williamson, 34 Kan. 212, 215, 8 Pac. 214, 215, it is said: "It will be seen from these quotations from the tax law that the owner of the land has, under any circumstances, at least 'three years from the day of sale,' and 'any time before the execution of the deed,' within which to redeem his land from the taxes." Here the plaintiff had the three years' time, which could not be diminished, but no additional time because the deed had been executed.

It is argued that, since the county clerk has no authority to issue a tax deed before the period of redemption expires, the deed was no deed, and the right to redemption was not cut off. The statute does not say that the owner may redeem within three years, and at any time before the execution of a valid deed, or before the execution of a deed good on its face, but simply at any time before the execution of "the deed." The deed which was issued cannot be ignored as a tax deed. It was not an absolute nullity. It was only void as a transfer of title. If the defendant had taken possession of the land under the deed, he would not have been a trespasser. In the case of Cohen v. St. L., Ft. S. & W. R. Co., 34 Kan. 158, 166, 8 Pac. 133, 143, 55 Am. Rep. 242, it was said: "But even if void, still a person holding the possession of land under a void tax deed is not a trespasser, but may make improvements on the land, and may recover compensation from the paramount owner for such improvements under the occupying claimant law." In the case of Redden v. Tefft, 48 Kan. 302, 29 Pac. 157, the syllabus reads: "A tax deed, void upon its face, gives, under the statutes of this state, to a person in the possession of real estate thereunder, but who has made lasting and valuable improvements and paid taxes thereon, rights and equities." The decisions in Stebbins v. Guthrie, 4 Kan. 353, and Smith v. Smith, 15 Kan. 290, are of the same tenor. A tax deed, void on its face as a conveyance, is still sufficient to transfer the lien for taxes to the grantee. Such is the fair implication from the decisions in English v. Williamson, 34 Kan. 212, 8 Pac. 214, and Cable v. Coates, Assignee, 36 Kan. 191, 12 Pac. 931, both of which involved tax deeds issued before the three-year period of redemption had expired. The fact that the defect arises from a lack of power in some one of the tax officials does not affect the principle. The county treasurer has no authority to sell an undivided interest in land for delinquent taxes. Such a sale is invalid, and a deed showing such a sale is void on its face, and passes no title to the purchaser. Corbin v. Inslee, 24 Kan. 154. But such a deed carries with it a lien for the taxes. In Auld v. McAllister, 43 Kan. 162, 23 Pac. 163, the syllabus reads: "A tax-title holder who seeks to recover the possession of an undivided half of three quarter sections of land by an action of ejectment against the original owner, and is defeated in such action, is entitled to be paid by the successful claimant the amount of the taxes, together with the proper charges, interest, and costs paid by him to procure his invalid tax deed. And such taxes, interest, costs, and charges are a lien upon the land until they are paid by the owner, or some person liable therefor."

The tax deed must therefore be reckoned with. The county clerk could not by executing it diminish the three-year period for redemption; but after that time had elapsed, a tax deed having been executed, the treasurer could no longer receive the redemption money. The county no longer held the lien for taxes, and the tender should have been made to the defendant to forestall the execution of a second deed. "The holder of the tax deed was the proper party to receive the tender. The money was due to him. He had paid the county. No further duty was cast upon any county officer." Herzog v. Gregg, 23 Kan. 726. Of course, when the second deed was executed, all rights of the defendant merged in it. The second tax deed recited a sale to the county in 1900 for the taxes of 1899 for the sum of $8.69. It further recited an assignment of the certificate of sale by the county clerk on February 28, 1903, for $26.31, the cost of redemption at that time. The clause in the statutory form to be used when subsequent taxes have been paid was altogether omitted. The consideration for the conveyance was given as $26.31, the taxes, costs, and interest due on the land for the years 1899, 1900, and 1901 "to the treasurer paid as aforesaid." No evidence was introduced to impeach the deed in any respect, and its validity is to be determined from what appears upon its face.

It is said the failure to fill the blanks in the omitted clause of the form makes the deed void, the argument apparently being that the subsequent taxes there mentioned are all those accruing after the sale. Such, however, is not the meaning of the form. The blank is left for the insertion of taxes paid by the purchaser subsequent to the assignment of the tax-sale certificate to him. There being no evidence that the purchaser in this case paid any taxes after he obtained the certificate of sale, there is nothing to show the clause was improperly omitted.

It is claimed the deed is void because it nowhere makes a separate statement of the amount of the taxes for the years 1900 and 1901, which entered into the consideration for the assignment of the certificate of sale. In this respect the deed follows the statutory form. The form makes no provision for a separate statement of the taxes for each year, which make up the consideration for the assignment of the certificate of sale. Only a gross sum, which equals the amount necessary to redeem at that time, is to be given.

It is further claimed the deed is invalid because the correct consideration is not stated. The plaintiff founds his argument upon an assumption that the taxes for 1899, 1900, and 1901 were practically the same in amount. There was no evidence to that effect, and consequently the deed is not proved to be incorrect. If the recitals of a tax deed do not themselves impeach its validity, evidence is necessary to overthrow it. An assumption of something which may or may not be true will not be indulged to defeat it.

Finally, it is said the lien of the certificate of sale was lost before the second deed was executed. As already shown the lien was preserved by the first deed. Besides this the second deed was executed within four years from the date of sale, and hence, according to the statute, was in time. Gen. St. 1901, § 7714. But if the second deed had not been executed until after the four-year period had elapsed, the lien still would have been preserved. Geer v. Thrasher, 37 Kan. 657, 16 Pac. 94.

The judgment of the district court was correct, and is affirmed.

(77 Kan. 92)

MAURER v. MILLER et al.

(Supreme Court of Kansas. Jan. 11, 1908.)

LIMITATION OF ACTIONS—COMMENCEMENT OF PROCEEDINGS—WILLS—CONTEST—INTERVENTION.

A proceeding to contest a will commenced within two years after probate inures to the benefit of a party who intervenes after the statutory period, and the statute of limitations is not available as a defense to the intervening petition.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 33, Limitation of Actions, § 541.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from District Court, Miami County; Alpheus Lane, Judge pro tem.

Action by Jacob Miller against Margaret Standing and others. Harriet A. Maurer filed a petition in intervention. A demurrer to the petition was sustained, and intervenor brings error. Reversed.

L. S. Harvey and Charles Maurer, for plaintiff in error. S. J. Sheldon, for defendant in error.

PORTER, J. On the 6th day of August, 1902, the probate court of Miami county probated the will of Jacob F. Miller, deceased, and appointed William Standing as executor. The will devised all of the testator's estate to William Standing, Addie Nichols, Josephine Savage, and John T. Haight in certain portions named therein. Afterward, on the 13th day of March, 1903, Jacob Miller, claiming to be one of the heirs at law of the deceased, brought this action in the district court to contest the will, claiming that the testator was of unsound mind and under the undue influence of defendants at the time the will was executed. The case has never been brought to trial, and is still pending in the district court. One of the defendants, William Standing, died, and the suit was revived. His widow as his sole heir and executrix, and William Crowell, administrator de bonis non with the will annexed of Jacob F. Miller, deceased, were made defendants. While the suit was still undetermined, and on December 16, 1905, Harriet A. Maurer, plaintiff in error, filed in the action a motion to be allowed to intervene and set up her rights as an heir at law of Jacob F. Miller, deceased. This motion was allowed, and she filed her intervening petition. A demurrer was sustained to this, and afterward an amended intervening petition was filed in which she alleges that she is an heir at law of Jacob F. Miller, deceased, and interested in the subject-matter, and the rights, title, and interest of defendants in the action are adverse to her rights. She then sets up the same grounds for contesting the will that are alleged in the petition of Jacob Miller, the original plaintiff. She also alleges that she resides at Cedar Rapids, Iowa, and that she did not learn of the death of said Jacob F. Miller, the testator, nor of the pretended will, until two years after the will had been probated. The defendants in the action demurred to this intervening petition, on the ground that the statute of limitations requiring an action to contest a will to be brought within two years from the time the will is probated barred her cause of action. The court sustained the demurrer, and this is alleged as the sole ground of error.

The question is therefore sharply presented whether an action begun before the bar of the statute falls will inure to the benefit of a party who intervenes after the time when the action would be barred. In the brief of defendants in error, it is assumed that the ruling upon the demurrer was correct. No reasons are suggested or argument offered in support of it; and no authorities are cited upon the proposition. Plaintiff in error relies upon the case of Lyons v. Berlau, 67 Kan. 426, 73 Pac. 52, where a question somewhat similar was decided. That was an action to contest a will, and one of the devisees who was friendly to the contestor afterwards joined in the suit to have the will annulled, and was not made a party until two years after the will was probated. It was held that the bringing in of such party was permissible, and that the prosecution of the action thereafter was not affected by the statute of limitations. In the present case it is conceded that the main action can still be prosecuted; the only contention being that the cause of action belonging to the intervener is barred. There is no discussion of the question in the opinion in Lyons v. Berlau, and the only authority referred to is Hucklebridge v. Railway Co., 66 Kan. 443, 71 Pac. 814. There the sole question decided is that, where an amendment simply adds the name of a party plaintiff and does not substantially change the claim of plaintiff, the statute is not available as a defense. The same doctrine was declared in Service v. Bank, 62 Kan. 857, 62 Pac. 670, where it is said in the opinion: "If the substituted party had introduced a new claim and cause of action by the amendment against which the statute of limitations had then run, the defense would have been available." To the same effect see 25 Cyc. 1303, 1304, and cases cited. The principle declared by this court in the cases cited, supra, has a pertinent application to the present case. The intervener sets up no new cause of action or claim against defendants, but relies upon the same grounds to defeat the will which were alleged in the original petition. To the same effect, see Suber v. Chandler, 38 S. C. 344, 15 S. E. 426; Becnel v. Waguespack, 40 La. 109, 3 South. 536. In 25 Cyc. 1301, it is said: "A suit brought before the bar of limitation is complete will inure to the benefit of one intervening after the time when but for the commencement of the suit the claim would be barred"—citing Becnel v. Waguespack, supra; Foot v. O'Rourke, 59 Tex. 215; Field v. Gantier, 8 Tex. 74. The two Texas cases referred to in the note are cited by plaintiff in error. Both were actions upon promissory notes, and the intervener in each case claimed an interest in the note. It was held that, as the cause of action was not changed, the intervener took the cause as he found it, and that the statute was no defense. The author of Cyc. further says in the same paragraph: "According to some decisions, however, intervention will not have this effect, when no privity of estate or community of interest exists between the parties." In the present case it is apparent that a community or privity of interest does exist between the intervener and the other parties.

The law favors and our Code makes ample provision for the intervention of parties who have or claim an interest in the subject-matter of the controversy. Section 42, Code Civ. Proc.; Section 4470, Gen. St. 1901. A suit to contest a will is a proceeding in rem. The court acquires jurisdiction of the res, and its decree affects the interest therein of all parties who, in fact, have an interest in it. 17 A. & E. Enc. of Law, 185; Coleman v. Martin, 6 Blatchf. (U. S.) 119, Fed. Cas. No. 2,085. In the present case, if the decree finally entered should adjudge the will to be invalid, it would inure to the benefit of plaintiff in error. No decree the court could enter could fail to affect her rights. For this reason, she has the right to intervene and to prosecute the suit to its end, regardless of what the original plaintiff may do. Her right to recover does not depend solely upon his right to maintain the action. Pending the final determination, he may see fit to abandon the suit, or he may be found to have no right to maintain it for the reason that he is estopped by having accepted under the will, or some other obstacle may stand in the way of his maintaining the suit; but, if the grounds for setting aside the will alleged in his petition are established, the intervener may upon the same grounds maintain the action. The intervener takes the suit as he finds it. He is not permitted to change the form of the action or the issues, or to raise a new one. But his right to maintain the action after intervention "cannot be defeated by the dismissal of the plaintiff of the original suit, nor by the plaintiff's being nonsuited." 17 A. & E. Enc. of Law, 185.

A case squarely in point is Bradford v. Andrews, 20 Ohio St. 208, 5 Am. Rep. 645. There the proceedings to contest a will were commenced within the statutory time. Only a part of the persons interested were made parties, and it was held that the right of action was saved as to all who were ultimately made parties, notwithstanding some of them were not brought into the case until after the period of the statute of limitations had expired. In the opinion it is said: "The interest of the parties is joint and inseparable. Substantially this is a proceeding in rem, and the court cannot take jurisdiction of the subject-matter by fractions. The will is indivisible, and the verdict of the jury either establishes it as a whole or wholly sets it aside. To save the right of action, therefore, to one, is necessary to save it to all. The case belongs to that class of actions where the law is compelled either to hold the rights of all parties in interest to be saved or all to be barred. And it seems not to be quite well-settled law that the preference will in such cases be given to the right of action, and not to the right of limitation. The right to sue is a favored right, and it is guaranteed by constitutional provision, while the right of limitation generally meets with more or less disfavor." The commencement of the original suit within two years from the probate of the will inured to the benefit of the intervener, and the statute of limitations therefore furnished no defense to the intervening petition.

The judgment is reversed, with directions to overrule the demurrer.

GREENTREE v. WALLACE, Sheriff.

(Supreme Court of Kansas. Jan. 11, 1908.)

1. WRIT OF ERROR—DISMISSAL—INSUFFICIENT RECORD.

A motion to dismiss an error proceeding in this court will not be sustained, for the reason that the evidence is not brought up to show there was not an entire failure of proof of some other fact essential to appellant's recovery below, where it appears from the record that the lower court decided the case upon a certain theory of law applied to certain specific facts found which were decisive of its judgment.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, § 2913.]

2. REPLEVIN—WHEN LIES—PROPERTY IN CUSTODIA LEGIS.

Where intoxicating liquors and other property are seized upon a warrant issued upon the provisions of section 2494, Gen. St. 1901, and are held by the officer who served the warrant pending a hearing under section 2495, Id., the owner cannot maintain an action in replevin against the officer to recover the possession of such property. The property is in the custody of the law, and must there remain until final action is had upon the complaint upon which the seizure was made.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 42, Replevin, §§ 27-37.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from District Court, Mitchell County; R. M. Pickler, Judge.

Action in replevin by Harry Greentree against G. W. Wallace, sheriff. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

An information was filed by the county attorney in the district court of Mitchell county charging one Cleevellin and his wife with the crime of maintaining a common nuisance, in violation of the prohibitory liquor law, particularly describing the place. Also the information charged Cleevellin and wife with keeping large quantities of several specified kinds of intoxicating liquors in certain specified receptacles for the purpose of illegal sale. In short, all the usual and necessary averments in such an information were made for the arrest of the Cleevellins, and for a search of the premises, and for the seizure of the articles. A warrant was accordingly issued, and the Cleevellins were arrested, and the liquors and articles involved in this action were found on the premises, and taken and held by the sheriff. On August 12, 1905, the plaintiff in error filed his petition in replevin in the same court to recover from the sheriff, Wallace, the liquors and articles seized, alleging that he was the owner and entitled to the immediate possession thereof. The sheriff answered, setting up two defenses: First, a general denial; and, second, that the property was in the custody of the law. Attached as exhibits to the answer were copies of the information and warrant, with the return of the sheriff thereon, and also a copy of a notice issued by the clerk, August 11, 1905, for a hearing as to rights of property in the articles seized. To this answer Greentree replied by a general denial. Upon the issues thus formed a trial was had, of which the record recites: "A jury was waived by the parties, and the cause came on for hearing before the court. After hearing the evidence and the arguments of counsel and being fully advised in the premises, the court finds that the defendant herein was at the time the property described in plaintiff's petition was seized, and at the commencement of this action, sheriff of Mitchell county, Kan., and that at commencement of this action said property was in the custody of said defendant as said sheriff by virtue of a warrant duly issued out of this court in the case of State of Kansas v. John W. Cleevellin and Caroline Cleevellin. The said property consisted of 309 cases of bottled beer, 19 cases filled with empty bottles, and 2 cases partially filled with bottled beer. The said property was seized by the said defendant as such sheriff, and held by him at the commencement of this action under the provisions of sections 2493, 2494, and 2495 of the General Statutes of 1901, and that the plaintiff had no right to question said warrant in this action. "It is therefore considered, ordered, and adjudged by the court that the plaintiff cannot maintain this action, and that this case be dismissed, and that the defendant have judgment for costs, assessed at $——."

Kagey & Anderson, for plaintiff in error.
F. S. Jackson, Atty. Gen., J. E. Tice, Ira N. Tice (Coddling & Marshall, of counsel), for defendant in error.

SMITH, J. (after stating the facts as above). The defendant in error moves to dismiss the appeal here on the grounds that the court below found the issues in his favor upon evidence, and the evidence is not brought up; only a transcript of the record being here. In support of this motion it is said the court below found generally in favor of the defendant, and, for aught the record shows, the plaintiff failed to prove his alleged right of possession to the property; that all reasonable inferences should be indulged to support the judgment. Had the court simply found the issues in the case in favor of the plaintiff, this rule would be applicable. Not so in this case. The issues herein consisted of an assertion of the plaintiff of his right of possession and the unlawful detention of the property by the defendant. The defendant denied plaintiff's claims generally, and as a special defense asserted that his possession of the property was as an officer of the law, on the order of the court; that the property was in custodia legis, and in support thereof exhibited the court files in the case of State of Kansas v. Cleavelin et al. The finding and decision of the court is based entirely upon this special defense, and, as the plaintiff in error makes no contention that the facts upon which this defense was based were not supported by the evidence, he had no occasion to bring up the evidence. The motion to dismiss is overruled.

The question remaining, which determines the case, is whether, under the facts found by the court as to the nature of defendant's possession of the property, the plaintiff could maintain replevin therefor, assuming that the plaintiff had full ownership and the defendant had no personal right thereto. In other words, when the state is proceeding to abate an alleged nuisance in a legal manner and seizes personal property which from its alleged use constitutes a nuisance, can an owner of the property litigate the right of possession thereto with the sheriff, the arm of the court, and thus forestall a possible order of the court to destroy the property as a nuisance? We think the court correctly answered the question. True, as contended by the plaintiff, Code, § 266, assures to either party, in an action for the specific recovery of personal property, the right of trial by a jury.

But the question here involved is not solely one of the right of possession as between individuals, and, if it were the only question, the above statute has no higher standing than another statute prescribing a different procedure. Statutes apparently conflicting are to be construed together, and each given effect, if possible. Where, as in this case, two entirely different procedures are provided by statute for adjudicating a certain right or claim of right, which procedures are inconsistent and irreconcilable, but where one procedure is general and applicable to a class of claims under many varying circumstances, while the other is specific and applicable only to a specific relation of the parties or to a controversy arising under specific circumstances, the specific procedure should be held applicable in exclusion of the other. The provisions of Civ. Code, § 266, apply to replevin actions generally. The provisions of section 2495, Gen. St. 1901, are specific as to the particular class of property in this action and the trial there provided for is to determine whether or not the property as used at the time of filing the information was a common nuisance. The provision is: "All persons claiming an interest therein may appear and answer the complaint against such intoxicating liquors."

It was held in the case of In re Massey, 56 Kan. 120, 42 Pac. 365, that one claiming to own property which had been seized under the provisions of the prohibitory liquor law then (1905) in force could "maintain an action in replevin before another court of competent jurisdiction against the officer for the purpose of determining his right to the property," etc. This decision was expressly based upon the absence of any provision, in the nuisance statute, for a hearing as to the rights of property in the court where the criminal action was pending. This omission has since been supplied in the act known as the "Hurrell Law," enacted in 1901. Moreover, the language copied from the syllabus in the Massey Case, supra, is misleading. The question in that case was whether the officer who seized the liquors in the criminal action and had them in his possession was guilty of contempt in refusing to deliver them to another officer who demanded them under a writ of replevin issued to him by another court, and the decision held him guilty of such contempt. So the decision in that case was not that on the final hearing of his replevin action the owner of the liquors should prevail, as claimed in this case, but that the owner had a right to bring his action, and to have the writ issued therein served and obeyed. The words "B. may maintain an action," as generally used mean, "B. may successfully maintain an action," but such is not the meaning in that case.

As before said, the question involved in this replevin is not solely the relative rights of the owner and of Wallace as an individual to the possession of the property in question.

Information had been filed charging that the property, as used, was a common nuisance. A warrant had been issued, and the property had, so to speak, been arrested on this charge, and the sheriff, as required by law, was holding it in his custody until such time as the court should determine under a speedy procedure provided by law whether the property was, so to speak, innocent, and should be returned, or whether it was guilty, and should be annihilated, spiritually at least. It is a proceeding in rem, and, while it is pending in due and orderly course, the owner of the property should not be allowed to intervene, except to "answer the complaint against such intoxicating liquors," as provided in section 2495, supra. The property was in custodia legis, and the proceeding against it was in rem. State v. McManus, 65 Kan. 720, 70 Pac. 700; Karr v. Stahl, 75 Kan. 387, 89 Pac. 689; 17 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law, 304, 23 Cyc. 298. The proceeding is due process of law.

The plaintiff urges that the notice in the condemnation proceeding was not properly addressed, and not properly served. It should have been addressed to the defendants "and to all persons claiming any interest in the intoxicating liquors or other property." It was addressed to the defendants, but the words quoted above from the statute were omitted. It was served according to law. We think the words omitted from the address did not render the notice void. It was simply irregular, and there is no showing that the plaintiff did not have actual notice of the time and place of hearing. He is presumed to know the law that a notice of the time and place of the hearing would be issued within 48 hours after the return of the warrant. He knew his goods had been seized, and by whom, as he very promptly commenced his action in replevin therefor. He was bound to know that he was entitled to a hearing before the court without instituting another action. He evidently sought to bring a more favorable form of action. We hold he was not entitled to supersede the proceeding already pending.

The judgment is affirmed.

SNIDER et al. v. WINDSOR et al.

(Supreme Court of Kansas. Jan. 11, 1908.)

1. APPEAL—TRANSCRIPT OF RECORD.

Where a case is brought to this court on a transcript of the record, such transcript should contain everything that is part of the record.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, § 2627.]

2. PLEADING—AMENDMENTS.

Amendments of pleadings may be allowed in furtherance of justice when such amendments do not substantially change the cause of action or defense. This change does not refer to the form of the remedy, but to the general identity of the transaction.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 39, Pleading, §§ 600, 630, 637.]

3. APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR.

Any error in allowing an amendment which does not affect the substantial rights of the complaining party is not a sufficient ground of reversal.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, §§ 4100-4109.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from District Court, Kingman County; P. B. Gillette, Judge.

Action by Charles A. Windsor and others against John Snider and Ella F. Snider. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendants bring error. Affirmed.

J. Q. Jenkins, C. C. Calkins, and C. W. Fairchild, for plaintiffs in error. S. D. La Fuze and Geo. L. Hay, for defendants in error.

BENSON, J. This proceeding is upon a transcript of the record. A motion is made to dismiss on the grounds that the transcript is not complete, that all the necessary parties are not before the court, and because the certificate is insufficient. The plaintiffs in error have asked leave to amend the transcript by inserting certain parts of the record which appear to have been omitted by the clerk.

The transcript is imperfect and confusing in its arrangement, and even with the amendments proposed it is doubtful whether it will be complete. The transcript should contain everything that is a part of the record, and what the record consists of is pointed out in section 417 of the Code. Neiswender v. James, 41 Kan. 403, 21 Pac. 573; Com'rs of Elk County v. Scott, 51 Kan. 139, 32 Pac. 919; Cook v. Challiss, 55 Kan. 363, 40 Pac. 643. We have concluded, however, to consider this transcript as amended, as requested, and for the purposes of review in this case to consider it sufficient. The original petition alleged the execution of certain promissory notes by the defendants, who are plaintiffs in error here, and chattel mortgages to secure their payment, averred default in such payments, and prayed for a judgment for the amount due, upon the notes, and for the sale of the mortgaged property to satisfy such judgment. The petition was filed September 8, 1905. On the same day, the plaintiffs filed an affidavit for replevin of the property described in the petition and in the mortgages, and an order of replevin was issued thereon, and the property taken by the sheriff and afterwards delivered to the plaintiffs, except certain animals which were returned to the defendants by the plaintiffs' order. On September 11, 1905, the defendants filed their answer, not verified, containing a general denial, allegations of payment, and an averment of the tender of $1,500 in satisfaction of the claims of the plaintiffs. On the same day defendants filed their motion to set aside the writ of replevin on the grounds that it had been improvidently issued, that no petition in replevin had been filed, and that the affidavit was insufficient to show special ownership in the plaintiffs. At the same time plaintiffs presented an application for leave to file an amended petition. Both motions were heard at the same time. On the same day, December 11, 1905, leave was given to file the amended petition, and the motion to quash the writ was overruled. Thereupon the plaintiffs filed an amended petition setting up a cause of action in replevin for the same property described in the original petition, alleging default in payment, demand for the property, the refusal thereof, and the unlawful detention by the defendants after such refusal, and praying for judgment for possession. A motion was made by the defendants to strike this amended petition from the file, for the reasons that it changed the cause of action from one in equity to one at law, and from a petition on contract to one in tort, and that it sought to confer jurisdiction in replevin which the original petition did not do. This motion was overruled, and the defendants elected to stand upon their answer filed to the original petition. On the 6th day of March, 1906, the cause was tried, and the jury returned a verdict in the usual form in replevin, finding that the plaintiffs had a special ownership in the property of the value of $1,900.81, being the amount due on the mortgages at the time the action was brought, that the plaintiffs were entitled to the immediate possession of the property, and that the defendants wrongfully detained the same. The jury also answered numerous special questions showing credits upon the notes for payments made at different times, the allowance of extensions, and other matters appropriate in an accounting to determine the amount due upon the securities. No damages were allowed for detaining the property. Thus it appears that, while this was commenced as an action to foreclose the mortgages, it proceeded, after the amendment, as an action in replevin for the same property, terminating in finding the amount due upon the mortgages, and a judgment for the return of the property or for the value of the special ownership, in the ordinary form.

The defendants did not ask for the imposition of terms on the allowance of the amendment, and the trial did not take place until about three months after the amendment. There is no suggestion that defendants were unprepared to try the issue finally presented, or that such trial resulted in any hardship or wrong. The plaintiffs, however, appear to have excepted to an order of the court allowing the withdrawal of the tender asked by the defendants, which order was affirmed in this court. Windsor v. Snider (Kan.) 90 Pac. 820. It must be conceded that such an amendment was not in the ordinary course of practice, but it does not appear to have affected the substantial rights of the defendants. If no amendment had been allowed, the same accounting would have been proper, the same finding of the amount due, and an order for the sale of the property would have been made. The plaintiffs having obtained possession by this action, the defendants may have the property so sold. Section 4253, Gen. St. 1901. The Code abolishes the forms of actions, provides that the petition shall state the facts constituting the cause of action, and that causes of action, whether heretofore denominated legal or equitable, or both, may be united where they arise out of the same transaction, or transactions connected with the same subject of action, and, further, that amendments may be made in furtherance of justice, which do not substantially change the cause of action. The cause of action here was the default of the defendants in keeping the conditions of the chattel mortgages. By reason of these defaults the plaintiff might have maintained a suit for foreclosure, or in replevin. The transaction to be investigated on the trial was the same whichever form of remedy was sought. When this identity remains, the amendment does not substantially change the cause of action. Bogle v. Gordon, 39 Kan. 31, 17 Pac. 857; Spice & Son v. Stehruck, 14 Ohio St. 213. This change does not refer to the form of the remedy, but to the general identity of the transaction. Thus it was held in Culp v. Steere, 47 Kan. 746, 28 Pac. 987, that a petition founded in tort for false representations in the sale of a horse could be properly amended so as to include a claim upon an express warranty upon the contract of sale. Where a petition alleged fraudulent representations, and prayed for the rescission of a contract induced thereby, an amendment whereby damages were claimed for breach of the same contract was held proper. Stevens v. Matthewson, 45 Kan. 594, 26 Pac. 38. In that case the original petition disaffirmed, and the amendment affirmed, the contract, but the transaction to be judicially examined remained the same. The plaintiff first sought to have the mortgage foreclosed, and thus make his security available. Later, by amendment, he sought to recover possession of the same property under the same mortgages for the same purpose. Can it be said that this substantially changed the cause of action? If, however, we should concede that the allowance of the amendment was technically erroneous, still the substantial rights of the defendants were not affected thereby. The issue between the parties appears to have been fully and fairly tried, and no complaint is made of the final result. In this situation the language of Mr. Justice Burch in Hopkinson v. Conley, 75 Kan. 65, 88 Pac. 549, is pertinent: "If it be conceded that the rules of procedure have been violated in this case, the judgment cannot for that reason alone be overturned. The Legislature has enjoined upon this court the duty of looking beyond defects and errors in pleadings and proceedings to ascertain if they did, in fact, affect the substantial rights of the party complaining of them. Fixed rules are to be observed and enforced, but not merely for the purpose of vindicating them. Harm must result from a wrong decision or it cannot be reversed." "The court, in every stage of action, must disregard any error or defect in the pleadings or proceedings which does not affect the substantial rights of the adverse party; and no judgment shall be reversed or affected by reason of such error or defect." Code, § 140; Gen. St. 1901, § 4574; Hopkinson v. Conley, 75 Kan. 65, 88 Pac. 549. The judgment is affirmed.

LAWRENCE v. WHEELER.

(Supreme Court of Kansas. Jan. 11, 1908.)

ELECTIONS—CONTEST — STATEMENT — DEMUR- BER.

A general charge in the statement of the contestor of a county election of error and mistake by the boards of judges in designated precincts in counting the ballots and by the board of canvassers in declaring the result is sufficient as against an attack by demurrer, and is not void for indefiniteness.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from District Court, Finney County; Chas. E. Lobdell, Judge.

Election contest between H. V. Lawrence and A. C. Wheeler. Judgment for defendant, and Lawrence brings error. Reversed and remanded.

A. M. Harvey and A. Hoskinson, for plaintiff in error. W. R. Hopkins and Richard J. Hopkins, for defendant in error.

BURCH, J. H. V. Lawrence instituted a contest for the office of county treasurer of Finney county against A. C. Wheeler. His statement was sufficient, unless it be with reference to the causes of contest. In that respect it reads as follows: "Said contestor further states that the said A. C. Wheeler, contestee, was not legally and lawfully elected, or chosen by a majority of the lawful votes cast at said election to be the county treasurer of Finney county, Kan., for the following reasons, to wit: For errors and mistakes of the boards of judges of election at said election, so held in the various voting precincts, to wit: First, Second, and Third Wards of the city of Garden City, Cherlock, Macks, Huffmans, Plymell, Pierceville, Pleasant Valley, Knauston, Eminence, and Ravanna—in counting the votes so cast at said election for the said office of county treasurer of Finney county, Kan. For errors and mistakes of the board of county commissioners of Finney county, Kan., acting as a board of canvassers of the votes cast at said election in declaring the result of said election in favor of the said A. C. Wheeler, contestee, for the said office of county treasurer of Finney county, Kan., at said election so held on the 6th day of November, 1906. That the boards of election judges in Pierceville and Macks precincts failed and neglected to account for, or return to the county clerk of Finney county, Kan., the number of ballots received by them from the said county clerk aforesaid prior to election. That the board of election judges in each of the aforesaid precincts failed to account for, or return to the county clerk of Finney county, Kan., the number of 'blank' ballots sealed up in an envelope as required by law, or the 'void' ballots or the ballots 'objected to,' as required by law inclosed in an envelope securely sealed and so marked and indorsed so as to clearly disclose its contents. That in said precincts, Pierceville and Macks, all ballots not used, and all ballots spoiled by the voters while attempting to vote, were not returned by the boards of judges of election in said two above-named precincts to the county clerk of Finney county, Kan., as required by law, the officers from whom all ballots were received. That the boards of election judges in said county in the following precincts, to wit: First, Second, and Third Wards in the city of Garden City, Sherlock, Macks, Huffmans, Plymell, Pierceville, Pleasant Valley, Knauston, Eminence, and Ravanna—failed to count for the contestor votes or ballots which were legally cast for him, and which were marked by said boards 'Blank,' 'Void,' and 'Objected to,' and 'Rejected.' That, on account of the above-mentioned errors, mistakes, and irregularities, a correct count of said votes cast in Finney county, Kan., on said 6th day of November, 1906, and a correct canvass of said votes, would affect the result of said election of county treasurer of Finney county, Kan., and that a correct count of the votes cast at the said several voting precincts so cast would affect the result of said election for the office of county treasurer, and that a correct count of the votes cast at said election on November 6, 1906, in Finney county, Kan., and a correct canvass of the votes so cast at said election would result in the election of said H. V. Lawrence, contestor, to the office of county treasurer of Finney county, Kan., at said election so held on the 6th day of November, 1906." The contestee demurred to the statement, but the demurrer was overruled. The contestee then filed an answer, to which the contestor replied, and the contest court proceeded to count the ballots. Various ballots were not counted for the contestor which he claimed should have been counted for him, and various ballots were counted for the contestee, to which the contestor objected. The ballots from two election precincts were not opened or counted. The contest court decided in favor of the contestee, and the contestor prosecuted proceedings in error in the district court. The district court declined to consider the principal errors alleged on the ground the statement did not specify with sufficient particularity the causes of contest, thereby virtually sustaining the demurrer which the contest court had overruled. The contestor prosecutes error in this court.

The district court adopted the rigorous rule approved by some courts and favored by some text-writers, which requires that the facts constituting the cause of contest must be pleaded in detail with particularity and precision, or the statement will not authorize the contest court to proceed or support a judgment in the contestor's favor. This rule rests in part upon the public policy which forbids speculative and groundless contests, and is supported by the argument that, if the contestor know of causes of contest, he can recite the facts, while, if he do not know, it is better that he should not be allowed to interfere.

The question is one of statutory interpretation; the Legislature having indicated what the public policy of this state demands by the procedure which it has prescribed. The remedy, so far as it relates to elections to county offices, is quite summary in character, and is designed to secure a speedy determination of the contest. The tribunal having jurisdiction to try the contest is an inferior one, having special and limited powers, and need not be composed of persons who are learned in the law or familiar with the arbitrary rules of pleadings in civil actions. The proceeding is not one for the benefit of candidates alone. It may be instituted by any elector of the county; the purpose being that the people's choice legally registered may be made to prevail upon the complaint of any of them. The contestor's statement is "a written statement of his intention to contest the election," and must set forth "the particular causes of contest." Gen. St. 1901, § 2659. The statute names causes for contest as follows: "First, for malconduct, fraud or corruption on the part of the judges of election in any township, or of any of the boards of canvassers, or on the part of any member of either of those boards. Second, when the contestee was not eligible to the office at the time of the election. Third, when the contestee has been convicted of an infamous crime before the election, and the judgment has not been reversed, annulled, or set aside, nor the contestee pardoned, at the time of the election. Fourth, when the contestee has given or offered any elector or any judge, clerk or canvasser of the election any bribe or reward, in money, property or thing of value, for the purpose of procuring his election. Fifth, when illegal votes have been received, or legal votes rejected, at the polls, sufficient to change the result. Sixth, for any error or mistake in any of the boards of judges or canvassers in counting or declaring the result of the election, if the error or mistake would affect the result. Seventh, for any other cause (though not enumerated above) which shows that another was the legally elected person." Gen. St. 1901, § 2655. In framing the law the Legislature considered specially the subject of certainty in stating causes of contest, but went no further than to make the following requirement: "When the reception of illegal or the rejection of legal votes is alleged as a cause of contest, the names of the persons who so voted, or whose votes were rejected, with the township where they voted or offered to vote, shall be set forth in the statement." Gen. St. 1901, § 2660. There is no provision for the forming of definite issues such as the Code of Civil Procedure contemplates. This court has held that pleadings in the nature of an answer and reply are proper in contest cases, and, if filed, they should be construed according to the ordinary rules applicable to such pleadings. Baker v. Long, 17 Kan. 341. It has also been decided that the contest should be heard and adjudicated upon the merits, and not disposed of upon technicalities. Buckland v. Goit, 23 Kan. 327. The case last cited is instructive. The statute provides that the contestee shall be informed of the contest by a notice served upon him which shall contain a brief statement of the causes of contest. Gen. St. 1901, § 2662. The notice did not contain this statement. The contestee appeared specially, and moved to dismiss. The proceeding was dismissed, and the district court sustained the ruling of the contest court. This court held the notice to be irregular only, and said: "At the time that this contest was dismissed, it was too late for the contestor to commence a new contest, and hence, if this dismissal were to be sustained, it would be a final determination of the case, and a final determination upon a pure technicality. This the law never encourages, and especially not where cases are to be tried before inferior tribunals, not skilled in the law. It is a dangerous thing for an inferior tribunal, not skilled in the law, to attempt to decide cases upon pure legal technicalities. Superior courts seldom attempt any such thing. And the law always encourages trials upon the merits, and never encourages final determinations upon mere technicalities of any kind." From the foregoing it is plain the Legislature did not ordain a severely technical and highly specialized system of procedure for the contest of county elections, but, instead, adopted a very simple and liberal one designed to facilitate inquiry into causes, which, if established, would vitiate the declared result, while at the same time affording due protection to the public, the party chiefly interested, and to claimants of offices. The courts are fond of quoting the following fine paragraph relating to pleadings in election contests contained in the opinion in the case of Mann v. Cassidy, 1 Brewst. (Pa.) 11, 27: "The rule must not be held so strict as to afford protection to fraud by which the will of the people is set at naught; nor so loose as to permit the acts of sworn officers, chosen by the people, to be inquired into without an adequate and well-defined cause." The illustrative and qualifying paragraph immediately preceding usually is not quoted. It reads as follows: "It is obvious that if the court were to require the same precision and certainty in an election petition as in the pleadings between parties to a suit at law, the object of which pleadings is to produce a single issue, the difficulty of stating precisely the manner in which a fraud has been perpetrated, or an undue return made, would, to a great degree, nullify the law itself, which designs that such charges shall be investigated." Taken together, the two paragraphs express a fair interpretation of the meaning and spirit of the Kansas statute.

In this case the contest court and the contestee were fairly advised of the causes of contest. The causes specified were not fraud, and corruption, the ineligibility of the contestee, the conviction of the contestee of an infamous crime, bribery, or the receiving of illegal votes; but errors and mistakes of the boards of judges in named precincts in counting the votes cast, errors and mistakes of the board of canvassers in declaring the result, and failure of the boards of judges in various named precincts to count certain described classes of ballots were specified. It is true that the ultimate fact of error and mistake was alleged in general terms, but this circumstance did not render the statement a nullity. If what was said were true, the contest was well founded, and the contest court was bound to investigate the charges. Even under the Code of Civil Procedure such an allegation will not render a pleading subject to demurrer. The adverse party may be entitled to a more definite and detailed statement of the facts, but his remedy is by motion, and not by demurrer. The following quotation from an early decision of this court construing a pleading attacking a tax deed is conclusive upon the question: "We think, however, the court below erred in sustaining said demurrer. We shall take the fourth reason given for the purpose of showing it, because said reason is the shortest, and because it is as material, and as well pleaded, as any of the others, and more so than the most of the others. It reads as follows: '(4) Said lots were not sold for taxes at the time and place required by law.' Now, if the lots were not sold at the time or place required by law, of course, the tax deed founded on such sale must necessarily be void. Of course, it must be admitted that this fact is not very well pleaded, but we think it is sufficiently pleaded to be good on general demurrer. If the defendant was not satisfied with this statement of facts, he might have required a more specific and definite statement thereof by a motion to have the petition in this respect made more definite and certain. Of course, the defendant had a right to know, from a specific allegation in the petition, whether the plaintiff claimed that the treasurer did not sell said property at the county seat, or whether he claimed that the place where the treasurer did sell the property was not the county seat (a mere county seat question), or whether he claimed that the treasurer did not sell at his office, or at the place where he advertised to sell, etc. The defendant also had a right to know from a specific allegation in the petition whether plaintiff claimed that the treasurer sold said property prior to the first Tuesday of May, or after the adjournment of the tax sale, at the time to be held, or at some other time not designated by law. In fact, the petition should have stated specifically (if insisted on in the proper way by the defendant) the time when, and the place where, said property was sold (and not merely the time when and the place where it was not sold), and all the facts connected with the sale, so that a precise and specific issue could have been made up by the pleadings. Such is the better mode of pleading; and such is the mode that must prevail when properly insisted on by the adverse party. When true and specific issues are made up by the pleadings, the parties may know in advance, and before a trial, just what they will have to prove, and what they will have to disprove. But a party, in order to have the facts stated specifically, must raise the question in a proper way. He must do it by motion, and not by a general demurrer. If a petition states a cause of action at all, the petition must be held good when demurred to on the ground 'that it does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action,' however general its statement of the facts may be." Park v. Tinkham, 9 Kan. 615, 618. Charges of fraud in pleadings in civil actions are excepted from this rule. Ladd v. Nystol, 63 Kan. 23, 64 Pac. 985. Perhaps there are some other exceptions; but a general charge in the statement of the contestor of a county election of error and mistake by the boards of judges in designated precincts in counting the ballots and by the board of canvassers in declaring the result is sufficient as against an attack by demurrer, and is not void for indefiniteness. "More particularity in pleading is not required than the nature of the subject is reasonably susceptible of, and it is obvious, in the very nature of things, that in most instances the candidate defeated by a miscount cannot know whose ballots were miscounted. All he can be expected to know is that about so many ballots were deposited for him at a given poll, and that the count does not agree therewith. If he knows more, it is accidental. Nor, in such case, is it of consequence whose ballot was miscounted, for the effect is the same, and the mode of proof is precisely the same, whether it was cast by one legal voter or another. It is, moreover, evident that the information upon which the contestant acts must, to a very great extent, be hearsay. He cannot be expected to have been personally at each poll, much less to have known how each elector voted. Nor can he be expected to have personally supervised the counting at each poll; and therefore, however grossly and palpably he may have been wronged at several polls, all that he can say truthfully in respect to most of it is that he is informed and verily believes." Kreitz v. Behrensmeyer, 125 Ill. 141, 172, 17 N. E. 232, 8 Am. St. Rep. 349. The district court justified its adoption of the strict rule of pleading by the fact that under the law of this state each political party and each candidate may be represented at every polling place in the county, and thus may be informed of the facts relating to errors and mistakes, if any occur. Each elector may not be so represented. Any elector may institute a contest. The rules of pleading must, with due regard to the interest of the public and of candidates, expedite his purpose, and there cannot be one set of rules for candidates and parties and another for plain electors. At the trial before the contest court the contestor offered an amendment to his statement, which was rejected. It aided the statement but little, and the court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to allow it to be filed.

The judgment of the district court is reversed; and the cause is remanded.

HASKINS & SELLS v. KELLY, State Treasurer.

(Supreme Court of Kansas. Jan. 11, 1908.)

CORPORATIONS—FOREIGN CORPORATIONS—DOING BUSINESS IN THE STATE.

Under the provisions of chapter 491, p. 807, Laws 1905, authorizing the Governor to employ such competent accountants as he may deem necessary to cause a full investigation to be made of the various state departments, the Governor may employ for that purpose a foreign corporation chartered as public accountants, and such foreign corporation while engaged in making such examination on behalf of the state is not engaged in business in the state within the meaning and contemplation of the Bush law, requiring a foreign corporation to obtain a permit to do business within the state.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Application by Haskins & Sells, certified public accountants, for a writ of mandamus to T. T. Kelly, State Treasurer. Writ granted.

J. W. Gleed and J. L. Hunt, for plaintiff. F. S. Jackson, Atty. Gen., and John S. Dawson, for defendant.

PORTER, J. By an act of the Legislature of 1905 (Laws 1905, p. 807, c. 491) the Governor was authorized to employ such competent accountants as he might deem necessary for the purpose of causing a full investigation to be made of the various state departments. The act appropriated funds to pay for the services of such accountants. In pursuance of the act, the Governor employed plaintiff to investigate the treasury department. This is an original proceeding in mandamus to compel the State Treasurer to countersign and register a warrant for the sum of $2,237.75, a balance due plaintiff for services rendered in the examination of the state treasury. The warrant was issued by the Auditor upon a voucher duly approved and certified by the Governor, in accordance with the provisions of the act. The return to the alternative writ sets up as a defense, first, that plaintiff is a corporation created by the laws of another state for a purpose for which corporations are not permitted to be organized by the laws of this state, and, therefore, cannot maintain the action; second, that it is a foreign corporation, which has never applied for or received permission to engage in business within the state under the provisions of the Bush law, and for that reason cannot maintain the action. There is an agreed statement of facts from which it appears that plaintiff is a corporation organized and created under the laws of the state of New York, and authorized to do as a corporation all of the acts which it is alleged in the alternative writ were done by it. It was also agreed that plaintiff never has had an office or place of business in the state of Kansas. The Honorable E. W. Hoch, as Governor of the state, on May 15, 1905, employed plaintiff by letter, addressed to plaintiff at its office in the city and state of New York, to make investigations under the act of 1905, in pursuance of which employment and under instructions of the Governor plaintiff sent its accountants to the office of the Treasurer of the state, who there took from the books and records such information and data necessary for the making of a report, and afterwards, at its office in New York from the information and data so taken, prepared its report and delivered the same to the Governor. Our statute defining the purposes for which corporations may be created has no reference to foreign corporations. Other states and other governments may authorize corporations to exist for any lawful purpose which the lawmaking power of such states or governments may deem proper. And, if the nature of the business which a foreign corporation is authorized by its charter to transact is not repugnant to our laws or contrary to our public policy, its business may be transacted in this state. This proposition is universally recognized as true. Land Grant Ry. & T. Co. v. Coffey Co., 6 Kan. 245, 254; A., T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Fletcher, 33 Kan. 236, 10 Pac. 596; Kansas City Bridge & Iron Co. v. Com'r's of Wyandotte Co., 35 Kan. 557, 560, 11 Pac. 360.

It is contended, however, that the act itself necessarily contemplates that the accountant must be a person. The contention is based upon the provision of the statute that, in case the reports of the accountant shall show an offense against the state by any officer, assistant, or clerk, the accountant, if so requested either by the Governor or Attorney General, shall make an affidavit or complaint against the guilty person charging him with such offense, and the Governor is authorized to employ competent attorneys to assist in the prosecution of such person or persons. It is seriously argued that, inasmuch as plaintiff is a corporation, it would be impossible for it to comply with this provision of the act, because it is said that a corporation cannot make an affidavit. But it is apparent that the purpose of the foregoing provision of the act would be subserved equally as well if a complaint should be sworn to by some person in the employ of the corporation making the examination as if it were made by the individual who was called the accountant. It would hardly be claimed, for instance, that a valid warrant could not be issued upon a complaint sworn to by one in the employ of the corporation. Nor would the fact furnish ground for a motion to quash an indictment or information based upon such a complaint. The purpose of this provision was to facilitate the prosecution of any state officer or employé of a department who should be shown by the report of the accountant to be guilty of any offense against the state, and it is impossible to conceive of any way in which this purpose could be defeated by the fact that the complaint under such circumstances would be sworn to by an officer or employé of the corporation acting as accountant. If the objection is not frivolous, it has at least no substantial merit.

After all, the main question is whether the state in the exercise of its sovereign powers finds its hands tied by the provisions of the Bush act, which require a corporation to comply with that act before engaging in business in the state. The mere statement of the proposition shows that there can be but one answer, though there are several reasons for the answer. In the first place, plaintiff was not transacting business in the state as contemplated by the provisions of the Bush law. In the second place, the Bush law was not enacted to prevent the state itself from contracting with a foreign corporation for any purpose for which the state may make a contract; nor for the purpose of preventing a foreign corporation from dealing with or transacting business with the state. The Legislature determines that the accounts of its officers and state departments shall be examined for the welfare of the state itself, and that it shall be done through the action of the Governor. In causing this to be done and in doing it the state exercises a sovereign power.

The precise question was before the court and decided adversely to the contention of the respondent in State v. Book Co., 69 Kan. 1, 76 Pac. 411, 1 L. R. A. (N. S.) 167. That was a case brought in the name of the state for the cancellation of certain contracts entered into between the book company and the state text-book commission, by which the book company agreed to supply the schools of the state with certain text-books, and gave bond for the performance of the obligation. The action was based upon the failure of the book company to comply with the law known as the Bush law before entering into the contracts.

The question, therefore, was whether the contracts entered into were subject to cancellation because they were made before the book company had been admitted to do business within the state. The following language from the opinion of Mr. Justice Burch in that case applies with full force to the question involved here: "The Bush law has no application to the facts of this controversy. In order better to discharge the exalted duty enjoined upon it by section 2 of article 6 of the Constitution, the Legislature undertook to secure uniformity of text-books in the common schools. In doing so it exercised a sovereign power. The matter of procuring a corporation to supply needed books is purely a state affair. No private right attaches to it. Nor is the act one of ordinary trade or commerce, in which the state may divest itself of the attributes of sovereignty, and conduct itself as an individual may do. The most distinctively sovereign prerogatives of the Legislature, under the Constitution, are enlisted and concerned. Unable to attend to certain details of the work proposed, a special agent was created, and clothed with such authority as seemed necessary to accomplish the legislative design. The text-book commission is a public agency created to aid in the assertion of a public right, and the execution of a public power in the interest of the public welfare." We are satisfied with the interpretation of the law as announced in that case, and deem it useless to attempt to add further reasons or cite additional authorities.

The peremptory writ will go as prayed for.

NICKLESON v. DIAL.

(Supreme Court of Kansas. Jan. 11, 1908.)

1. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT — AUTHORITY OF AGENT.

A mere special agent will not be presumed to have authority to take, in his own name, and negotiate a promissory note for money due, or to become due, to his principal.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 40, Principal and Agent, §§ 248, 249, 391.]

2. WITNESSES—CROSS-EXAMINATION.

Where an action is commenced by the holder of a promissory note, claiming to be an innocent purchaser thereof, who, instead of resting upon the prima facie effect of the note, presents the payee thereof as a witness to establish his ownership of, and right to negotiate, such note, the witness will be subject to cross-examination as in other cases.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 50, Witnesses, §§ 907-922.]

3. EVIDENCE—BEST AND SECONDARY.

Where, in such a case, the payee testifies that his authority to take and negotiate the note is contained in a contract with his principal, outside statements of such authority should be rejected, when objection to their admission is properly made.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 20, Evidence, §§ 549-554.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from District Court, Riley County; Sam Kimball, Judge.

Action by Ed Nickleson against John M. Dial. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

This is an action on a promissory note. It was commenced April 3, 1905, in the district court of Riley county by the plaintiff in error against the defendant in error. The petition was the ordinary form used in such actions. The note reads:

The Largest in the World.

The Mutual	$138.83
Life	On or before January 1st, 1905, for value received, I promise to pay to A. B. Headington, Special Agent, or order, one hundred and thirty eight and 83-100 dollars, with interest from maturity at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum. If interest is not paid when due, same shall become part of the principal, and draw interest at the same rate.
Insurance Co. of New York Organized
Feb. 1, 1943.	Assets $383,532,681.30.

John M. Dial.

Indorsement: "A. B. Headington."

The answer consisted of a general denial, and failure of consideration, but admitted the execution of the note. On the trial the plaintiff introduced the note in evidence, and then offered the payee as a witness, who testified in part as follows:

"Q. I will ask you to look at the note marked 'Exhibit A,' and I will ask you to state to whom that note belonged at the time it was given? A. Belonged to me. Q. Did anybody else have any interest?—? A. No, sir. Q. Or ownership in said note? A. No, sir. Q. To whom did it belong? I will ask you to state if you sold it to anybody? A. Yes, sir. Q. To whom? A. Ed Nickleson. Q. Now, at the time you sold it, had anybody acquired any interest or ownership in this note from the time it was given down to the time you sold it to Ed Nickleson besides yourself? A. No, sir. Q. That is your signature on the back of the note, is it not? A. Yes, sir."

Cross-examination: "Q. Mr. Headington, in what capacity were you acting at the time that you took this note from Mr. Dial? A. Special agent of the New York Mutual Life. Q. Then when this note was made payable to A. B. Headington, special agent, it was meant as A. B. Headington, special agent of the Mutual Life Insurance Company of New York, was it? A. Yes, sir. Q. Now, then, at the time that you transferred this note to the plaintiff in this case it was the property of the Mutual Life Insurance Company of New York, wasn't it? A. No, sir. Q. Were you in the employ of the Mutual Life Insurance Company of New York at that time? A. Yes, sir. Q. And this was taken for a premium, advance premium, was it, of the company? A. Yes, sir. Q. For what? A. Life insurance. Q. For life insurance? A. Yes, sir. Q. For what amount was the policy to be made, and upon whose life? A. J. M. Dial and his wife, Kate V. Dial. Q. You may state now, Mr. Headington, what company was to issue the policy for which this note was given? A.

Mutual Life Insurance Company of New York."

Redirect examination: "Q. Did you have any arrangement, you say, that you owned this note at the time it was given? Now, if it was given for insurance in the Mutual Life Insurance Company, how did you become the owner of it? A. I was an agent on commission. Q. Well, would this note represent your commission? A. No, sir; represents the commission and note premium. Q. Then how did you become the owner of the note? A. We have to pay a note premium in cash on the issuance of the policy. Q. Did you pay it? A. No, sir. Q. Why? A. Because the policy has never— Q. Has that premium become due yet? A. No, sir; it has not. Q. Have you been willing and ready to pay it whenever it should be? A. Yes, sir."

Recross-examination: "Q. When did your connection with the Mutual Life Insurance Company cease? A. In September, 1904. Q. September, 1904? A. Something like that time. Q. Up to that period you had never reported this policy to the company at all, had you? A. No, sir."

The plaintiff then rested, and a demurrer to the evidence was sustained. By permission of the court the witness was recalled and gave further testimony, which reads: "Q. Mr. Headington, I would like to ask you if you were authorized to transfer this note by the Mutual Life Insurance Company of New York at the time you sold and transferred it to Mr. Ed Nickleson? A. That is a question I don't know how to answer. Q. Well, did they? A. The authority we had is a contract. Q. Well, does that contract allow you to sell notes that are given for the first premium? A. Yes, sir. Q. It does? A. We are to pay cash for everything we get. Q. Now, I will ask you to state if you were required to pay cash, and if the notes which are taken for them belong to the agent and not to the company? A. They do." Plaintiff then asked the witness a question, which reads: "Q. I will ask you to state if the rules of the Mutual Life Insurance Company of New York allow its special agents to take notes for the first premium, that is, that portion of the premium that belongs to the insurance company?"

Defendant objected on the ground that it was incompetent, irrelevant and immaterial, and not the best evidence. The objection was sustained. Plaintiff then made an offer of proof, which reads:

"Mr. Brock: Now, we offer to prove by this witness that the rules of the Mutual Life Insurance Company of New York don't allow its special agents to accept notes in payment of that portion of the first premium that would go to the insurance company, but that it allows the agents to take notes, but the notes belong to the agents, and they require the agents to pay cash to the company for that portion of the premium which goes to the company, and that the insurance company doesn't have any interest in the note that is taken.

"Mr. Hessin: To which we object as incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial."

Robt. J. Brock, for plaintiff in error. John E. Hessin and John C. Hessin, for defendant in error.

GRAVES, J. (after stating the facts as above). The assignments of error embrace the exclusion of evidence offered by the plaintiff, improper cross-examination by the defendant, sustaining the demurrer to plaintiff's evidence, and overruling plaintiff's motion for a new trial.

The principal point insisted upon by the plaintiff in error in his argument is that the words "special agent," added to the name of the payee of the note, were merely descriptio personæ, and therefore the note by its terms was owned by A. B. Headington, and the indorsement in his proper name was sufficient. Many cases are cited which support this contention, but in our view this question is not in the case. The plaintiff did not rest upon the prima facie effect of his note, but the payee was placed upon the witness stand to prove that he owned the note when it was taken. This opened the door to a full inquiry as to whether the payee took the note for himself or for the company. From the evidence of this witness it appears that the note was taken by the payee while acting as the special agent of the Mutual Life Insurance Company of New York, when he was engaged in the transaction of its business and in payment of insurance which it was to furnish. It is not shown that he was authorized to sell notes so taken.

It further appears that no report was made to the insurance company informing it of such application for insurance, and that payment therefor had been made by such note. The makers of the note have not been furnished with any policy of insurance. The payee ceased to be an agent of the insurance company, September, 1894, a few months after the date of the note, and several months before it became due. The note may never become due. If the insurance company should ever receive the applications for insurance, it may decline to issue policies thereon, in which case the premium will not have to be paid. No consideration whatever has been received by the makers of the note. It seems to us that, if the note itself furnished a prima facie case for the plaintiff, it has been completely destroyed by the testimony which he presented. The court might well have concluded that the note when taken belonged to the insurance company, and no authority existed for its transfer by the agent, Headington.

It is insisted that the plaintiff was erroneously prevented from showing authority, on the part of the payee, to sell the note, by the refusal of the court to permit the witness to state what the rules of the company were in this respect; but this question was objected to on the ground that it was not the best evidence, and, the witness having before stated that whatever authority he had was contained in his contract with the company, we are unable to perceive error in this ruling of the court. The contract was the best evidence. The same is true of the offer of proof.

It is insisted that the cross-examination made for the purpose of showing that the note when taken belonged to the insurance company was erroneous, because tending to contradict the terms of the note, and because immaterial as against an innocent holder. As a general proposition this may be correct, but here it must be remembered that the plaintiff himself raised the question of ownership. He by his testimony made this a material matter outside of the note. Having undertaken for his own purposes to establish the right of the payee to transfer the note, he cannot avoid ordinary cross-examination of the witnesses offered for this purpose. If the plaintiff is not willing to stand upon the terms of the note, he cannot expect the defendant to do so.

We see no material error in the rulings of the trial court, and therefore the judgment is affirmed.

GREENWELL et ux. v. MOFFETT et al.

(Supreme Court of Kansas. Jan. 11, 1908.)

1. MORTGAGES—FORECLOSURE SALE.

Where a compact body of land sold at public sale, consisting partly of a tract platted into town lots, used together with the other land as one farm, can be sold in a body to better advantage than in parcels, it is not error to refuse to set aside the sale because a demand to sell in parcels had been refused.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 35, Mortgages, § 1515.]

2. JUDGMENT—RES JUDICATA.

Where an issue is presented in the pleadings and tried in an action of foreclosure, it cannot be again tried at the instance of the losing party upon a motion to set aside the sheriff's sale in the same action.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 30, Judgment, § 1250.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from District Court, Cowley County; C. L. Swarts, Judge.

Action by William Greenwell and Minnie L. Greenwell against John Moffett and others, and action by Moffett Bros. & Andrews against William Greenwell and Minnie L. Greenwell. Actions consolidated. Judgments for Moffett Bros. & Andrews in both actions, and Greenwell and wife bring error. Affirmed.

Torrance & Bloss, for plaintiffs in error. Jackson & Noble, for defendants in error.

BENSON, J. William Greenwell and Minnie L. Greenwell commenced an action to cancel certain notes and a mortgage given by them to John Moffett and Moffett Bros. & Andrews, alleging duress in the execution thereof, and failure of consideration. The defendants in that action pleaded default in the conditions of the mortgage, and prayed for foreclosure. In the reply it was alleged that the mortgagees were in an unlawful combination or trust, and that the consideration for the mortgage was based on the illegal transactions of such trust, and that the mortgage was void for that reason. Afterwards an action was brought by Moffett Bros. & Andrews against the Greenwells to foreclose another mortgage upon the same premises. The defendants in the last-named action pleaded as a defense to this mortgage the same matters contained in their reply in the first-named suit, in connection with other charges of oppression and misconduct. The two actions were tried together. The court found for Moffett Bros. & Andrews in both actions, and rendered judgment for the amount of the notes so held by them, and for foreclosure of the mortgages. The mortgaged property was sold by the sheriff to satisfy these judgments to John Moffett, one of the firm of Moffett Bros. & Andrews, who filed a motion to confirm the sale. Greenwell and wife filed a motion to set aside the sale, and Minnie L. Greenwell filed objections to the sale. These motions and objections were heard together. The motion to confirm was sustained; and this is the ruling complained of.

The motion to set aside the sale was upon the grounds that the judgment was irregular and void, and that the land should have been sold in parcels. The objections were made upon the same grounds, and upon the further ground that the plaintiff firm was in a trust and combination, alleging, in substance, the same matters stated in the pleadings to cancel the first mortgage, and in their defense to the action upon the second mortgage. Oral evidence was heard upon the hearing of these motions, from which it appeared that the mortgaged property consisted of a farm of about 30 acres, including several lots on the south side, platted in an addition to the town of Dexter, and the evidence tended to prove that the land could be sold to better advantage as a single tract than in parcels, and the land was so sold for $7,080, which was more than its market value. In the tier of lots, but not included in the mortgage, were two lots constituting the homestead of the Greenwells, and also some other lots. All the mortgaged property was contiguous, comprising one body of land, occupied and used as a single farm.

The plaintiff in error on this hearing offered the same evidence of the illegal trust and combination that had been previously offered on the trial of the actions. This evidence was properly rejected. An issue tried and determined in the original action could not be tried again on this motion to confirm the sheriff's sale in the same action. The judgment and finding against the plaintiff in error on that proposition were final. The issue concerning the unlawful trust was res judicata. Power v. Snow, 75 Kan. 182, 88 Pac. 1083.

Mrs. Greenwell upon the sale demanded that the property should be offered in parcels, which was refused. She urged as a special objection to the sale in bulk that her house occupied a foot or two of lot 5, adjoining her homestead, and she desired to have the lots sold separately in order that she might redeem any lot or parcel that she might fail to purchase. On the hearing of the motion, no testimony was offered to show that the house was partly upon lot 5. The objections filed by her stated that such was the fact, and the objections were verified by her attorney, but upon belief only. This was not proof. The affidavit did not purport to state a fact, only a belief. Thompson v. Higginbotham, 18 Kan. 42.

The plaintiff in error also complains because the court ordered a sheriff's deed to be issued in six months, thus reducing the period of redemption. This the court had the right to do if the property had been abandoned or was not occupied in good faith. Section 4928, Gen. St. 1901. In the absence of any statement in the record to the contrary it must be presumed that proof of this fact was produced. Glover v. Lawler, 45 Kan.

559, 26 Pac. 42. Besides, no complaint was made of this ruling in the petition in error. The motion to dismiss this proceeding for want of necessary parties was met by the voluntary appearance of the parties so omitted.

Finding no error in the proceedings, the judgment is affirmed.

STATE v. RHODES.

(Supreme Court of Kansas. Jan. 11, 1908.)

1. FRAUD—EXECUTION OF—SECOND CONVEYANCE—MORTGAGES.

A real estate mortgage is not a "conveyance or assurance," within the meaning of section 2092, Gen. St. 1901.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 23, Fraud, § 76.]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 1, p. 591.]

2. SAME.

The execution and delivery of a second mortgage upon real estate, when a first mortgage has been given thereon by the grantor of the second mortgage and before the first mortgage has been filed for record, without mentioning the first mortgage therein, with the intent to defraud, does not violate the above mentioned statute.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 23, Fraud, § 76.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

3. WORDS AND PHRASES—CONVEYANCE.

In states where there is no statutory definition, the word "conveyance" retains its common-law meaning, which is that transfer of the title to real estate. In states where a real estate mortgage conveys the legal title of the land to the mortgagee mortgages are held to be conveyances.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 2, pp. 1575-1584; vol. 8, p. 7610.]

4. SAME—"ASSURANCE."

The word "assurance" refers to the instrument itself, rather than to what it accomplishes. It is defined to be any instrument which confirms the title to real estate. It was anciently used to evidence and assure title to the grantor in a transfer of real estate previously made, citing 1 Words & Phrases, 591.

Appeal from District Court, Russell County; J. C. Ruppenthal, Judge.

Alna R. Rhodes was indicted for a violation of Gen. St. 1901, § 2092. From an order quashing the information, the state appeals. Affirmed.

F. S. Jackson, Atty. Gen., and J. S. Dawson, Asst. Atty. Gen. (L. B. Beardsley, of counsel), for the State. E. W. Grant and Julius Cohn, for appellee.

GRAVES, J. This is a proceeding to determine the sufficiency of an information, filed in the district court of Russell county, which, except formal and unnecessary parts, reads:

"I, M. J. Gernon, the undersigned, county attorney of the said county of Russell, in the state of Kansas, * * * come now here and give the court to understand and be informed that on the 23d day of October, A. D. 1906, the said defendant, Alna R. Rhodes, then and there being, was then and there the owner in fee simple of the following described real estate, situate in the said county of Russell, in the state of Kansas, to wit: * * * That on the said 23d day of October, 1906, the said defendant, Alna R. Rhodes, and one Minnie E. Rhodes, his wife, at the said county of Russell, in the state of Kansas, made, executed, and delivered to one Marc L. Friend their certain principal promissory note, in writing, of that date, whereby, for value received, they promised to pay to the order of said Marc L. Friend, in five years after date thereof, the sum of $700, with interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum until paid, according to 10 interest coupon notes for $21 each, and annexed to and bearing even date with said principal note. That for the purpose of securing the payment of said principal and interest notes, and the sums of money to become due thereon, the said Alna R. Rhodes and Minnie E. Rhodes, at the said county of Russell, in the state of Kansas, and on the said 23d day of October, 1906, made, executed, and delivered unto the said Marc L. Friend their certain mortgage, in writing, of that date, whereby they, said Alna R. Rhodes and Minnie E. Rhodes, did grant, bargain, sell, and mortgage unto the said Marc L. Friend, his heirs and assigns, the aforesaid property situate in the said city of Lucas, in the county of Russell, in the state of Kansas. That said mortgage was duly filed for record in the office of the register of deeds of said Russell county, Kan., on the 28th day of May, 1907, at 1 o'clock p. m. of said day, and duly recorded in volume 25 of Mortgage Records of said county at page 592. A copy of said mortgage is hereto attached, marked 'Exhibit A,' and made a part of this information. That the said Marc L. Friend is now and always has been the legal holder and owner of said note, mortgage, and coupon notes, and that said mortgage, note, and coupon notes have never been paid, or any part thereof, and that the same are outstanding and in force. That the said defendant, Alna R. Rhodes, is now, and ever since the time of the making of said mortgage, note, and coupon notes has been, the owner of said real estate hereinbefore mentioned and described and every part thereof.

"And I, the undersigned, county attorney, do further give the court to understand and be informed that on the 21st day of May, A. D. 1907, and while said mortgage heretofore mentioned and described, and given previously to said Marc L. Friend as aforesaid, was outstanding and in force, as aforesaid, and unrecorded in the office of the register of deeds of said Russell county, Kan., the said Alna R. Rhodes, then and there being, joined by his said wife, Minnie E. Rhodes, at and within the said county of Russell, in the state of Kansas, did then and there willfully and unlawfully, and with the intent then and there of him, the said Alna R. Rhodes, the said Marc L. Friend to defraud, make, execute, and acknowledge their other certain mortgage, in writing, of that date, to one Harriet Rhodes, whereby he, said Alna R. Rhodes, joined by his said wife, Minnie E. Rhodes, conveyed, sold, and mortgaged to said Harriet Rhodes, for the purported consideration of $350, the real estate heretofore mentioned and described and theretofore mortgaged to said Marc L. Friend as aforesaid, to wit: * * * That said mortgage so made and given to said Harriet Rhodes as aforesaid was on the 22d day of May, 1907, at 10 o'clock a. m. and prior to the recording of the mortgage given to said Marc L. Friend as aforesaid, filed for record in the office of the register of deeds of said Russell county, Kan., and recorded in volume 25 of Mortgage Records of said county, at page 591, and which mortgage so made and given to said Harriet Rhodes by said Alna R. Rhodes and Minnie E. Rhodes, and recorded as aforesaid with indorsements thereon, is in words and figures as follows: [Here follows an ordinary real estate mortgage from Alna R. Rhodes and wife to Harriet Rhodes.] On the back of said mortgage appears the following record item: 'State of Kansas, Russell County—ss.: I certify that this instrument was filed for record on the 22d day of May, A. D., 1907, at 10 o'clock a. m., and duly recorded in book 25 of mortgages, at page 591.' That said Alna R. Rhodes, in the said mortgage so made and executed by him and the said Minnie E. Rhodes to the said Harriet Rhodes as aforesaid, and recorded as aforesaid, willfully, purposely, and unlawfully, and with the intent of him the said Alna R. Rhodes, the said Marc L. Friend to defraud, failed to and did not recite or describe, or state in substance therein, the mortgage so made and given to the said Marc L. Friend, as aforesaid, contrary to the form of the statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the state of Kansas."

Exhibit A, attached to the information, is an ordinary real estate mortgage from Alna R. Rhodes and wife to Marc L. Friend covering the same property as the one to Harriet Rhodes. On the back of said mortgage appears the following record item: "State of Kansas, Russell county—ss.: I certify that this instrument was filed for record on the 28th day of May, A. D. 1907, at 1 o'clock p. m., and duly recorded in book 25 of mortgages, at page 592."

A motion to quash was sustained. The journal entry thereof reads: "Now, on this 2d day of August, 1907, at an adjourned session of the regular May, 1907, term of said court, there came on for hearing in said cause the certain motion of defendant made and filed in said cause on July 30, 1907, to quash the information filed in said cause, which motion, omitting the caption, is in words and figures as follows: 'Comes now the defendant, and moves the court to quash the information filed herein, for the following reasons: (1) That the court has no jurisdiction of the person of the defendant. (2) That the information does not state a cause of action or a crime under the laws of the state of Kansas. (3) That the information does not definitely describe an offense against the laws of the state of Kansas. Wherefore the defendant prays that his motion be sustained, and that the information be quashed, and that he have his costs.' The said plaintiff appearing by M. J. Gernon, county attorney of said county, and L. B. Beardsley, of counsel, the said defendant appearing in person and by his attorney, George W. Holland, and thereupon said motion was argued to the court, and after argument of counsel, and the court being fully advised in the premises, said motion was by the court sustained and the information filed in said cause quashed, upon the ground and for the sole reason that, in the judgment of the court, section 99 of the crimes act, being general section 2092 of the General Statutes of 1901, has no application to and does not cover the offense charged in said information; that is, that a second mortgage is not a 'deed or writing for the conveyance or assurance of lands, tenements or hereditaments' within the meaning of said statute; that this was the sole and only question passed upon by the court, and no other question was considered by the court in passing upon said motion. To which ruling and judgment of the court sustaining said motion and quashing said information the plaintiff, the state of Kansas, at the time duly excepted, and still excepts, and reserves the question for appeal to the supreme court of the state of Kansas."

The statute under which the information was drawn, being section 2092, Gen. St. 1901, reads: "Every person who shall make, execute or deliver any deed or writing for the conveyance or assurance of any lands, tenements or hereditaments, goods or chattels, which he had previously, by deed or writing, sold, conveyed mortgaged or assured or covenanted to convey or assure to any other person, such first deed being outstanding and in force, and shall not in such second deed or writing recite or describe such former deed or writing, or the substance thereof, with intent to defraud, and every person who shall knowingly take or receive such second deed or writing, shall on conviction be adjudged guilty of a misdemeanor."

The only question presented here is whether a real estate mortgage is a "conveyance or assurance of lands" within the meaning of this statute. The word "conveyance" has no fixed technical meaning. In some states, by statute, it is defined to be the transfer of personal property or any interest in real estate. But in states where there is no statutory definition the word retains its common-law meaning, which is the transfer of the title to real estate. 9 Cyc. 860, and notes. In states where a real estate mortgage conveys the legal title of the land to the mortgagee, mortgages are held to be conveyances. 7 Am. and Eng. Ency. of Law (2d Ed.) 438, and notes. Where not controlled by statute, the weight of authority seems to be that conveyance means the transfer of the title to real estate. See the two authorities cited above, where the subject is fully discussed, and cases cited in the notes. It is a familiar rule of interpretation that criminal and penal statutes will be strictly construed in favor of the defendant. 28 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law (2d Ed.) 658; U. S. v. Wiltberger, 5 Wheat. 76, 5 L. Ed. 37. The act made criminal by the statute under which this information was drawn is the "conveyance or assurance" of property which had been previously "sold, conveyed, mortgaged, or assured or covenanted to be conveyed or assured." It will be seen that the language here used to describe the condition of property sought to be protected is much broader and comprehensive than the language used to describe the acts which the grantor is prohibited from doing toward such property. This indicates that the word "conveyance" as first used was not intended to be synonymous with, or to include, the word "mortgage," or both would not have been used. It seems, therefore, that the interdicted act was intended to be something more than making a mortgage. This idea is borne out by the fact that real estate mortgages have not been regarded in this state as instruments of conveyance. A real estate mortgage does not transfer any part of the land to the grantee. Under our law, such a mortgage is a mere security—an incident to a debt to secure which it is given. Kelso v. Norton, 65 Kan. 778, 70 Pac. 896, 93 Am. St. Rep. 308; Stark v. Morgan, 73 Kan. 453, 85 Pac. 567, 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 934.

It is urged that, even in this state, a mortgage at least conveys a lien. It would be more nearly accurate, we think, to say that it creates a lien upon the land in favor of the grantee, and thereby constitutes an incumbrance upon it, rather than a conveyance. The word "assurance" comes to us from very ancient times and refers to the instrument itself, rather than to what it accomplishes. It is defined to be "any instrument which confirms the title to real estate." 1 Bouvier's Law Dictionary, 186. It was anciently used to evidence and assure title to the grantor in a transfer of real estate previously made. 1 Words and Phrases, 591. We conclude that an ordinary real estate mortgage is not included in the words "conveyance or assurance," as used in section 2092, Gen. St. 1901, and therefore concur in the decision of the district court.

This case was presented here by counsel for the state only. The defendant did not appear. That side of the case, however, has been very fully and ably discussed in a carefully written brief prepared by Messrs. E. W. Grant and Julius Cohn, students in the law department of the State University, who did so as friends of the court. We acknowledge our obligations to them for the assistance thus given.

The judgment of the district court is affirmed.

DARLING v. ATCHISON, T. & S. F. RY. CO.
(Supreme Court of Kansas. Dec. 7, 1907.)

1. TRIAL—DIRECTING VERDICT.

When, upon the trial of an action in a district court, the plaintiff has introduced evidence tending to establish any cause of action set forth in his petition, it is error for the court to instruct a verdict for the defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 46, Trial, §§ 318-333.]

2. APPEAL—CASE-MADE—TIME OF SERVICE.

In any such action upon the return of either a verdict, a report of a referee or a decision of the court which determines the issues of fact either party, considering himself aggrieved thereby, may file his motion for a new trial, and, until 10 days after such motion is decided, the jurisdiction of the court to extend the time for making and serving a case-made for appeal to the Supreme Court continues.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, §§ 2501-2506.]

3. CARRIERS—SHIPMENT OF LIVE STOCK—ACTION FOR DAMAGES.

The evidence in this case is held to be sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to a decision thereon by the jury, and that the instruction of the court directing a verdict for the defendant is erroneous.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from District Court, Sedgwick County; Thos. C. Wilson, Judge.

Action by W. A. Darling against the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Railway Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

I. P. Campbell, J. G. Campbell, and Ray Campbell, for plaintiff in error. Houston & Brooks and W. R. Smith, for defendant in error.

SMITH, J. At the outset of this case, the defendant in error denies the right of the plaintiff in error to be heard, and moves the dismissal of the action in this court.

The case presented here for review, from the standpoint of the plaintiff in error, is, in substance, this: In his action against the defendant below issues of fact had been framed, and a jury had been impaneled to try them. Certain material and competent evidence had been introduced which, if true, established some liability against the defendant. Certain other material and competent evidence was offered by the plaintiff to further establish his claim, but it was erroneously excluded by the court. Thereupon the plaintiff rested his case, and, on the motion of the defendant, the court instructed the jury to return a verdict in favor of the defendant. Thus a trial of issues of fact was at least begun, and the facts were erroneously determined adversely to the plaintiff.

tiff, and not by the jury, to whose verdict thereon he was entitled. He asked for a re-examination of these facts in the same court by filing a motion for a new trial therein. The defendant, on the other hand, says that the order of a court directing a verdict for the defendant was equivalent to a demurrer to the plaintiff's evidence and involved only a question of law, to wit, conceding the evidence to be true and allowing all inferences favorable to plaintiff, reasonably to be drawn therefrom, it establishes a cause of action in favor of the plaintiff. This contention seems to be supported by Sullivan v. Phenix Ins. Co., 34 Kan. 170, 8 Pac. 112, to the extent, at least, of holding the direction of a verdict equivalent to a demurrer to the evidence. From this position the defendant advances another step, and says a motion to direct a verdict is equivalent to a motion for judgment upon the pleadings and opening statement of counsel, and, as held in Wagner v. Railway Co., 73 Kan. 283, 85 Pac. 299, this raises a question of law only, and no motion for a new trial is necessary to enable the aggrieved party to bring the decision to this court for review. Wherefore, the defendant says in this case the motion for a new trial was unnecessary, and the fact that such a motion was filed does not extend the pendency of the action or the time of making and serving a case-made, and, as the order purporting to extend the time was made more than 10 days after the verdict was rendered, the court had lost jurisdiction to make it; hence, the action here should be dismissed. The argument is ingenious, but is unsound.

As defined by Code Civ. Proc. § 265 (Gen. St. 1905, § 5160), a trial is a judicial examination of the issues, whether of law or fact, in an action; and a new trial (Code Civ. Proc. § 306 [Gen. St. 1905, § 5202]) is a re-examination in the same court of an issue of fact after a verdict by a jury, report of a referee, or a decision of a court. The same section provides that the former verdict, report, or decision shall be vacated, and a new trial granted on the application of the party aggrieved (which section 309 [section 5203] provides must be by motion on written grounds) for certain causes specified affecting materially the substantial rights of such party. Some of the causes specified are any order of the court by which the party is prevented from having a fair trial; that the decision is not sustained by sufficient evidence, or is contrary to law; error of law occurring at the trial and excepted to at the time. Code Civ. Proc. § 306 (Gen. St. 1905, § 5202). Strictly construed, then, as defined by the Code, a trial involves the judicial examination of all the issues of law and fact in an action, while a new trial involves only the re-examination of an issue of fact. That this strict construction is not applicable to new trials of ordinary actions in which the law applicable varies to the varying facts pleaded or proven is apparent, when we consider the grounds for which new trials "shall be granted" as prescribed, some of which involve only a question of law. These must be re-examined both on the hearing of the motion for the new trial and upon the new trial, if granted. Issues of law are not ordinarily framed in an action by the petition and answer or by the answer and reply in the sense that a proposition of law is asserted in one pleading and denied in another; but such issues may arise in many ways at almost every stage of the action, and are sometimes determinative of the action and sometimes not; sometimes they arise in the course of the trial, and sometimes before the trial is commenced. It goes without saying that there can be no new trial until there has been a trial; and, by a fair construction of the Code, it must be such a trial as results or should result in a verdict, a report of a referee, or a decision by the court which involves and determines the facts in issue. Otherwise there could be no new trial "of the issue of fact." It follows, therefore, that whenever a trial has been had upon issues of fact, which trial results in a verdict, report of a referee, or a decision which determines such facts, either party who feels himself aggrieved may file his motion for a new trial on the grounds and within the time prescribed, and, until such motion is disposed of, the action is still pending, and the statutory time for preparing a case-made for an appeal does not begin to run. This view involves no conflict with or modification of Wagner v. Railway Co., 73 Kan. 283, 85 Pac. 299. In that case judgment was rendered upon the pleadings and admitted facts. There had been no trial of any issue of fact; and hence there could be no new trial. It is also in accord with Sullivan v. Phenix Ins. Co., 34 Kan. 170, 8 Pac. 112. In that case the court directed a verdict for the defendant upon its conclusion that the plaintiff had produced no evidence tending to establish his cause of action. This court viewed the evidence differently and granted a new trial.

It is not suggested by the defendant in this case how the verdict in this case could have been disposed of other than by a motion to set it aside and to grant a new trial. It is said, however, that in passing upon the request for an instructed verdict the court will be presumed to have accepted all of the plaintiff's evidence as true, and to have accorded him every favorable inference reasonably to be drawn therefrom, and then it decided that the evidence so considered did not tend to prove a cause of action in his favor. We think, however, that the plaintiff was entitled to a verdict of the jury, under proper instructions, upon his right to recover of the defendant any damages, and, if so, the amount thereof, under his evidence tending to show that he ordered cars of the defendant's agent for the purpose of shipping cattle and a reasonable time before the time of shipment, and that he had his cattle at the station at the proposed time and the defendant failed to provide the cars as ordered, especially as this failure was entirely unexplained.

One contention of the plaintiff is that he offered competent evidence to prove material facts on the trial, and that the court by its order excluded the same. Whether this be really true or not, and of it we shall speak later, he had a right to represent the question, as he did, in a motion for a new trial, and, when the court again decided adversely to him thereon, he had the right to appeal and to have the decision of this court thereon. It appears by the record that no judgment was in fact rendered on the verdict, but the action remained pending upon the motion until that was decided. The court had jurisdiction at any time within 10 days thereafter to make and serve a case-made for appeal. The motion to dismiss is overruled.

We proceed to the consideration of the errors assigned. We are of the opinion that when a train dispatcher's office is supplied by a telephone connected with a system of telephone wires and offices, and a witness goes to another telephone office so connected and calls for the train dispatcher, and the call is responded to, the witness should be allowed to testify who the person responding said he was, even though the witness has no acquaintance with the dispatcher, and does not recognize the voice. Also, if the person responding said he was the train dispatcher, the witness may testify to the conversation as if had face to face. The rule seems to be the same as if the witness unacquainted with the officer had gone into the dispatcher's office, inquired for him, and a man should respond, "I am the dispatcher. What can I do for you?" The witness would be allowed to testify to the conversation had so far as relevant to the issues being tried. We are, however, unable to say from the record that this error was prejudicial in view of facts subsequently developed in the evidence. On the general proposition of telephonic communications, see Oskamp v. Gadsden, 35 Neb. 7, 52 N. W. 718, 17 L. R. A. 440, 37 Am. St. Rep. 428, and note; 27 Am. & Eng. Encyc. Law, 1091.

It is urged, and we think correctly, that the court erred in excluding portions of the depositions of witnesses Norton and Reed. The evidence excluded was in verification of exhibits from the books of the Kansas City Stockyards Company which received the cattle and of exhibits from the books of the commission company which sold them. The witnesses, respectively, had charge of the office in which the books were kept concerning which he was interrogated, but in neither case did he hold the pen that made the entries, and in neither case could he testify of his own knowledge that the entries were correct, but their evidence did show that the entries were made in the usual course of business, and that the clerks who made the entries derived their knowledge of the facts entered from memorandum slips and oral reports made by the weighers and yardmen; also, that the books and the witnesses who made the memoranda and reports were out of the state and beyond the jurisdiction of the court. It is a matter of common knowledge, and hence one of which the courts should take judicial notice, that in the great and multifarious business of the stockyards company the clerk or bookkeeper who makes the entries of the transactions in the books at the offices knows personally nothing of the correctness of the entries, but records only what he learns from others by memorandum slips or oral reports from others who, in turn, may have derived their information from still others; also, that it is difficult and often impossible to secure the evidence of all these persons. It is also apparent that there can be no motive for falsifying such entries, and the entire business transacted by and through this great agency, running into millions annually, is based upon the fairness and accuracy of just such entries in the books of the stockyards company and the books of the numerous commission companies. The courts should regard as some evidence of the facts they purport to record such entries made from day to day in the regular course of business, without inquiring of the clerk in whose handwriting they appear what he knows of the correctness thereof when it is evident he knows nothing; and without inquiring of the yardman who reported to the clerk, or the weigher who reported to the yardman, what he remembers of the transaction, when it would evidently be an impeachment of his veracity if he testified he had any particular remembrance of one transaction among the hundreds. Old rules of evidence, still generally good rules, must so far yield to new conditions as not to greatly impede the purpose for which they were formulated, viz., the ascertainment of the truth in relation to disputed facts in courts of justice.

It is well said in that excellent treatise, 2 Wigmore on Evidence, p. 1896: "The conclusion is, then, that where an entry is made by one person in the regular course of business, recording an oral or written report, made to him by one or more other persons in the regular course of business, of a transaction lying in the personal knowledge of the latter, there is no objection to receiving that entry under the present exception, provided the practical inconvenience of producing on the stand the numerous persons thus concerned would in the particular case outweigh the probable utility of doing so. Why should not this conclusion be accepted by the courts? Such entries are dealt with in that way in the most important undertakings of mercantile and industrial life. They are the ultimate basis of calculation, investment, and general confidence in every business enterprise; nor does the practical impossibility of obtaining constantly and permanently the verification of every employé affect the trust that is given to such books. It would seem that expedients which the entire commercial world recognizes as safe could be sanctioned, and not discredited, by courts of justice. When it is a mere question of whether provisional confidence can be placed in a certain class of statements, there cannot profitably and sensibly be one rule for the business world and another for the courtroom. The merchant and the manufacturer must not be turned away remediless because methods in which the entire community places a just confidence are a little difficult to reconcile with technical judicial scruples on the part of the same persons who as attorneys have already employed and relied upon the same methods. In short, courts must here cease to be pedantic and endeavor to be practical." See, also, Wright v. Chicago, B. & Q. Ry. Co., 118 Mo. App. 392, 94 S. W. 555; A. T. & S. F. Ry., Co. v. Williams (Tex. Civ. App.) 86 S. W. 38.

It is urged by the defendant that the errors, if any, in the introduction of evidence, were not prejudicial, and should be disregarded, for the reason that it alleged in its answer that the plaintiff and defendant "entered into" a written contract of shipment, which it says is equivalent to alleging that the written contract was executed by the parties, and that the plaintiff did not in his reply deny the execution thereof under oath; that the said contract contained the provision "that as a condition precedent to his [the plaintiff's] right to recover any damages for any loss or injury to his stock during the transportation thereof, or at any place or places where the same may be loaded or unloaded for any purpose on the company's road, or previous to loading thereof for shipment, the shipper or his agent in charge of the stock will give notice in writing of his claim therefor to some officer of the company * * * before such stock shall have been removed from the place of destination above mentioned," etc.; that it was not alleged by plaintiff that such notice was given, nor was any excuse given for the failure to give it. Therefore the plaintiff was not entitled to recover in any event, and no error in the trial could be prejudicial to him. Assuming, but not deciding, that the contention of the defendant in regard to its pleading the written contract and the failure of the plaintiff to verify his denial of the execution thereof is correct, we do not think the conclusion follows. Of the claims for damages one is for shrinkage in the weight of the cattle in consequence of the failure of defendant to furnish cars at the time they were ordered which necessitated the holding of the cattle at the place of shipment. Another claim is for damage to the cattle after the arrival at the destination on account of the carrier's negligent delay, resulting in loss of market and shrinkage. On the authority of M., K. & T. Ry. Co. v. Frogley, 75 Kan. 440, 89 Pac. 903, and M., K. & T. Ry. Co. v. Fry, 74 Kan. 548, 87 Pac. 745, it must be said that the contract, if it is to be considered, did not preclude a recovery of such damages without the notice. The defendant had full knowledge of the holding of the cattle before they were loaded, and had full opportunity to inspect them, which is the object of the notice. As to the loss of market and other damages claimed after arrival at the destination, it was impossible to give the notice as required by the contract; hence, this claim is not covered by the stipulation.

It appears, therefore, that the instruction to return a verdict for the defendant was erroneous, and the verdict is set aside, and a new trial awarded.

LYNDS v. VAN VALKENBURGH et al.

(Supreme Court of Kansas. Jan. 11, 1908.)

1. BILLS AND NOTES — ACTIONS — DEFENSES — FAILURE OF CONSIDERATION.

The consideration for certain promissory notes secured by a mortgage on land in Kansas was that the payee should assume the payment of certain notes secured by real estate mortgages on land in Nebraska which was conveyed to the payee. The payee sold and indorsed the Kansas notes to a third person who brought suit upon them. The maker pleaded a failure of consideration in that the payee had not paid the Nebraska notes and discharged the Nebraska mortgages. The court found that the indorsee was not an innocent purchaser and knew at the time he took the Kansas notes the maker claimed a defense to them on account of the failure of consideration described. It made no finding that at the time of the indorsement the information of the indorsee extended to any defense of failure of consideration upon any other ground. Held, the contract, the pleading, and the finding all forbid that judgment in favor of the indorsee should be denied for a failure of consideration in respect to any matter other than the one stated.

2. SAME — PRESUMPTIONS AND BURDEN OF PROOF — FAILURE OF CONSIDERATION.

In the suit referred to the plaintiff was not required to prove that he or the payee of the Kansas notes paid any of the Nebraska notes or discharged any of the Nebraska mortgages. The burden of proving the failure of consideration pleaded rested upon the defendant.

3. SAME.

The court found that the Nebraska notes had been paid but that the evidence did not disclose by whom the payment had been made. Held, the plaintiff was entitled to judgment on the findings. The word "paid" means prima facie that the obligations have been satisfied and the demands extinguished, and, if the obligors on the Nebraska paper still rest under liability upon it, the defendant should have established the fact.

4. SAME.

The court concluded as a matter of law that the plaintiff would be entitled to judgment provided he produced in court and delivered to the defendant the Nebraska notes paid and the Nebraska mortgages canceled. Held, error. The contract of assumption did not require a delivery of the Nebraska paper paid and canceled to the defendant, and whoever paid the notes and satisfied the mortgages was entitled to the possession of them.

5. SAME.

Following the return of the finding of fact and conclusion of law referred to, the plaintiff undertook to account for the Nebraska notes and mortgages. He produced and tendered one note canceled and the mortgage securing it released of record. One note and the mortgage securing it had been destroyed. Another note and the mortgage securing it had been delivered to a grantee of the land affected, who desired to retain it. The remaining note and the mortgage securing it had been canceled in a foreclosure suit based upon them, and had been filed with the papers in the case by the clerk of the court, but the note was missing. All the notes not produced had been paid under circumstances indicating an extinguishment of liability upon them, and the mortgages securing them had been released. There was no evidence of circumstances indicating that any right of equitable assignment or of subrogation existed or might arise. Held, the plaintiff was entitled to judgment.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from District Court, Atchison County; B. F. Hudson, Judge.

Action by John H. Lynds against Tremain R. Van Valkenburgh and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed and remanded, with directions.

The plaintiff sued to recover judgment upon three promissory notes of $1,000 each and to foreclose a mortgage securing them. The notes were executed by the defendant Tremain R. Van Valkenburgh to J. K. Carolus, and were indorsed without recourse to the plaintiff. The mortgage covered certain real estate in White Cloud, Kan., upon which were situated a mill and a grain elevator. Carolus had been the record owner of the mill property and deeded it free of incumbrance to Van Valkenburgh, receiving in consideration therefor conveyances to himself of several tracts of real estate in Nebraska and a deed to his sister, Margaret Over (who apparently had an interest in the mill), of a tract described as being in Taney county, Mo. At the time of the trade the tracts conveyed to the plaintiff were separately owned by Van Valkenburgh and others associated with him in the purchase of the mill, who afterward incorporated as the White Cloud Milling Company, the various individuals taking stock in proportion to the value of the land each one had contributed. Van Valkenburgh then deeded the mill property to the corporation. Four tracts of the Nebraska land were covered by mortgages. In the preliminary contract it was provided that, if it were possible, the Van Valkenburgh party would, before the exchange of deeds, pay off these mortgages so that the trade would stand clear mill for clear land; but, if it were not possible for them to do so, they would pay the incumbrances down to $3,000, Carolus would assume $3,000 of the mortgage indebtedness, and Van Valkenburgh would give Carolus a mortgage back on the mill property for that amount. January 1, 1894, was fixed as the date for closing the trade, but by agreement the time was extended to January 15th following. The extension agreement also provided that, if the title to the tract of land in Taney county, Mo., which was afterward deeded to Margaret Over, were not satisfactory to Carolus, he should be given Nebraska land instead at any time within six months after January 15th. On January 15th, or soon after, deeds were exchanged, and, nothing having been paid on the Nebraska mortgages, the notes and the mortgages sued upon were given to Carolus. The deeds to Carolus of the Nebraska lands did not provide that he should assume or pay the mortgages or any part of the mortgages upon them.

The contract originally provided that two tracts of land in Taney county, Mo., should be conveyed to Carolus. For one of them Nebraska land was by agreement substituted upon which there was a mortgage which Carolus afterward paid. The title to the Margaret Over tract proving unsatisfactory, a Nebraska tree claim was substituted for it, valued at $3,000. The Missouri land was valued at $2,000. The agreement was that Van Valkenburgh should convey the tree claim to Carolus on the consideration that the Missouri land should be quitclaimed by Margaret Over to Van Valkenburgh, and that Van Valkenburgh should be credited $1,000 on the notes secured by mortgage on the mill. It was understood by all parties that the tree claim was owned by Sarah E. Johnson, a sister of Van Valkenburgh, and that she had not proved up so as to be entitled to a patent. After final proof was made Van Valkenburgh tendered to Carolus a deed of the tree claim, executed by Sarah E. Johnson and her husband, and demanded the quitclaim deed from Margaret Over and credit of $1,000 on his notes. The tender was refused, and compliance with the demand was refused. Some time previous to the tender Carolus had requested that the deed when executed should run to his wife. Sarah E. Johnson and her husband executed a new deed to Mrs. Carolus, which Van Valkenburgh tendered, coupled with the same demands as before and with the same result as before.

The plaintiff's suit was brought after the last note had matured. Various parties were made defendants, and numerous issues were framed. For present purposes, however, it is only necessary to refer to some of them. The answer of Tremain R. Van Valkenburgh admitted the execution and delivery of the notes and mortgage, but denied liability upon them. He pleaded the facts relating to the Margaret Over and Sarah E. Johnson lands, made a tender of the Johnson deeds to Carolus and Mrs. Carolus, demanded a quitclaim deed from Margaret Over, and asserted that the first note was paid. He then pleaded that the notes sued on were given upon the consideration that Carolus should assume and pay the four mortgages upon the Nebraska land, that such mortgages had not been paid whereby the consideration for the notes had to that extent failed, and that the plaintiff purchased the notes with knowledge of the facts. Lastly he pleaded an offset arising upon a running account and some independent transactions. The failure of Carolus to procure the quitclaim deed from Margaret Over was not counted upon as affecting in any way the consideration of the second and third notes. The plaintiff replied, and the case was sent for trial to a referee.

At the trial Van Valkenburgh tendered the two Sarah E. Johnson deeds to Carolus unconditionally, offering to him his choice of them, and deposited them with the referee. The tender was refused at the time, but after the trial Carolus accepted one of the deeds. The referee found in detail the facts of which the foregoing furnishes little more than an outline. He further found that the plaintiff had purchased the first note after it became due, and that he held it subject to all defenses; that the plaintiff knew the second and third notes were given in a transaction which resulted in the conveyance of the mill property to Van Valkenburgh, but that the plaintiff did not know Van Valkenburgh or his associates claimed any defense to the notes or mortgages on account of the failure of Carolus to pay off the mortgages on the Nebraska land; and that the evidence failed to show whether the Nebraska notes were then due. An account between the parties was stated. From the facts found the referee concluded Van Valkenburgh was entitled to a credit of $1,000 on the first note, which paid it, except $35 accrued interest; that the plaintiff was entitled to recover the balance due upon the first note; that the plaintiff was entitled to the rights of an innocent purchaser of the second and third notes, and should recover both the principal and interest of them; and that after balancing the open accounts between the parties Van Valkenburgh was entitled to a credit in reduction of the plaintiff's claim of a stated sum. The referee's report was approved, and judgment was entered accordingly and for foreclosure of the mortgage. On the trial the referee held a witness to be incompetent to testify whose testimony if admitted would have tended to prove notice to the plaintiff of the claimed defense of failure of consideration. Proceedings in error were instituted in this court by the defendants to review the judgment, and for the single reason that the referee erred in rejecting the testimony referred to the judgment was reversed, and the cause was remanded for further proceedings. 63 Kan. 887, 66 Pac. 904.

When the controversy was resumed in the district court, a motion on behalf of the defendants attacking the referee's findings of fact and conclusions of law was overruled except that the finding relating to the plaintiff's want of notice and the conclusion of law based thereon were set aside. Van Valkenburgh amended his answer in a particular not now material. The plaintiff amended his reply in many respects, and the issues left undetermined by the former proceeding and the new issues raised by the amended reply were then tried by the court. At the conclusion of the trial the court made additional findings of fact and conclusions of law, which read in part as follows:

"At the time of the purchase of said notes and said mortgage by the plaintiff he knew that they were given in the transaction which resulted in the conveyance of the mill and elevator property to Tremain R. Van Valkenburgh, and also knew that Tremain R. Van Valkenburgh and his associates claimed defenses to the notes and mortgages on account of the failure of said J. K. Carolus to pay the several notes secured by the mortgages on the Holt county, Neb., lands. At the time he purchased them the plaintiff knew that the only consideration for the notes sued on herein was the promise of J. K. Carolus to pay the certain notes and to have released of record the mortgages securing the same, which had theretofore been made and executed by said Tremain R. Van Valkenburgh and others on said lands in Holt county, Neb., and which are all due. While it appears from the evidence in this case that said mortgage indebtedness has been paid since the trial of this case before the referee, it does not appear who paid such indebtedness, or in whose possession the notes are now."

"The plaintiff is not entitled to the rights of an innocent purchaser of the notes and mortgage sued on herein, and said defendants T. R. Van Valkenburgh and Henrietta Van Valkenburgh and the White Cloud Milling & Elevator Company are entitled to set up and maintain any defense to said notes and mortgage in the hands of the plaintiff which they could set up and maintain against J. K. Carolus, the original payee of said notes and mortgage. The plaintiff will be entitled to judgment upon the notes sued on herein, but without costs, in whatever sum he may be equitably entitled to, the amount to be determined hereafter; said judgment to be a first lien on all the property mentioned and described in his said mortgage, if he shall, within a reasonable time from this date, produce, or cause to be produced, the several notes which the said J. K. Carolus assumed and agreed to pay, and which were secured by mortgages on said lands in Holt county, Neb., and deliver said notes, paid and canceled, and said mortgages, properly satisfied of record in said Holt county, Neb., to said T. R. Van Valkenburgh, and also shall deliver to said T. R. Van Valkenburgh a properly executed quitclaim deed from said Margaret Over, or any one claiming under her, to section six (6), town twenty-one (21), range nineteen (19), Taney county, Mo., as described in finding of fact No. 4 of the report of the referee filed herein, otherwise judgment will be entered in favor of said defendants T. R. Van Valkenburgh and Henrietta Van Valkenburgh. Final judgment herein will be reserved until the further order of this court."

The cause was continued from time to time to allow the plaintiff opportunity to meet the conditions upon which judgment would be rendered in his favor. Finally, being unable to do this, he so announced to the court, but asked and was granted leave to make a showing. The plaintiff thereupon produced and tendered a coupon note of Levi Van Valkenburgh for $550 payable to George S. Lewis, with indorsements of interest and principal paid, the mortgage securing the note on one of the tracts of Nebraska land and an acknowledged release of the mortgage by the mortgagee. The note and mortgage correspond in all respects to the description in the third amended answer of one of the incumbrances which Carolus assumed. The record discloses no objection made to the identity of the paper or to the sufficiency of the release.

The remainder of the showing was by deposition and accounted for the other notes and mortgages as follows: One tract of land was sold by the plaintiff to W. F. Conrad about the year 1901. The sum of $500 due upon a mortgage given by Van Valkenburgh was then unpaid. Conrad paid the balance due, and received the note and mortgage canceled and marked paid. Afterward he sold the land, and, the note and mortgage not being called for, he burned them with other papers. A release of the mortgage was obtained at the time the note was paid and was recorded. A certified copy of the recorded release identified by the recorder of the county is attached to the deposition. M. F. Harrington bought the mortgage upon another tract known as the "Swain Land," and the note secured and obtained possession of them. He then purchased the land itself, and secured a release of the mortgage from a receiver who had been appointed for the mortgagee. He then sold the land to William Hart clear of incumbrances, and delivered the note and mortgage to Hart as fully satisfied and paid. The release from the mortgagee was procured to evidence the fact that the mortgage was canceled and satisfied. Hart has the note and mortgage in his possession, and under the advice of his attorney desires to keep them. A certified copy of the recorded release is attached to the deposition. An action was brought to foreclose the mortgage given by Van Valkenburgh to Cellm H. Seymore upon the remaining tract. The land was owned at the time of suit by S. H. Greenwalt. A decree of foreclosure was entered, and then a deed was given by Greenwalt to Seymore in satisfaction of the plaintiff's claim. The attorney for the plaintiff had possession of the note and mortgage during the proceedings, and surrendered them to the clerk of the court for cancellation. The clerk placed his cancellation stamp upon them, and they remained in the files for some time. The canceled note is now missing from the clerk's office.

In addition to the foregoing the depositions show that after the note and mortgage last referred to were canceled by the clerk of the court Levi Van Valkenburgh, one of the incorporators of the White Cloud Milling Company, the grantor of one of the tracts of the Nebraska land to Carolus and the maker of the Lewis mortgage which Carolus assumed, had a conversation with the attorney for the plaintiff in the foreclosure suit, in which he inquired if it would be possible for any one to obtain the canceled note and mortgage and remove them from the official files. He further said he was interested in an action pending in Kansas in which John H. Lynds was plaintiff and Tremain R. Van Valkenburgh and others were defendants; that it would be absolutely necessary for Lynds to produce the original papers in court to obtain relief; and that, if Lynds were unable to produce the original note, they (the Van Valkenburghs) would be $800 ahead in the Kansas suit. William Hart testified that Levi Van Valkenburgh called upon him and told him that, if Carolus obtained the note and mortgage pertaining to his land, they would take the land away from him, and make him pay back the amount he had paid for it. W. F. Conrad testified that Levi Van Valkenburgh interviewed him, and stated to him that Lynds needed the note which he had burned and probably would write to him about it.

None of the testimony given by deposition was contradicted or impeached, and no counter showing was made to impair its force. The defendants merely introduced the record of the proceedings in an action wherein Margaret Over obtained a judgment against Van Valkenburgh on account of a breach of the warranty contained in the deed to her of the Taney county, Mo., land.

The court made no additional findings of fact, but drew a conclusion of law adverse to the plaintiff, and rendered judgment in favor of the defendants. The plaintiff prosecutes error.

W. W. & W. F. Gutherie and S. M. Brewster, for plaintiff in error. W. D. Webb, for defendants in error.

BURCH, J. (after stating the facts as above). Many assignments of error are made and argued. Much testimony is quoted by both parties in support of their respective positions upon which neither the referee nor the court made findings. This court can consider the written instruments executed by the parties, other written documents, the pleadings, admissions, and stipulations, and findings of fact. It can also consider the evidence upon any branch of the case which is all in depositions, as that procured by the plaintiff to explain his inability to produce the notes and mortgages which Carolus had assumed. But it cannot found its judgment upon oral testimony not reduced to findings of fact by the trial court. If the parties desired findings in respect to the matters covered by such testimony, a request for further findings should have been made. Shuler v. Lashhorn, 67 Kan. 694, 74 Pac. 264. Therefore many matters debated in the briefs are not open to consideration. Of those properly reviewable only two need be discussed to dispose of the controversy. The obligation placed upon the plaintiff to procure a quitclaim deed from Margaret Over before he could have judgment on the second and third notes was wholly unwarranted. The contracts between the parties did not include the subject of the substitution of the tree claim for the Margaret Over tract within the consideration of any of the notes. The answer did not plead the failure of Carolus to deliver a quitclaim deed from Margaret Over as a failure of consideration for the second and third notes, but, on the contrary, pleaded that circumstance in connection with the defense to the first note and then pleaded the omission to pay the Nebraska mortgages as the sole failure of the consideration for the other two notes. There is no finding that any feature of the tree claim transaction whereby Carolus became bound to procure a quitclaim deed from Margaret Over affected any portion of the consideration of the notes; but, on the other hand, the finding quoted at length above is to the effect that the only consideration for the mill property mortgage was the promise of Carolus to pay the Nebraska notes and have the Nebraska mortgages released of record. The same finding is explicit upon the proposition that the plaintiff's knowledge, when he bought the notes, extended to claimed defenses on account of the failure of Carolus to pay the several notes secured by the Nebraska mortgages. There being no finding that the plaintiff, when he bought the notes, knew of any defense on account of the Over quitclaim deed matter, this court can imply none, and upon the record as it stands the plaintiff was an innocent purchaser so far as that defense is concerned. Besides all this, in order to secure a credit on the first note for $1,000, the difference in price between the tree claim and the Margaret Over tract, Van Valkenburgh waived his right to a quitclaim deed from Margaret Over, and tendered the Johnson deeds unconditionally. The credit was allowed, Carolus has accepted one of the Johnson deeds, and that transaction was closed before the district court made its additional findings of fact. The judgment in favor of Margaret Over against Van Valkenburgh had no bearing upon any issue in the case determinable and undetermined at the time it was offered in evidence, and the plaintiff is entitled to judgment without procuring a quitclaim deed from Margaret Over.

The requirement that the plaintiff procure and deliver to Tremain B. Van Valkenburgh the Nebraska notes paid and canceled and the Nebraska mortgages satisfied of record was unwarranted. It may be premised that Carolus assumed the payment of the Nebraska mortgage indebtedness, although the writings into which the preliminary contract merged did not so provide, and it may be taken for granted that a contract to assume a mortgage indebtedness is a contract to pay it. But when Carolus agreed to pay the Nebraska notes and satisfy the Nebraska mortgages, he became the principal obligor so far as the individuals of the Van Valkenburgh party were concerned, and upon payment of the notes was himself entitled to possession of the evidences of indebtedness. Any payment or payment through any means which would relieve the parties liable upon the notes of their obligations would satisfy the promise which Carolus gave, and, if some grantee of one of the tracts of land should pay the mortgage indebtedness against it, he would be entitled to possession of the paper. Stiger et al. v. Bent, 111 Ill. 328. In any event the contract of Carolus was to pay, not to produce evidence of payment, and the plaintiff could not be defeated because he did not bring into court paper which Carolus was not bound to turn over. The burden was upon the defendants to prove failure of consideration. Proof by them that they rested under an existing liability upon the Nebraska paper was indispensable to the defense. The plaintiff was not obliged to prove that anybody had paid the Nebraska notes and mortgages. When the court found that those notes and mortgages had been paid, but that there was no evidence to show who paid them, the defendants had not sustained the burden they assumed by their pleadings. They had not shown they were still liable upon the paper, and the plaintiff was entitled to judgment.

It only remains to inquire if the plaintiff aided the defendant's proof in his effort to show what had become of the paid notes and satisfied mortgages. Clearly he did not. The Lewis note and mortgage and a release of that mortgage were produced and tendered in court. In every other instance the nature of the transaction and the conduct of the parties were such as to indicate a positive purpose completely to extinguish both the debt and the lien. Any intention on the part of the holders to assign, and of the persons paying to take title to the securities, is clearly negatived. After clearing his land, and then selling it, Conrad burned up the canceled notes and mortgages. Harrington is the only person who could claim any right against the defendants because of the payment he made, but he passed the instruments on to his grantee as mere muniments of title. The Seymore note and mortgage were surrendered, canceled, and filed for the very purpose of making a public record of the fact that the last spark of vitality in them had been quenched, and to prevent them from being used again as live obligations.

If one person, not a mere interloper, but having an interest in the matter, pay the note and satisfy the mortgage of another, the question whether he becomes an assignee of the note and mortgage is one of fact and intention of the parties. Blanford v. Adams, 104 Ind. 41, 3 N. E. 753, and authorities cited in the opinion. If, however, overriding equities so require, one who satisfies an incumbrance upon his land may be subrogated to the rights of the lienholder, or may be entitled to an equitable assignment of such rights. Subrogation and equitable assignment are acts of the law as distinguished from assignment by acts of parties. "We must be careful to distinguish between an assignment of the mortgage debt and a mere right of subrogation to the lien of the mortgage creditor. Assignment is the act of the parties, and depends generally upon intention. Where the nature of the transaction is such as imports a payment of the debt and a consequent discharge of the mortgage, there can, of course, be no assignment, for the lien of the mortgage is extinguished by the payment. A mortgage creditor cannot be compelled to assign the debt and mortgage upon receiving payment. All that he can be required to do is to give an acquittance and release. The exception to this rule, if it can be so termed, is found in those cases where the party making the payment occupies the position of surety to the debt, or is in some way personally bound for its payment. Such a person may, in equity, require an assignment or transfer, not only of the mortgage itself, but of all the securities held by the creditor, for his protection and indemnity, and, although no such assignment or transfer is actually made, a court of equity will treat it as having been done. But if the party making the payment does not occupy the position of surety for the debt, as a general rule he cannot claim to be entitled as assignee unless by agreement with the creditor. Subrogation is, however, a very different thing from an assignment. It is the act of the law, and the creature of a court of equity, depending not upon contract, but upon the principles of equity and justice. It presupposes an actual payment and satisfaction of the debt secured by the mortgage. But, although the debt is paid and satisfied, a court of equity will keep alive the lien for the benefit of the party who made the payment, provided he as security for the debt 'has such an interest in the land' as entitles him to the benefit of the security given for its payment." Gatewood v. Gatewood et al., 75 Va. 407, 410. In this case all the evidence is opposed to the idea of an assignment, or that liability on the part of the persons primarily bound was preserved. It imports payment of the debt and extinguishment of the lien, and the depositions are barren of any evidence that any occasion exists or may arise for the application of the doctrine of subrogation, or of equitable assignment, in favor of the persons who paid the Nebraska mortgages. In the case of Crippen v. Chappell, 35 Kan. 495, 499, 11 Pac. 453, 57 Am. Rep. 187, it is said: "It always requires something more than the mere payment of the debt in order to entitle the person paying the same to be substituted in the place of the original creditor. It requires an assignment, legal or equitable, from the original creditor, or an agreement or understanding on the part of the party liable to pay the debt, that the person furnishing the money to pay the same shall in effect become the creditor, or the person furnishing the money must furnish the same either because he is liable as surety or liable in some other secondary character, or for the purpose of saving or protecting some right or interest, or supposed right or interest, of his own." Here we have the fact of payment by landowners, circumstances indicating that no substituted equitable rights exist, and no circumstances indicating that subrogation or equitable assignment may ever need to be invoked. The court cannot speculate upon the subject. It cannot conjure up imaginary states of fact to aid an unproved defense of failure of consideration.

One or two matters urged in the defendant's brief may be noticed. It is said that the referee found there had been a failure of consideration for the notes in suit, and that his finding and conclusion upon the subject were not disturbed. There is no finding by the referee that Carolus agreed to pay the Nebraska notes at once upon the conclusion of the trade, or before they fell due. Neither is there any such finding by the court. Oral testimony to that effect is quoted, but for reasons already stated it cannot be considered. The referee found expressly that at the time of the trial before him it did not appear whether the notes were due or not. He further found that the plaintiff took the first note after maturity, and hence subject to the defense of failure of consideration. But he found that, after allowing the credit of $1,000, the plaintiff was entitled to recover on the first note the sum of $35, being six months interest to July 1, 1894, when the credit should have been made. Therefore the referee decided that the defense of failure of consideration had not been established at all. Otherwise he would have allowed no recovery on the first note which the plaintiff took subject to the defense if proved.

It is urged that both Lynds and Carolus were witnesses in the case, that both testified, and that neither of them offered evidence to show that either of them had paid the Nebraska obligations. They were not required to furnish any such evidence. On the face of the documents set up in the petition the plaintiff was entitled to judgment. He continued to be entitled to judgment, unless the defendants proved a state of facts destroying the right. At the time of the trial before the referee it was not shown that Carolus was in default. At the time of the trial before the court it was found that the notes were paid. Prima facie the word "paid" indicates that the obligation has been satisfied and the demand extinguished. "But payment of a promissory note is not a contract. It is performance of the obligation arising out of the promise to pay. Any one of the several parties to a joint contract, or any one in his behalf and at his request, or with his consent, may perform the obligation, and, when performance has been offered or made, and the money accepted, the obligation becomes extinguished. The parties to the contract are no longer bound to each other by the vinculum legis of right and duty. The duty being discharged, the right ceases to exist." Moran v. Abbey, 63 Cal. 50, 61. The finding was entirely sufficient for the plaintiff. If the circumstances were such that the defendants were still liable in any way, they were bound to prove the fact.

It is suggested that the plaintiff accepted the court's conclusion and undertook to comply with the requirement which it virtually imposed. Conceding, but not deciding, that the plaintiff's conduct is to be so construed, it is plain the purpose of the court was to be assured that the defendant and his associates were no longer subject to liability upon the Nebraska indebtedness. The plaintiff, perhaps, in the face of some obstruction, has fairly complied with the spirit of the order. The only object which the court could have had in view having been substantially attained, the plaintiff is entitled to judgment.

The plaintiff should recover the principal and interest of the second and third notes, and a decree should be entered for the foreclosure of his mortgage as a first lien on the mill property. He should also recover the unpaid interest on the first note and the costs of the action. On the findings of the referee the defendant is entitled to an offset which should be allowed him with interest.

The judgment of the district court is reversed, and the cause is remanded, with instruction to enter judgment according to the foregoing views.

MISSOURI PAC. RY. CO. v. BRINKMEIER.
(Supreme Court of Kansas. April 3, 1906.
On Rehearing, Jan. 11, 1908.)

1. RAILROADS — EQUIPMENT — SAFETY APPLIANCE ACT.

A railway company doing business as a common carrier, engaged in interstate commerce, has complied with the requirements of the act of Congress relating to safety appliances, enacted March 2, 1903 (Act March 2, 1903, c. 198, 27 Stat. 531 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3174], and its amendments of 1903, being chapter 976, Act March 2, 1903, 32 Stat. 943 [U. S. Comp. St. Supp. 1907, p. 885]), when it equips its cars with automatic couplers as prescribed by said act, and it will not be thereafter subject to the conditions imposed by section 8 of such enactment (27 Stat. 532 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3176]) on account of subsequent defects occurring to the couplers, which ordinary care and diligence could not have avoided.

2. MASTER AND SERVANT — PETITION — EVIDENCE — INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

A petition contained an averment which reads: "The Missouri Pacific Railway Company is and was at all the times hereinafter mentioned a corporation, * * * doing business as a railway company as a common carrier in, into, and through the counties of Sedgwick and Reno, in the state of Kansas, and into the states of Colorado, Nebraska, Missouri, Arkansas, Texas, Oklahoma, and Indian Territory." Held, that it was not error to admit evidence thereunder showing that such railway company was engaged in interstate commerce.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from District Court, Sedgwick County; Thos. C. Wilson, Judge.

Action by Henry Brinkmeier against the Missouri Pacific Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

See 77 Pac. 536.

J. H. Richards, C. E. Benton, and Smyth & Helm, for plaintiff in error. O. V. Ferguson (Kos. Harris, V. Harris, E. A. Moseley, and L. M. Walter, of counsel), for defendant in error.

GRAVES, J. Henry Brinkmeier, the defendant in error, commenced this action in the district court of Sedgwick county against the plaintiff in error to recover damages for personal injuries received while in its employment as brakeman. He recovered a judgment for $6,500, and the railway company brings the case here for review. The controlling facts are not seriously disputed. The controversy arises principally upon the construction of sections 2 and 8 of the act of Congress, enacted March 2, 1893 (Act March 2, 1893, c. 196, 27 Stat. 531, 532 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, pp. 3174, 3176]), and entitled "An act to promote the safety of employes and travelers upon railways by compelling common carriers engaged in interstate commerce to equip their cars with automatic couplers and continuous brakes and their locomotives with driving wheel brakes and for other purposes." These sections read:

"That on and after the first day of January, 1906, it shall be unlawful for any such common carrier to haul or permit to be hauled or used on its line any car used in moving interstate traffic not equipped with couplers coupling automatically by impact and which can be uncoupled without the necessity of men going between the ends of cars.

"That any employe of any such common carrier who may be injured by any locomotive, car, or train in use contrary to the provision of this act shall not be deemed thereby to have assumed the risk thereby occasioned, although continuing in the employment of such carrier after the unlawful use of such locomotive, car or train had been brought to his knowledge."

This law was amended March 2, 1903 (Act March 2, 1903, c. 976, 32 Stat. 943 [U. S. Comp. St. Supp. 1907, p. 885]), the amendment after title and preliminary clause reads: " * * * The provisions and requirements hereof, and of said acts relating to train brakes, automatic couplers, grab irons, and the height of drawbars shall be held to apply to all trains, locomotives, tenders, cars, and similar vehicles used on any railroad engaged in interstate commerce, * * * in connection therewith. * * * "

It is urged that the petition does not state a cause of action under this law; that in it there is no averment that the car which inflicted the injury was being used in moving interstate traffic, nor any statement equivalent thereto; that there are no facts stated therein which suggest a violation of this federal statute, but, on the contrary, they clearly indicate that the pleader intended to state an ordinary case of negligence. The petition contains an allegation which reads: "The Missouri Pacific Railway Company is and was at all the times hereinafter mentioned a corporation legally existing and doing business under and pursuant to the law of the state of Missouri, and doing business as a railway company as a common carrier in, into, and through the counties of Sedgwick and Reno, in the state of Kansas, and into the states of Colorado, Nebraska, Missouri, Arkansas, Texas, Oklahoma, and Indian Territory." Under this averment proof that the defendant was engaged in interstate commerce might be properly introduced. It is unnecessary to specifically mention this act of Congress in a cause of action predicated thereon. It is sufficient if the pleading contains facts which would suggest to a person familiar with such act that its provisions had been violated. Voelker v. C., M. & St. P. Ry. Co. (C. C.) 116 Fed. 867. All the coupling appliances of every railway company engaged in interstate commerce are subject to the provisions of this statute, and when it is shown that such a railroad company had a defective automatic coupler in use on one of its cars the additional averments necessary to state a cause of action are practically the same as those required in an action of ordinary negligence. We are unable therefore to hold that the petition was fatally defective as against this objection, which appears to have been first specifically presented in this court. It is expressly admitted that the car in question was engaged at the time of the injury in moving interstate traffic, and is therefore clearly within the provisions of this statute.

There is a sharp controversy between the parties as to what constitutes a compliance with section 2 of the federal statute, hereinbefore quoted. It is insisted by the defendant in error that every car used in interstate traffic must be equipped with the prescribed appliance, and at all times thereafter be in proper repair. If because of any defect therein an employé is injured, the railway company will incur the burden imposed by the provisions of section 8, however diligent it may have been in an effort to discover and repair the defect. On the other hand, it is urged that, when a car is once supplied with the appliance as required by law, the company will not in case of injury be subject to the provisions of section 8, unless it has been negligent with reference to keeping such appliance in repair. The facts upon which this controversy depends, briefly stated, are these: The plaintiff was injured while attempting, as a brakeman, to couple one car to another, each of which was equipped with an automatic coupler. One of the couplers was not in repair, being out of its proper position, and turned so that it would not properly meet the one on the other car. The brakeman while attempting to adjust the defective coupler so as to make the coupling got his foot between the couplers and received the injuries of which he complains. About a year prior to the injury the company received the car having the defective appliance, at which time the coupler was in perfect condition. When it became defective does not appear. So far as the evidence shows, the plaintiff was the first person to notice it, and he made the discovery immediately before attempting to make the coupling. Upon these facts the trial court gave the jury instructions which read: "You are instructed that under such act it was the duty of the defendant railway company, not only originally to equip its cars with automatic couplers, as required by said act, but also to keep them in proper condition so that they could at all times be coupled or uncoupled without the necessity of men going between the ends of the cars to assist in coupling or uncoupling them. And the railway company was bound to know at its peril that the coupler attached to the car in question was in proper working condition, and the fact that the defendant company may not have known of its defects or defective condition, if you find that it was defective, does not in any manner excuse its unlawful use. You are further instructed that, if you find the plaintiff has established his injuries, and you find the coupler would not couple automatically by impact, he is entitled to recover for his injury, unless you further find that the plaintiff was negligent in the premises which directly contributed toward his injury."

Under our construction of the statute these instructions are erroneous: They impose a materially greater burden upon common carriers than the law contemplates. The duty prescribed by them cannot be found in the express language of the statute, and therefore must have been placed therein by construction. If the language is open to construction, then it must be construed so as to fairly carry out the Legislative intent as described by the act. United States v. So. Pac. Ry. Co. (D. C.) 135 Fed. 122; United States v. Lacher, 134 U. S. 624, 10 Sup. Ct. 625, 33 L. Ed. 1080. In this connection it is proper to consider briefly some of the conditions which led up to the enactment of this statute. During the year ending June 30, 1891, 47 different styles of car couplers were in use, and during that year 2,660 employes were killed and 26,140 injured. Interstate Commerce Commission Report 1891. In the messages of President Harrison of 1889, 1890, 1891, and 1892 he urged the necessity of congressional action to ameliorate this wholesale destruction of human life. In his message of 1891 he said: "It is competent, I think, for Congress to require uniformity in the construction of cars used in interstate commerce, and the use of improved safety appliances upon such trains. Time will be necessary to make the needed changes, but an earnest and intelligent beginning should be made at once. It is a reproach to our civilization that any class of American workmen should, in the pursuit of a necessary and useful vocation, be subjected to a peril of life and limb as great as that of a soldier in time of war." March 2, 1893, this law was enacted. These facts, the preamble, context, and subject-matter of the act indicate with reasonable clearness that the real point aimed at by the statute was to eliminate from railroad service the old homicidal link and pin and the 46 other dangerous devices then used for coupling cars and compel the adoption of a uniform class of couplers which would reduce the loss of life among railroad employes to the minimum. In the case of Johnson v. So. Pac. Ry. Co., 196 U. S. 1, 25 Sup. Ct. 158, 49 L. Ed. 363, Fuller, C. J., in speaking upon this subject, said: "The object was to protect the lives and limbs of railroad employes by rendering it unnecessary for a man operating the couplers to go between the ends of the cars, and that object would be defeated, not necessarily by the use of automatic couplers of different kinds, but if those different kinds would not automatically couple with each other. The point was that the railroad companies should be compelled, respectively, to adopt devices, whatever they were, which would act so far uniformly as to eliminate the danger consequent on men going between the cars." In the administration of this law its manifest object should be recognized and promoted by giving full force and effect to its salutary and beneficent provisions. In the performance of this duty, however, courts cannot indulge in rules of construction which change the meaning of the law from what its framers contemplated, nor which make its requirements impractical, unreasonable, or impossible to perform. In our view, the law is satisfied as to any specific car, whenever that car has been supplied with the prescribed appliance. Whenever an automatic coupler, such as the act of Congress requires, is attached to a railway car, it stands in the same category as all other appliances and instrumentalities used by railway companies. Thereafter it is the duty of the company to use reasonable and ordinary care and diligence to keep this and all other equipments in good repair and safe condition for the use of its employes, and a failure to do so constitutes negligence. This was the law before the act of Congress was passed, and that act did not change the law in this respect. It seems reasonable to assume that, if Congress had intended to impose a special duty upon common carriers to keep a particular appliance in repair, not applicable to all, such intent would have been expressed in clear and specific terms. The construction given to this statute by the instructions of the trial court impose conditions which seem to be unreasonable and in some instances would be impossible to perform. Every railroad appliance must inevitably wear out, break and become defective, and no degree of foresight can anticipate the time when repairs will be needed. Any appliance, especially couplers, may get out of repair while cars are being moved in the yards, or on side tracks in making up a train, or while moving in a train between stations. Railroad companies are compelled to rely for information concerning defects in their appliances almost wholly upon the employes who use them. Necessarily it takes time to make repairs. No degree of diligence within the limits of a reasonable possibility would be sufficient to enable a railroad at all times and under all circumstances to keep its car couplers in such a state of repair as would prevent a brakeman disposed to encounter danger, as the plaintiff did in this case, from receiving injury. So far as the evidence shows, the coupler in question in this case may have been thrown out of place by a jam received immediately before the plaintiff discovered it, in which case it would have been impossible for the company to have known of and repaired the defect. Statutes should not be extended by constructions so as to produce such unreasonable results.

No case has been cited which can be regarded as an authority in support of the construction insisted upon. In case of U. S. v. So. Pac. Ry. Co. (D. C.) 135 Fed. 122, this question is discussed, and the opinion seems to sustain the view here contended for by the plaintiff; but in that case it was found by the court that the railroad company had been guilty of gross negligence in not discovering and repairing the defect which caused the injury. This makes the discussion wholly unnecessary to the decision of the case, and weakens its force as an authority. This decision was considered by the United States District Court of Colorado quite recently, in the case of United States v. A., T. & S. F. Ry. Co., 150 Fed. 442, in which it is said that the conclusion there reached is exceptional, a departure from the general and better rule, and has been sharply criticized. In the case last cited the court said: "These couplings will get out of repair, and it takes time to repair them. It takes time to discover whether or not they are out of repair. It is the duty of the railroad companies to use prudence and the ordinary diligence of a business man, keeping in view the purpose of this act, to keep these couplings in repair. The act construed in an intelligent and practical way would not impose on the railroad company the absolute duty every instant to have this coupling so that it would work automatically. If a coupling is out of repair, and the railway company handling the car then uses ordinary and reasonable care, considering the facilities at hand to repair the coupling and put it in repair, so that it would comply with the act, then it is not liable." We think the position of the Colorado court more reasonable and less liable to lead to impractical results. The burden of proof was upon the plaintiff to show that the defendant was negligent in having this defective appliance in use. Upon this question there is a total failure of proof. The car was placed at the saltworks two days before the injury. It was brought from there in charge of the plaintiff as brakeman. He did not discover this defect until immediately prior to the accident. There is no evidence as to when the car was last inspected, and nothing whatever appears to indicate negligence on the part of the defendant.

The jury were told by the instructions of the court that if the coupler was defective, and the plaintiff was thereby injured, a verdict against the defendant would be proper regardless of whether it had been negligent or not. This was erroneous.

The judgment is reversed, with direction to grant a new trial and proceed in accordance with the views herein expressed. All the Justices concurring.

On Rehearing.

GRAVES, J. After the opinion had been filed in this case, the Interstate Commerce Commission requested that a rehearing be granted and that it be permitted through special counsel to present an argument, both oral and printed, upon the questions involved in the case. The defendant in error joined in this request. Appreciating the deep interest taken by this national tribunal in all cases arising under the provisions of the safety appliance statute, and being anxious to receive all the light possible upon the questions involved, the rules applicable to ordinary actions were waived and the request granted. At the rehearing extended arguments and citation of authorities were presented. We have carefully examined the briefs and decisions submitted, and have reconsidered the questions discussed, but are unable to accept the contention of defendant in error as to the meaning of the federal statute when applied to the facts of this case, and therefore adhere to the opinion heretofore filed.

In the argument our attention was called to a question which was overlooked when the case was decided. It was urged before, and is insisted upon now, that the safety appliance act should not be considered, for the reason that the plaintiff's petition does not allege a violation of any of its provisions. The force of this position is found in the following facts: The injury complained of was received November 12, 1900. At that time section 2 of this statute prohibited railroad companies from hauling any car used in moving interstate traffic and not equipped with the appliance required. In 1893 the law was amended so as to make its provision apply, not to a car used in moving interstate traffic merely, but to all trains or cars used on any railroad engaged in interstate commerce. The petition does not allege that the car which caused the injury was being used in moving interstate traffic. It is therefore insufficient under the law as it stood when the injury occurred. It was held to be sufficient, however, because it contained averments which, by a very liberal construction, could be said to allege that the car by which the injury was inflicted constituted a part of a train owned and operated by a railroad company engaged in interstate commerce, which made it sufficient under the law as amended some three years after the cause of action accrued. The importance of these dates was not clearly indicated in the first argument, and was overlooked when the case was first considered. The plaintiff in error was entitled to a reversal of the judgment upon this ground alone, and the case might have been so decided if these facts had been clearly presented. We are satisfied, however, with the position taken in the opinion, and still adhere to it.

In view of the foregoing facts, we now place the judgment of reversal both upon the ground that the petition does not state a cause of action under the statute and because the trial court erred in its instruction to the jury.

CHAVES v. CITY OF ATCHISON et al.

(Supreme Court of Kansas. Jan. 11, 1908.
Rehearing Denied Feb. 14, 1908.)

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — EXTENSION OF BOUNDARIES—WHO MAY QUESTION.

The validity of proceedings taken by city officers under statutory authority extending the corporate boundaries of a city so as to annex a tract of land can only be questioned in a direct proceeding prosecuted at the instance of the state by proper public officers. Topeka v. Dwyer, 70 Kan. 244, 78 Pac. 417, followed.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from District Court, Atchison County; J. H. Gillpatrick, Judge.

Action by G. F. Chaves, for himself and others, against the city of Atchison and the mayor and council of such city. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Henry Elliston, for plaintiff in error. W. A. Jackson, for defendant in error.

JOHNSTON, C. J. In this case G. F. Chaves, for himself and others similarly situated, questions the validity of the annexation of territory to the city of Atchison. The question arises on a ruling sustaining a demurrer to his amended petition, in which it was alleged that in 1860 the land was platted and annexed to the city as "Spring Garden Addition," but that subsequently the addition was vacated and restored to the condition of unplatted land. Later several attempts were made to again bring the land within the city, which the courts held to be ineffectual. Still later, and on August 18, 1905, the mayor and council of the city passed an ordinance in due form, which treated the tract as platted territory and purported to annex it to the city. The ordinance was approved and published. Since that time the officers of the city have assumed that the tract was within the corporate limits, and claim the right to exercise authority and control by establishing lights, opening and working streets and alleys, building walks, assessing real and personal property, and exercising the same dominion and control over the land which they might if it were legally brought within the limits of the city. Chaves owns and resides upon the tract of land so annexed, and he asks that the city and its officers be enjoined from imposing city taxes on persons and property upon the land in question, and from improving or controlling the streets, walks, or highways on the addition, and from exercising authority and control as if it were a part of the city. The theory of the court in sustaining the demurrer to the petition is said to have been that the corporate organization of the city, including the extension of its limits, could not be questioned in a collateral proceeding, nor at the suit of private parties. Specific legislative authority has been given for extending the corporate boundaries of cities of the first class so as to include adjoining territory and make it a part of the city. Laws 1903, p. 179, c. 122, § 9. In this act, the validity of which is not challenged, provision is made for annexing three classes of lands: First, land adjoining or touching the city limits which has been subdivided into blocks or lots; second, any unplatted land lying within or mainly within the city; third, a tract of platted or unplatted land, not exceeding 20 acres in area, having a boundary line two-thirds of which lies upon or touches the boundary line of the city. It thus appears that there was statutory authority for adding territory to the city. It was empowered to take in either platted or unplatted land, in large or small tracts, lands which lie wholly or mainly within the city limits, and lands which lie upon or touch its boundaries. It is alleged, it is true, that the tract was not legally annexed, but there is undoubted jurisdiction in the mayor and council to make a legal annexation by the passage of an ordinance. An ordinance has been passed in fair form purporting to enlarge the boundaries of the city and making the addition in question a part of the city, and since that time the city has been exercising municipal authority over the addition and the people residing there. The validity of the corporate existence of the city as originally organized, or as reorganized by the extension of its boundaries, cannot be questioned by private parties. It has been held that the extension of corporate limits to include new territory, under statutory authority, is, in effect, a reorganization of the city; that the act of annexation involves the corporate integrity of the city, and is not open to collateral attack; and that its validity cannot be questioned by any party other than the state any more than can the validity of the original organization of the city. Topeka v. Dwyer, 70 Kan. 244, 78 Pac. 471. In that case the question presented here was examined with great care, the prior decisions of our own and other courts were cited and considered, and what was there said must be regarded as decisive of the case at bar. In the still later case of Railway Co. v. Lyon County, 72 Kan. 16, 82 Pac. 519, 84 Pac. 1031, the same principle was affirmed and applied. We are therefore not warranted in considering whether the steps taking the tract of land into the city were legal or not. The objections which the plaintiff makes can only be considered in a direct proceeding prosecuted at the instance of the state by the Attorney General or county attorney.

Judgment affirmed.

MARTIN et al. v. HOFFMAN.

(Supreme Court of Kansas. Jan. 11, 1908.

Rehearing Denied Feb. 14, 1908.)

1. TRIAL—FINDINGS.

A general finding in favor of either party is a finding in his favor of all facts necessary to constitute his claim.

2. APPEAL—REVIEW—EVIDENCE.

The evidence upon which a finding is made cannot be reviewed in this court, except so far as may be necessary to determine whether there was competent evidence sufficient to support the finding.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from District Court, Phillips County; A. C. T. Gelger, Judge.

Action by Ellen K. Hoffman against L. T. Martin and Ella H. Martin. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Affirmed.

C. A. Lewis and Kennett & Gant, for plaintiffs in error. W. A. Barron and Mahin & Mahin, for defendant in error.

BENSON, J. The defendant in error, Ellen K. Hoffman, commenced this action against the plaintiffs in error, her daughter and her daughter's husband, to quiet her title to a tract of land, alleging that she was the owner and in possession thereof. The answer contained a general denial, and a statement in substance that upon the death of Mr. Hoffman, the plaintiff's husband, it was verbally agreed that the plaintiff, his widow, should have all his property during her life, and that then it should become the property of her daughter, the defendant Ella Martin; that after this understanding, however, a will was found giving the entire property to the widow, except certain notes against L. T. Martin, which were given to his wife, Ella; that by co-operation of all the parties the land in question was purchased by them jointly, the plaintiff contributing $2,500, and the defendants $1,000, of the consideration, under an arrangement that they should occupy it together; that they accordingly took possession of the land, and so occupied it jointly, treating it as their joint property, but that defendants accounted to the plaintiff for the present use thereof, the defendants making large improvements thereon of which no accurate account was kept; that in the year 1904 the plaintiff removed to another state, the defendants remaining in possession, the plaintiff giving to them an instrument as follows: "Long Island, Kansas. July 19, 1904. This is to certify that I have rented my farm, the northeast quarter section 23, township 1, range 20, to L. T. Martin and Ella H. Martin, and they can make any improvements necessary to their comfort or that is required on place, it being understood between me and my daughter Ella that the place is to be hers at my death. But if I should sell the place I must first pay them for any improvements whatsoever that they have put on the place. Ellen K. Hoffman." The answer further stated that L. T. Martin was elected county clerk in 1904, and after consultation with the plaintiff rented the premises for $600 per year, of which she (the plaintiff) was to have $500, and that the tenant had been in possession since March 1, 1905, but that the tenant refused to pay the rent for 1905, because he had been notified by the plaintiff that he must not do so. The defendants further alleged that they had treated the plaintiff as children should treat a parent, and were desirous of preserving the premises as a home for her in her declining years, as was the intention it should be, and that it should remain to the defendant Ella Martin when the plaintiff was done with the use of it. The reply included a general denial, and a statement that in making such purchase the defendants had furnished a house and lot which was put in at $1,000, under a verbal contract that the plaintiff should pay them $1,000 therefor, which she had paid in full. The tenant intervened in the action, reciting his promise to pay $600 rent, that both parties claimed it, and asking for the orders of the court thereon. Before the trial, on motion of the plaintiff, the court ordered the clerk to pay her $300 out of the rents paid in by the tenant, which was done. The judgment was for the plaintiff.

The plaintiff in error asks for reversal for error in allowing such payment of rent to the plaintiff below, and because of alleged erroneous rulings concerning evidence, and in overruling the demurrer to the evidence, in rendering final judgment, and in refusing a new trial. Upon the pleadings, and the admission that the title to the farm was taken in the name of the plaintiff, two principal issues of fact were presented, viz., whether the plaintiff was in possession when the suit was brought, and whether the $1,000, admitted to have been furnished by the defendants, was advanced upon an agreement that they were to have a present interest in the land therefor, as alleged in the answer, or whether that sum was to be repaid to them, as alleged in the reply. As stated by plaintiff in error, "this is the storm center around which all the evidence hovered." This was the vital question upon the merits of the case. If the Martins put in their house and lot to assist Mrs. Hoffman in making up the consideration upon her agreement to pay them $1,000 therefor, and she did afterwards pay it, then they cannot hold an interest in the land merely because they furnished part of the consideration. If on the other hand they so contributed this amount in pursuance of an agreement to purchase the land jointly for the use and benefit of all, then it may be urged that Mrs. Hoffman holds the title as a trustee to the extent of their interest. This issue, however, was determined against the defendants by the general finding for the plaintiff. It was, as conceded, an important issue under the pleadings, and, no special findings being asked, it was resolved against them by the general finding for the plaintiff. A general finding in favor of either party is a finding in his favor for all of the facts necessary to constitute his claim or defense. Bixby v. Bailey, 11 Kan. 359. It was necessary for the plaintiff to prove that she was in possession. This she alleged and the defendants denied. This issue was also determined in her favor by the general finding. This finding established generally the plaintiff's title and possession, and, if no other interest was shown in the defendants, was sufficient to support the judgment. In the argument counsel for the defendants urge that their clients had an interest to the extent of $500 and more for improvements, and refer to the last clause in the instrument of July 19, 1904, as supporting that claim. No such interest, however, was pleaded. The only reference to this matter in the answer, aside from the recital in the agreement copied therein, was this clause: " * * * And making large improvements thereon by defendant L. T. Martin, of which no accurate account was kept." This was not pleading an interest based on improvements, but was matter of inducement in the statement of the general claim, based on the alleged joint purchase and resulting common ownership, which claim, as we have seen, was disposed of by the finding. If the clause in the instrument of July 19, 1904, "If I should sell the place I must first pay them for any improvements whatsoever that they have put on the place," should be construed to give them the right of possession until such payments were made, then it appears that they voluntarily yielded such possession. The evidence clearly shows that the defendants urged Mrs. Hoffman to lease the place to another, informing her of their intention to leave, and advising that the place should not be left vacant. In referring to the amount for which they said they had leased the place and in obtaining her consent thereto, they made no claim for any part of the rent, and made no suggestion of any possible lien for improvements, although they did at another time ask for a note for the amount they claimed to have expended for that purpose. It is true that Mr. Martin executed the lease in his own name, but there was nothing in the correspondence to indicate to Mrs. Hoffman his intention to do so, nor did he report that fact to her, and, when asked for the lease, failed to send it, or a copy of it. In the circumstances Mrs. Martin was amply warranted in supposing that the lease had been executed in her own name, and that the rents were hers. The evidence upon which the general finding for the plaintiff was based cannot be reviewed in this court, except so far as to determine whether there was competent evidence sufficient to support the finding. Donaldson v. Everhart, 50 Kan. 718, 82 Pac. 405; Briggs v. Brown, 53 Kan. 229, 86 Pac. 334; Railroad Co. v. Swarts, 58 Kan. 235, 48 Pac. 953.

Complaint is made of the rulings of the court in the admission of evidence. On cross-examination of the plaintiff as a witness she identified a letter written by her, and was then asked, "And in that letter you say—" At that point an objection was made, and the objection was sustained. The purpose of counsel in asking the question was not disclosed, but they now say in their brief that "every word written in that letter might have been repeated to the witness and she asked whether that was her statement at that time." But she had said so in effect, for she had admitted that she had written it. If they meant to repeat parts of the letter and then ask if she made the statements so repeated, then the rule as stated in Greenleaf applies, viz.: "And if he (the witness) admits the letter to be his writing, he cannot be asked whether statements, such as the counsel may suggest, are contained in it, but the whole letter itself must be read as the only competent evidence of that fact." 1 Greenleaf, Ev. § 403; Jones on Ev. §§ 232, 850; Glenn v. Gleason et al., Ex'rs, 61 Iowa, 28, 15 N. W. 659. Notwithstanding this rule it may be that, where the purpose of counsel is to use an extract from the writing as a basis for some inquiry fairly tending to test the witness' memory or credibility, it ought in the exercise of a wise discretion to be permitted. Wigmore on Evidence, §§ 1259, 1260. No such purpose, however, was indicated, and, counsel having read the letter in evidence, no injury could have resulted from the ruling, and under the authorities there was no error in this respect. The same witness over the objection of the defendant was allowed to testify that she was "living on the premises when the suit was commenced." This was objected to as a conclusion. It is true that her possession was an issue in the case. Still we think that where she was living was a fact. Yet if it was a mere conclusion from other facts, they were also given. Thus she related when she went to the farm that her household goods were there, and that she ate and slept there. Some other minor objections to testimony were made, but we find no error in the rulings thereon.

Error is also predicated upon the order allowing the plaintiff to receive $300 of the money paid into court by the tenant. As the defendants admitted that $500 of this fund belonged to her, it is clear that they were not prejudiced by the order.

Upon an examination of the record, we conclude that the case was fairly tried, that the rights of all the parties were properly protected, and that there was no error in the proceedings prejudicial to the plaintiffs in error.

The judgment is affirmed.

FEDERAL BETTERMENT CO. v. REEVES.

(Supreme Court of Kansas. Jan. 11, 1908.

Rehearing Denied Feb. 14, 1908.)

1. PLEADING—AMENDED PLEADINGS—NECESSITY FOR AMENDMENT.

An application for leave to amend a petition, made when the case is called for trial, may properly be denied where it is not made to appear that the proposed amendments are material and the reasonable necessity thereof is not shown.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 39, Pleading, §§ 653-675.]

2. EVIDENCE—OPINION—BODILY APPEARANCE OR CONDITION.

In an action to recover damages for personal injuries, corporal appearances and conduct, as indicating health or the lack of it, are relevant, and such ordinary indications may be testified to by any competent person who was in a situation to know. Such appearances and the ability to labor before and after the injury are ordinarily proper to be considered in determining the extent of the hurt.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 20, Evidence, §§ 2237-2241.]

3. DAMAGES—EVIDENCE—HEALTH AND PHYSICAL CONDITION.

Where it is claimed that the disability from such injury continues, the limits of time covered by such evidence must depend on the circumstances of each case, and the probability of intervening changes, and must be left to the wise discretion of the trial judge.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 15, Damages, § 482.]

4. EVIDENCE—RES GESTÆ—EXCLAMATIONS OF PAIN.

Where the bodily condition of a person is a subject of inquiry, exclamations of present pain or suffering made by the party who claims to have been injured may be received in evidence in connection with his appearance and conduct, where they appear to be the natural and spontaneous expressions of present feeling.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 20, Evidence, §§ 377-382.]

5. SAME—INTRODUCED BY ADVERSE PARTY.

Where the existence of a corporation is denied by the defendant, any insufficiency in the proof of that fact offered by the plaintiff is immaterial, where the plaintiff has in the same action supplied such proof and filed in the court a copy of its charter.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 20, Evidence, § 2420; vol. 12, Corporations, § 2087.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from District Court, Neosho County; L. Stillwell, Judge.

Personal injury action by John W. Reeves against the Federal Betterment Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Burnham & Dashiell (C. S. Denison, of counsel), for plaintiff in error. W. R. Cline, for defendant in error.

BENSON, J. A former judgment in this action was reversed. Betterment Co. v. Reeves, 73 Kan. 107, 84 Pac. 500. Upon a new trial the plaintiff below, John W. Reeves, again recovered, and this proceeding is brought by the company to review the proceedings upon such second trial. The facts are fully stated in the former opinion. The negligence charged is, in brief, the failure of the company engaged in furnishing gas to place a regulator on its lateral line leading from its high pressure main to the meter in the factory where the plaintiff was working, thereby causing an explosion and resulting in personal injuries to the plaintiff. Various errors are assigned.

The first error complained of is the refusal of the court to sustain a motion for further security for costs. This motion was first presented when the case was called for trial. There was no error in this ruling. The court in its discretion might well refuse to entertain such a motion at that time. Besides, the judgment being against the moving party, he is not prejudicially affected by such ruling. Wilcox v. Byington, 36 Kan. 212, 12 Pac. 826. At the same time the defendant below asked leave to amend its answer, but the nature of the proposed amendment was not shown, nor any reason why an earlier application had not been made. In these circumstances, it does not appear that the refusal of the court to permit such amendment was erroneous. Such applications are made to the discretion of the court, and the reasons upon which they are asked ought to be frankly stated, and the reasonable necessity thereof shown. To secure a reversal upon that ground it must affirmatively appear that the amendments refused were material and proper to be made. Byington v. Com'rs of Saline Co., 37 Kan. 654, 16 Pac. 105.

The next complaint, and the one principally relied upon, is against the rulings of the court upon the evidence offered by the plaintiff. These objections to testimony may be resolved into two groups or classes: First, to the testimony offered to show that plaintiff was a strong able-bodied man, capable of doing regular manual labor before the injury, and that he was infirm and his ability to thus labor was impaired after the injuries; and, second, to the evidence of exclamations or utterances of pain given by the plaintiff at various times after the alleged injury. The evidence tended to show that the plaintiff was thrown several feet by the explosion of the meter, and suffered an injury to his head and ear, affecting his general health, causing pain, and impairing his physical powers; and it was claimed that such injuries were permanent in their effects. To substantiate this claim, his physical condition before the injury was shown by those who had the opportunity to know, and also the fact that he worked in toilsome occupations was allowed. His appearance before and after the injuries, as to health and strength, was also testified to. All this was objected to, but the evidence was properly received. Corporal appearances and conduct, as indicating health or the lack of it, are relevant, and such ordinary indications may be testified to by any competent person who was in a situation to know. The looks, appearance, and conduct of a person, his ability to labor before and after an alleged injury, are ordinarily competent in determining the effect and extent of the hurt. Wigmore on Evidence, §§ 100, 223, 225, 568. In many cases a witness, although not an expert, may be permitted to state the result of his observation, notwithstanding it involves in a sense his opinion or judgment, such as the apparent health of a person or other characteristic manifest to the apprehension of a common observer. Robinson v. Exempt Fire Co., 103 Cal. 1, 36 Pac. 955, 24 L. R. A. 715, 42 Am. St. Rep. 93. One who is in a situation to know may testify to the fact whether another is competent to perform manual labor before and after an injury. Lawson v. Conway, 37 W. Va. 159, 16 S. E. 564, 18 L. R. A. 627, 38 Am. St. Rep. 17. In Chicago City Ry. Co. v. Van Vleck, 143 Ill. 480, 32 N. E. 262, an action to recover for personal injuries suffered in a collision, the court said;

"It was one of the contentions of appellant at the trial that the permanent injuries for which appellee sought to recover damages in this suit were not occasioned by the collision under investigation, but were caused by being dragged while holding fast to the hand rail of a street car in 1877, 10 years prior to the collision of August 2, 1887. In that connection many of the relatives, neighbors, and acquaintances of appellee testified in regard to her state of health, hearing, eyesight, ability to work and walk, and use her arms and legs naturally and without trouble during the intervening 10 years. Appellant objected to all testimony of this kind, and now insists that said witnesses were incompetent to testify in regard to such matters because they were not experts, physicians, and surgeons. We think the objection is without merit and untenable. We do not see why persons who were familiarly associated with appellee, and came in frequent contact with her, were not capable of knowing whether she was in good or bad health, whether her hearing was good and acute or otherwise, whether her eyesight was defective or not, whether or not she was lame, and whether she had the free and natural use of her hands or not, even though such persons were not scientific experts in matters relating to the human anatomy. In our opinion they were competent to testify to what they knew from their own personal observation." The reasons for the admission of such evidence are stated in 1 Greenleaf on Evidence, § 441b, and may be thus summarized: Experts may testify either from their own knowledge of the person or matter, or from facts stated to them. Other witnesses who have had the means of observation, and yet cannot adequately state all the data, so as to put the jury completely in the witnesses' place, may give the result of their observation in matters of this character.

The defendant company complains of the fact that such inquiries were extended over a considerable period of time; but it is claimed here that the disability continued, and the limits of time over which such evidence may range must depend on the circumstances of the case, as to the probability of intervening changes, and must ordinarily be left to the discretion of the trial judge. In this instance it does not appear that such discretion was unwisely exercised.

Numerous objections were made to testimony repeating the utterances and exclamations of the plaintiff indicating pain and suffering. On the former hearing the reversal was based on a ruling allowing a medical witness to give his opinion based partially upon the history of the case, and partially upon his examination. Following the rule in A. T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Frazier, 27 Kan. 463, it was held that such evidence was inadmissible. In the opinion, however, it was said: "A physician may testify to the condition of the patient as he found him, whether suffering from pain, and to utterances or exclamations of pain. * * *" The narrative or history of the case given by the patient and opinions based thereon are excluded, but his exclamations and utterances indicating present pain and suffering, in connection with his appearance and conduct, are properly received. Where exclamations and utterances appear to be the natural and spontaneous expressions of present pain or suffering, they may be testified to by a professional witness, or by a layman who heard them, and observed the manner and appearance of the person. In such circumstances they are sometimes characterized as verbal acts. They are outward signs of an inward state, such expressions as usually and naturally accompany the feeling so revealed, and therefore competent for a jury to consider, with all the attendant circumstances. Where the bodily condition of a person is a relevant fact, exclamations of present pain or distress are competent circumstantial evidence of the existence of the particular bodily conditions. 16 Cyc. 1164. The admissibility of such evidence is not limited to the time or about the time of the injury. Concerning this it has been held: "Where, however, it becomes important to illustrate the physical or mental condition of an individual, either at the time an injury is received, or from thence to the time of inquiry as to its severity, effect, and nature, we think expressions or declarations of present existing pain or malady, whether made at the time the injury is received, or subsequent to it, are admissible in evidence. * * * Expressions of present existing pain, and of its locality, are exceptions to the general rule which excludes hearsay evidence. They are admitted upon the ground of necessity, as being the only means of determining whether pain or suffering is endured by another. Whether feigned or not is a question for the jury. Such declarations and expressions are competent, regardless of the person to whom they are made. They are especially competent and of more weight when made to a physician for the purpose of receiving treatment, or to a medical expert who makes an examination at the request of the opposite party, or by the direction of a court, for the purpose of basing an opinion upon as to the physical situation of the person whose condition is the subject of inquiry." C., C. & I. R. Co. v. Newell, 104 Ind. 264, 3 N. E. 836, 54 Am. Rep. 313. The rule under consideration was expressed by Justice Valentine thus: "That whenever evidence is introduced tending to show a real injury or a real cause for suffering or pain, as in this case, the declarations of the party concerning such suffering or pain while it exists, and as simply making known an existing fact, should be allowed to go to the jury for what they are worth, and the jury in such a case should be allowed to weigh them and to determine their value." A., T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Johns, 36 Kan. 769, 782, 14 Pac. 237, 59 Am. Rep. 609. In applying this rule everything in the nature of a narrative of past experiences or suffering should be carefully excluded, and the evidence confined strictly to such complaints, expressions, and exclamations as furnish evidence of present existing pain or malady. Insurance Company v. Mosley, 75 U. S. 397, 19 L. Ed. 437; Wigmore on Evidence, § 1718, and note.

The plaintiff was asked as a witness what effect the injury had on the veins of his leg. This was objected to. If the question was improper, the ruling of the court was certainly correct. The ruling was: "He can describe the condition so far as he knows." And the answer was a simple description of conditions. A witness was asked: "Whether he knew that Mr. Reeves had been ailing, or what his general condition of health was." This was an unprofessional witness, and the objection might properly have been sustained, especially to the last part of the question. On cross-examination the witness testified that: "All I knew about the plaintiff's suffering was what he told me." Thus the jury had, almost immediately after the answer was given, the confession of the witness as to his only means of knowledge, and could weigh the evidence accordingly. The defendant did not move to strike out the former answer, as he might properly have done after the witness had disclosed his lack of personal knowledge. We do not say that it is necessary to move to strike out improper evidence given after a proper objection had been interposed, but, where a witness appears to have sufficient knowledge of a fact inquired about, and is therefore permitted to answer, if it is afterwards shown that he did not have such knowledge, a motion should be made to strike out the answer, and thus call the attention of the court to the lack of information of the witness.

The superintendent of the gas plant at Erie, who testified that he was familiar with the use of gas meters such as that placed in the factory where it was alleged the injury occurred, was allowed to testify that a regulator was necessary upon the connecting line between the main and the meter. This was objected to on the ground that the question called for a conclusion. This was a matter not within the common knowledge of the jury, requiring peculiar knowledge and skill, and the witness appeared to be competent to give an opinion that would be helpful in arriving at the truth. No objection was made to the form of the question, and the opinion of the witness was in harmony with the allegations of the answer filed by the defendant, and so was not prejudicial. The answer alleged that "the plaintiff was expressly informed of the danger to persons, and the damage that might be occasioned to property, if the gas should be turned on before placing in such position such regulator." The issue was not made as to the necessity of the regulator, but upon the warning given against operating without it.

It is not necessary to consider in further detail the numerous objections to evidence. The observations already made, we think, fairly cover all that need be referred to.

Another question is presented. The petition alleged that the defendant was a corporation "duly organized and licensed, and is doing business under and by virtue of the laws of the state of Kansas." The answer contained a general denial, and was verified. On the trial the plaintiff offered in evidence a certificate of the Secretary of State that the defendant company, a West Virginia corporation, was authorized to do business in this state. The defendant objected to this, but the court received it in evidence. This ruling, however, was immaterial. The record shows that the court took judicial notice of such incorporation from the fact that upon a motion to set aside the service of summons in the action the defendant had filed an affidavit and a copy of its charter thus proving that it was duly incorporated. Having thus proved its own corporate existence in such a proceeding in the action, the defendant cannot now properly complain of the insufficiency of the proof of that fact.

The judgment is affirmed. All the Justices concurring.

UPDEGRAFF et al. v. LUCAS, Sheriff, et al.
(Supreme Court of Kansas. Nov. 9, 1907.)

1. PLEADING—PETITION—DEMURRER.

A petition which otherwise states a cause of action is not subject to demurrer for the reason that it seeks to recover more or different relief than that to which plaintiff is entitled.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 39, Pleading, § 439.]

2. JUDGMENT — DOMINANT JUDGMENT — INJUNCTION.

Injunction will lie to enjoin an execution upon a dormant judgment. The plaintiff in such an action does not thereby seek to use the statute of limitations as a sword, but as a shield, to protect something which the law has already given him—the right not to have his property taken upon a void process.

3. SAME—EXECUTION—INJUNCTION.

A judgment becomes dormant upon the death of the judgment creditor, although the action was prosecuted by one having no beneficial interest therein, and the judgment belongs, in fact, to another; and, under such circumstances, where no proceedings to revive the judgment have been taken within one year after the death of plaintiff in the action, an execution issued upon the judgment is void and may be enjoined.

Error from District Court, Shawnee County; A. W. Dana, Judge.

Action by O. P. Updegraff and another against A. T. Lucas, sheriff, and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs bring error. Reversed.

Quinton & Quinton, for plaintiffs in error.
James E. Larimer and J. G. Slonecker, for defendants in error.

PORTER, J. This proceeding in error raises the sufficiency of a petition and answer and various rulings of the court thereon. Plaintiffs in error were plaintiffs below. Their petition was filed January 31, 1905, by which it was sought to enjoin a sheriff's sale. It was supported by affidavits, and the temporary injunction was allowed by the court on the same day. Subsequently, upon motion, the court required plaintiffs to state separately and number their causes of action, and an amended petition was filed. This petition alleged that plaintiffs owned certain real estate in the city of Topeka; that they were defendants in a suit to foreclose a mortgage in the district court of Shawnee county in which Maria H. Hotchkiss was plaintiff, and in which, on January 26, 1900, she recovered judgment against them; that the real estate covered by the mortgage had been sold under the foreclosure, leaving a balance due thereon of $220 which had not been paid; that Maria H. Hotchkiss, plaintiff in the foreclosure proceeding, died in the city of New York on the 10th day of November, 1901, without leaving any last will and testament; that an administrator of her estate was duly appointed in December, 1901; that the judgment rendered in the foreclosure action was never revived nor made a lien upon plaintiffs' real estate, and thereby became and was dormant; that notwithstanding the dormancy of the judgment defendants, in violation of the rights of plaintiffs, and in order to subject them to the annoyance of a suit at law for the protection of their property, had sued out an execution on the judgment in December, 1904, directed to the sheriff of Shawnee county; and that the sheriff in obedience thereto levied upon the real estate belonging to plaintiffs and advertised the same for sale, and, that unless restrained by the court, would on a certain day sell the same at sheriff's sale to satisfy the execution. It was also alleged that the judgment constituted a cloud on plaintiff's real estate. In the prayer for relief plaintiffs asked that their title to the real estate be established against the adverse claims of defendants, and that defendants be barred and forever estopped from claiming any right or title adverse to plaintiffs in plaintiff's real estate, and that defendants be enjoined by the order of the court from proceeding any further in the action, and for costs. To this an answer was filed, which admitted the death of Maria H. Hotchkiss, but alleged that she only appeared to be plaintiff in the foreclosure proceedings, and that the real parties in interest were Charles H. Bissell and Wm. L. Bissell; that long before the foreclosure proceedings were commenced Maria H. Hotchkiss, by a deed of trust, a copy of which is attached to the answer, had conveyed all her interest in the note and mortgage to them as trustees, and had authorized them by the deed of trust to maintain an action in her name thereon, and that the cause of action, although prosecuted in the name of Maria H. Hotchkiss, was, in fact, the cause of action of Charles H. Bissell and Wm. L. Bissell who were then and ever since have been and are now the owners of the estate and property rights, real and personal, of Maria H. Hotchkiss, and of the judgment rendered in her name; that the foreclosure had been commenced long after the acceptance by them of the trust created by the deed of trust. Plaintiffs demurred to the answer. The court overruled the demurrer as to the answer, and carried the demurrer back to the petition and sustained it. Afterwards another petition was filed setting up the same facts, except that it omitted certain allegations in the former with reference to damages sustained, and asked that the injunction be made perpetual. This the court ordered stricken from the files on the ground that it was inconsistent with the former petitions and constituted a departure. The court made an order dissolving the temporary injunction, and rendered judgment against plaintiffs for costs.

The merits of the controversy can best be determined by considering the sufficiency of the petition and answer. It is the contention of defendants in error that the petition is demurrable, because it sets up an affirmative cause of action, based upon the statute of limitations, and such appears to be the conclusion reached by the court. There are cases holding that equity will not enjoin an execution upon a dormant judgment. See cases in 16 A. & E. Enc. of Law, 404. We fail to find in any of them, however, a suggestion that the action cannot be maintained because plaintiff thereby seeks to use the statute of limitations as a sword instead of a shield, or seeks affirmative relief based upon the statute. They proceed upon the theory that plaintiff has an adequate remedy at law by motion in the original action to recall the execution, or, as in Hanson v. Johnson, 20 Minn. 194 (Gil. 172), that a sale under such an execution would not cast any cloud on plaintiff's land. The weight of authority, however, is that an action will lie to enjoin an execution on a dormant judgment, notwithstanding plaintiff may have a different remedy by proceeding by motion in the original action. See cases cited in 16 A. & E. Enc. of Law, supra; Freeman on Judgments, 497.

By this proceeding plaintiffs do not seek to use the statute for the purpose of securing anything except that to which they are already entitled. They seek to hold what the law has already given them—the right to their property as against a void execution. The prayer for relief does not determine the nature or extent of the relief to which plaintiffs are entitled. It is not a part of the cause of action in that sense. Smith v. Smith, 67 Kan. 841, 73 Pac. 56, and cases cited. The law determines the relief to which a plaintiff is entitled upon the facts averred; nor does a petition become demurrable because from its averments it seeks to recover more than plaintiff is entitled to, if it otherwise states a cause of action. The petition alleged that an execution had been issued upon a dormant judgment, and that unless restrained by the court the sheriff would proceed to sell at public sale the real estate belonging to plaintiffs. The fact that it contained other averments upon which plaintiffs asked that their title be quieted against the judgment does not affect the former averments. We think the petition stated a good cause of action, and that the court erred in sustaining the demurrer.

The demurrer to the answer should have been sustained. None of the facts stated therein could affect the dormancy of the judgment. The statute declares the conditions which render a judgment dormant, and provides the manner in which it may be revived. Sections 430, 433, 434, 480, Code Civ. Proc. (Gen. St. 1905, §§ 5328, 5331, 5332); Seeley v. Johnson, 61 Kan. 337, 59 Pac. 631, 78 Am. St. Rep. 314. There is no exception provided by which a judgment in the name of one person shall be kept alive after his death by a showing that the cause of action, or the judgment in which it merged, belonged, in fact, to another.

The court erred in dissolving the temporary injunction and in striking from the files the petition of plaintiffs.

For these reasons, the judgment must be reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings in accordance herewith.

MISSOURI, K. & T. RY. CO. v. QUINLAN.
(Supreme Court of Kansas, Jan. 11, 1908.
Rehearing Denied Feb. 14, 1908.)

MASTER AND SERVANT—INJURY TO SERVANT—NEGLECT—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—DEFECTIVE APPLIANCES—FELLOW SERVANTS.

The plaintiff, a skilled machinist employed by the defendant, was engaged in the work of chipping a casting. He held a handled chisel, while a helper struck it with a plainly defective sledgehammer supplied by the defendant. A sliver of steel broke from the head of the sledge, flew into plaintiff's eye, and destroyed his vision. Under all the circumstances of the case stated at length in the opinion, it is held:

(1) The defendant was guilty of actionable negligence.

(2) No duty rested upon the plaintiff to inspect the helper's sledge or to observe its defective condition. He could assume the defendant had performed its duty and had furnished the helper a proper tool.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 34, Master and Servant, §§ 675-677, 710-722.]

(3) The failure on the part of the plaintiff to observe the sledge did not constitute contributory negligence. He could be negligent only in case he saw the sledge or under the circumstances must have seen it.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 34, Master and Servant, §§ 675-677, 710-722.]

(4) The plaintiff and the helper were not fellow servants.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 34, Master and Servant, §§ 449-492.]

(5) The plaintiff did not assume the risk of injury from the sledge.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 34, Master and Servant, §§ 610-622.]

(6) The question whether the plaintiff saw the sledge or under the circumstances must have seen it was for the jury to determine.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 34, Master and Servant, §§ 1072-1077.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from District Court, Labette County; Thos. J. Flannely, Judge.

Action by John J. Quinlan against the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Jno. Madden and W. W. Brown, for plaintiff in error. W. D. Atkinson, for defendant in error.

BURCH, J. The plaintiff was a skilled machinist employed by the defendant to work in its shops at Parsons. He was directed to fit a large casting known as a "smokestack saddle" upon the rounded top of the smoke arch of a locomotive. To do this, it was necessary to chip off portions of the casting. The plaintiff marked lines on the casting to guide him in dressing it, and secured it to a bench to hold it in position. He then held a handled chisel, while a helper struck it with a sledge; the chisel being readjusted with reference to the marks on the casting after each blow. Just as the plaintiff was completing the preliminaries to the work of chipping the casting a helper named Fogleman appeared to do the sledging, bringing with him a sledge of his own selection from a collection of tools supplied to helpers by the defendant. The helper was sent to the work by a foreman without direction from the plaintiff. The sledge was too highly tempered, and therefore brittle. There were old breaks in each face of it. It was defective and dangerous, and soon after work was begun a sliver of steel broke from it, flew into the plaintiff's left eye, and destroyed his vision. The plaintiff sued for damages, and recovered. In this proceeding in error it is alleged that the petition stated no cause of action; that no cause of action was proved; that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence; that he assumed the risk of the injury which he suffered; that certain instructions given to the jury were inapplicable, because they left to the jury questions which the court should have determined as matters of law; and that the defendant is entitled to judgment on special findings returned by the jury. The petition stated the nature of plaintiff's employment, his duties, the circumstances of the injury, and contained the following allegations: "That said sledgehammer so used by the said James W. Fogleman was by defendant supplied and furnished to the servants and employes of defendant engaged as helpers to machinists, for their use in the work about said repair and machine shops of defendant; that said sledgehammer was improperly and too highly tempered; was hard and brittle; would break and sliver off when used; was because thereof not reasonably safe for use; and was because thereof a dangerous and defective tool for use, which facts from the use and from the appearance of said hammer were well known to defendant, or by the exercise of ordinary care might have been known to defendant." It is said that this simple charge of knowledge and of means and opportunity for knowledge on the part of the defendant demolished the plaintiff's cause of action. The argument runs thus: The knowledge of the defendant as to the condition of the sledge was no greater than that of the plaintiff. If the defects in the hammer could be ascertained by use and appearance, the plaintiff, "who was the last to see the hammer in use before his injury," could have ascertained them. He was called upon for his own protection to make observations and take precautions respecting the tool, particularly since the defects were ascertainable by use and from appearance; and no greater duty in this respect rested upon the defendant than upon the plaintiff.

The same argument is made in discussing the sufficiency of the evidence, the negligence of the plaintiff, assumption of risk, the pertinency of the instructions, and the effect of the special findings. It is continually asserted that the plaintiff owed the duty of scrutinizing his helper's hammer, that he was obliged to know, because of the use and appearance of the tool, if it was safe, and that the defendant's duty of observation rose no higher than that of the plaintiff. Since the argument is based upon a fallacy which permeates the entire brief for the defendant, it may as well be disposed of now and once for all. No duty rested upon the plaintiff to make an independent investigation of the sledge which the helper brought to the work for the purpose of ascertaining if it was safe for use. It was the master's duty to provide the helper with a fit tool. It was not incumbent upon the plaintiff to stop his work to see if that duty had been performed. He could rest upon the assumption that the master would not permit a helper to appear with a defective sledge. Therefore, unless his attention was, in fact, drawn to the imperfections of the sledge, or unless the sledge was so obtruded upon his gaze that he could not but observe it, the injury could not be charged to any want of care or breach of duty on his part. These principles are fundamental in the law of master and servant, and it is merely carrying coals to Newcastle to cite authorities for them. However, the case of Buoy v. Milling Co., 68 Kan. 436, 75 Pac. 466, is instructive. The facts are stated in the opinion as follows: "James Buoy, an employé of the Clyde Milling & Elevator Company, who was assisting in the construction of a warehouse, was injured by the fall of a negligently constructed scaffold. * * *

Miller, the general manager of the company, employed Richa to complete the building, and told him that he would send Buoy around to help him. According to plaintiff's testimony, Richa had worked some time, and had practically completed the scaffold, when Buoy arrived at the building. Buoy inquired if the scaffold was safe, and the reply of Richa was that it could not be pulled down with a team. Plaintiff went upon the scaffold with Richa, and within a few minutes it fell to the ground, and the plaintiff was seriously injured." The syllabus of the case reads: "The furnishing of a safe place to work and safe appliances with which to do the work is among the absolute duties of the master; and, unless the servant's attention is drawn to defects or the dangerous condition of the place or the appliances furnished or he should have known of them, he is not required to make an investigation, but may rest upon the assumption that the master has performed his duties in these respects." In the opinion it is said: "The furnishing of a safe place to work and safe appliances with which to do the work are among the absolute duties of the master. From the testimony a fair inference may be drawn that these duties were not performed. It is said, however, that plaintiff had an opportunity to examine and must have examined the scaffold before using it. According to the testimony, he was told to go to the assistance of the carpenter, and, when he went, he found a scaffold erected upon which he was expected to work, and, unless there was a very obvious defect, he had a right to assume that it was properly built. Kelley v. Railway Co., 58 Kan. 161, 48 Pac. 843. * * * We cannot say that he should have known of the insecurity of the scaffold. Unless his attention was drawn to defects or to the dangerous condition, he was not required to institute an investigation, but might rest on the assumption that the company had performed its duty. * * *

As we have seen, the scaffold was not built by him, and the accident occurred within a few minutes after he began work on it. It cannot be arbitrarily said that he knew, or should have known, of the danger to which he was exposed. Under the law, it is not only necessary that the employé shall know of the facts constituting the negligence of the master, or have opportunity to know them, but, in addition to these facts, he must have known, or by the use of ordinary observation ought to have known or understood, the danger to which he was exposing himself by reason of those conditions." With but slight modification, this syllabus and opinion could be adopted in the present case. The fact that the helper used a sledge whose appearance condemned it was not conclusive upon the plaintiff. Such fact did not bind him to knowledge of the sledge's unfitness for use or appreciation of the danger in using it. His relation to the sledge was not the same as that of the defendant who was obliged to perform the active duty of furnishing its helpers with safe sledges. The plaintiff was under no duty to examine the sledge or to inquire into its condition. He could only be held to knowledge of facts actually brought home to him or which under the circumstances he could not but possess; and there is no warrant in the law for arbitrarily attributing such knowledge to him. So much being clear, it is plain the petition stated a cause of action, and the court was required to proceed to a trial.

The plaintiff was employed in the mechanical department of the railway company, which was under the supervision and control of William O'Herin, superintendent of motive power and machinery. W. H. Brehm was master mechanic, in general charge of the shop in which plaintiff worked. James A. Wilson was foreman of the shop. The workmen in the shop were divided into three gangs, each under a foreman. The plaintiff belonged to gang 3, of which Robert E. Bate was foreman. The helpers of each gang did only unskilled and heavy work. Appropriate tools were provided for their use. Each evening the foreman of each gang ordered the tools for the helpers to his gang to be collected into a cupboard or locker of which he kept the key. This cupboard the foreman locked at night and unlocked in the morning. When the cupboard was unlocked, the tools were likely to be thrown upon the shop floor. Each helper took from the floor or from the locker such tools as he needed. Sometimes tools strayed from one part of the shop to another, and it so happened the plaintiff was injured by a sledge belonging to gang 1. The same rules of oversight by gang foreman prevailed, however, throughout the shop. Gang Foreman Bate ordered the plaintiff to do the work upon which he was engaged, and ordered Helper Fogleman to assist him, but no one ordered Fogleman to use the sledge in question. When he undertook to equip himself for work, Fogleman found no hammer in the cupboard of suitable weight for the light work of chipping a casting. Looking about, he found this one on the shop floor. The jury found specially that the sledge was not of the kind, character, quality, and appearance of those constantly used by the helper before the time of the accident; that it was not a reasonably safe tool for use; that it was too highly tempered, hard, and brittle and would break and splinter off when used; that these defects appeared on the face of the hammer, and that it was defective and dangerous. The evidence may be taken as establishing the fact that the defendant equipped the shop with a supply of safe hammers. Indeed, the plaintiff said that, before he was hurt, he had never seen a defective hammer in the shop. When defective hammers were discovered by the machinists, they were reported to the gang foreman, and either repaired or discarded. The defendant had no actual knowledge of the defects in the hammer which Fogleman used. No one had ever objected to it, or asked that it be repaired, and it was first brought to the attention of those having authority after the plaintiff was injured.

The jury found specially that the plaintiff did not know the defective condition of the sledge before he was injured, but held the defendant responsible, returning the following special findings in connection with the general verdict: "Q. 9. Do you find from the evidence that the said sledge hammer was furnished by defendant to the servants of defendant for their use? A. Yes." "Q. 16. Do you find from the evidence that said sledgehammer had been a long time in use by the helpers in the machine shops of defendant? A. Yes." "Q. 36. Does the evidence disclose the fact that the appearances of the hammer was such as to indicate that it was a dangerous and defective tool for use, and that the defendant by the exercise of ordinary care might have known the defective condition of the tool from its appearances? A. Yes." "Q. 37. If you answer the above question in the affirmative, you may state how the railroad company could have known of the defective condition of the tool in the exercise of ordinary care? A. Through foreman." "Q. 17. Do you find from the evidence that James A. Wilson in the discharge of his duty by the exercise of ordinary care could have known of the condition of said sledgehammer at the time plaintiff sustained injury? A. Yes." "Q. 18. Do you find from the evidence that Robert E. Bate, in the discharge of his duty, by the exercise of ordinary care, could have known of the condition of said sledge hammer at the time plaintiff sustained injury? A. Yes."

The defendant argues that it discharged its duty to the plaintiff, and that no negligence on its part was proved. It furnished safe tools. It did not direct this tool to be used. It had no knowledge of the fact that a defective tool was in use; and it asks the question: How could the defendant know that the sledge was unsafe when the plaintiff did not know it? The evidence and special findings so far adverted to do not complete the proof favorable to the plaintiff. There is much more which the defendant in its argument overlooks or ignores. The defendant did not stop with supplying proper tools for helpers to work with. Helpers were unskilled men without the expert knowledge necessary to determine whether tools were safe or unsafe, and the defendant undertook, not merely as a matter of law, but as a matter of fact, to see and know whether helpers' tools were in proper condition for use. The testimony of Mr. James A. Wilson, general foreman, is conclusive upon these questions: "Q. What position do you hold with reference to the defendant in this action? A. General foreman of the Missouri, Kansas & Texas shops at Parsons, Kan. Q. Frequently during the day do you usually get around the gangs where gang 2 and 3 are at work? A. I pass through the gangs 20 or 30 times a day, and maybe more than that. Q. There is a foreman with each one of the gangs? A. Yes, sir. Q. So, then, there is to direct the work of the machinists, what is to be done, how it shall be done, Mr. Brehm, yourself, and the foreman of the gang in which they are at work? A. Yes, sir. Q. And that is the duty of all the three of you? A. Yes, sir. Q. As you pass around on the floor where these gangs are at work, you see the tools lying around there, do you? A. I generally do; yes, sir. Q. One of your duties is to see what is there, is it not? A. Yes, sir. Q. What would you have done, and what would have been your duty, had you seen this hammer in the condition it was delivered to you, in either of the gang foreman's cupboards, or upon the floor for use? A. Why I would have taken it up. Q. What do you mean by 'taking it up'? A. I would take it away, take it out of the shop, because I considered it a tool to be put in shape and in condition. Q. In other words, you considered it to be an unsafe tool to be used? A. Under the conditions; yes. Q. Would it be the gang foreman's duty to know its condition and call your attention to it? A. Not where his attention was called to it. Q. Isn't it his duty to look after everything that is there under his charge? A. Everything under his charge; yes, sir. Q. Are not the tools that are furnished to the helpers to be used under the charge of the gang foreman? A. They are. Q. Then, it is his duty to know whether a tool is a safe tool, or unsafe tool for their use is it not? A. It is. Q. And, when he discovers that it is an unsafe tool for use, it is his duty to see that it is not used, is it not? A. Yes, sir. Q. And to take it up? A. Yes, sir. Q. Either to take it to the blacksmith's shop, or cause it to be taken there and worked over, or take it or cause it to be consigned to the scrap heap. A. Yes, sir. Q. And the helpers are not supposed to have or possess any skill in the matter of determining what are safe, or what are unsafe tools to use, are they? A. No." Much other testimony is to the same effect. The plaintiff as a machinist was rarely called upon to handle helper's tools. There is no finding that he was charged with the duty of examining helper's tools to determine if they were fit for the helper to use. There is abundant evidence that such was not his duty. Helpers were incompetent to judge of the fitness of the tools they used. That function the company reserved to itself and the evidence quoted means nothing less than that the presence of a sledgehammer in a cupboard or on the shop floor constituted a license from the gang foreman to every helper to use it, whether better ones were available or not. Wilson and Bate each gave testimony to show that it was the duty of the machinists to inspect the tools of their helpers, but the jury evidently did not credit them in this respect, and based its verdict and special findings upon the evidence to the contrary. It was the special province of the jury to resolve conflicts in the evidence, and this court cannot reinvestigate the matter. That the defendant had ample time and opportunity to discover the defective condition of the hammer after it had become unfit for use was fully proved so that the defendant's duty and breach of duty were clearly established. The answer to the question propounded by the defendant in connection with its argument upon this branch of the case is now very plain. Under the law and under the organization and rules of the shop, no duty of active vigilance rested upon the plaintiff with respect to the fitness of his helper's tools. He could rest under the assurance that the master had performed its duty, and take it for granted that the sledge was a proper one. The foreman was obliged under the law and under the organization and rules of the shop to inquire and see and know whether helper's tools were reasonably safe. After reasonable opportunity had been afforded to the foreman to ascertain the facts, the defendant is held to all the consequences of knowledge. The plaintiff is bound only by what he actually knew or under the circumstances could not but know.

The defendant claims that the plaintiff and his helper were fellow servants; that, since the defendant furnished proper tools, the choice of a defective sledge was the negligent act of a fellow servant, and hence that no cause of action was proved. From the evidence quoted, it is plain the helper exercised no intelligent choice. He was not on the same plane as either the plaintiff or the defendant. He did not have the requisite capacity to determine between the qualities of different tools, and no duty rested upon him to make a choice so far as fitness for use was concerned. The foreman chose all the helper's tools, and placed them at his disposal as being safe for use. Any so-called selection the helper might make was the selection of the foreman, and, if the tool proved defective, the foreman was responsible, and not the helper.

It is strenuously insisted by the defendant that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence in not observing the defects in the hammer and preventing its use. The entire argument, however, is confused and vitiated by the improper assumption noted in the discussion of the sufficiency of the petition. Negligence involves a breach of duty. When there is no duty, there can be no neglect of duty. If a specific kind of care is for any reason not required in a given case, a person cannot be negligent in failing to use such care. The defendant's duty required that it should see and know what kind of a sledge the helpers were using, and the failure to discharge that duty constituted actionable negligence. No duty rested upon the plaintiff to see and know what kind of a sledge the helper used. He did not owe it to the defendant or to the helper or to himself to look. He could remain passive under the assurance that the master had fulfilled its obligation. Therefore his failure to observe the defects in the hammer did not constitute negligence barring recovery. The prudence of the plaintiff's conduct is further shown by the following very enlightening bit of testimony given by Robert E. Bate, foreman of the plaintiff's gang: "Q. If as a machinist, you had been working upon that same piece of work which Quinlan was working upon, dressing the smokestack saddle, and Fogleman, or any other helper had started to get that hammer, if you had not known there was a defective hammer in use upon the floor, it would not occur to you to look at the hammer he was using for defects, would it? A. No, sir. Q. It would not occur to any machinist under those circumstances to look and see whether it was safe or unsafe to handle, would it? A. I don't think it would." The defendant shapes its argument to do further service under the heading of assumption of risk. Assumption of risk is an element of the contract of employment. A servant assumes only those hazards which are the natural incidents of the employment. Tools which are dangerously defective are not the natural incidents of any employment. It is the master's absolute and unassignable duty to supply safe ones. If defective tools are furnished, the servant may assume the risk attending their use, but he can be held to have done so only when he has knowledge, or the equivalent of knowledge, of the facts and of the danger. The subject is fully discussed, and assumption of risk and contributory negligence are discriminated from each other in the case of K. C., M. & O. Ry. Co. v. Loosley (Kan.) 90 Pac. 990. The flying of chips of metal from the casting the plaintiff was dressing was a natural incident of his work. He was bound to know that such a result would follow from the pounding of his chisel by the helper's sledge, and was required to take all necessary precaution to protect himself from injury from that source. But he was not bound to take any steps to protect himself from a silvery sledge when he could take it for granted the master had given the helper a sound one. It is said the plaintiff knew how to temper steel, knew that sledges tempered until they were brittle would break under use, knew all about the kind of work done in the shops, knew that sledges were used for striking blows upon chisels, could comprehend a simple tool like a sledge, had good eyesight, was, in fact, a skilled mechanic, and had the means of knowing if this sledge was defective—all of which is true. But he had the legal right to rest upon the belief that the master would not violate its duty, and negligently expose him to the hazard attending the use of a dangerous sledge. It is said the test of the tool was use, that the master could learn whether the tool was defective only by putting it to use, and that, while the tool was in use, the plaintiff assumed the risk. The argument is unsound in several respects, but it is enough to note a single flaw. The hammer was too old. The test had been made, and the proof of deficiency was written upon both ends of the implement long before the plaintiff lost his eyesight. When ample evidence of unsuitability for use had been supplied by use, the plaintiff had the right to rely upon the master to perform its duty to take up the tool, and no longer endanger his safety by permitting it to be used.

The one close question in the case now presents itself. Already it has been foreshadowed, and is this: Was the hammer so paraded before the plaintiff's eyes that he must have seen it? If so, he was fully competent to estimate the probable consequences of using it, and acted at his own peril. If not, he is entitled to judgment. The defendant does not segregate this question, and discuss it upon its merits, but, starting from the false premise that it was the plaintiff's duty to inspect and observe equally with the master, readily reaches the conclusion that the plaintiff's opportunity to see furnished the virtual equivalent of knowledge. The subject is partially covered by findings of fact which read as follows: "Q. 14. Do you find from the evidence plaintiff at the time he sustained injury knew the condition of said sledge hammer? A. No. Q. 15. Do you find from the evidence that at the time plaintiff sustained injury he was exercising ordinary care to prevent injury to himself? A. Yes. * * * Q. 18. You may state whether the plaintiff had good eyesight, and was a reasonably careful and prudent man in observing the place where he had to work and the tools which he and his helper had to use. A. Yes. Q. 19. Is it a fact that while the plaintiff held the chisel and his helper, James W. Fogleman, used the sledgehammer in striking, the plaintiff could see said sledgehammer as it was raised and lowered, and could see the same when it descended upon and struck the chisel which was held by the plaintiff? A. Yes; when his attention was not directed to the point of chisel used by him. Q. 20. Was there anything to prevent the plaintiff from observing the sledgehammer and the condition of the same at the time he commenced his work in chipping off the casting, and during the time he was engaged in his work? A. No. * * * Q. 26. Is it a fact as shown by the evidence, that machinists engaged in the shops of the defendant company at Parsons, holding chisels in the kind of work in which the plaintiff was engaged, ought to turn their faces away when the hammer descended upon the chisel, for the purpose of saving their face from flying particles? A. No. * * * Q. 28. You may state what is the fact as to whether the plaintiff turned his face away as the sledgehammer descended upon the chisel which he held during the time that he was making the repairs upon the locomotive and at the time he received his injury. A. No. Q. 29. You may state what defect, if any, existed in the sledgehammer that was used by James Fogleman at the time of the injury of the plaintiff? A. Such defects as appeared on the face of the hammer. * * * Q. 38. Would an examination of the tool, from its appearance and conditions, have revealed the fact to the plaintiff that it was a defective tool? A. Yes. * * * Q. 40. Would an examination of the tool by the plaintiff at the time of the commencement of his work on the day of his injury have revealed the fact that it was improperly and too highly tempered, and consequently hard and brittle and would break and sliver off when used? A. Yes. * * * Q. 63. You may state what observation, if any, as disclosed by the evidence, was made by the plaintiff in ascertaining the condition or appearance of the sledgehammer at the time the same was selected by his helper or during any period of time when the same was being used? A. None."

It is not shown how the helper carried the sledge when he came to the place where the plaintiff's work was to be done, whether upon his shoulder, or at his side, or in front of him, or by the end of the handle with the slivered head near the floor. The plaintiff was absorbed with the details of his own part of the work. The sledge was not in his thought. He was under no obligation to consider it. He was not obliged to suspect danger. He could rest secure that the helper had a safe sledge without taking notice. It was his business to prepare the casting to be chipped, and, when that work was performed, to adjust his chisel to the line where the cutting was to begin. Up to this point, he had no occasion to look at the sledge, and from that time forward his eye was directed, not to the head of the chisel where the hammer scarcely paused between strokes, but to the cutting edge of the chisel and the lines marked on the casting. The plaintiff testified as follows: "Q. When you felt the blows come down on the chisel which you held, and you observed the blows were all right, and that the hammer was all right as to weight, what was there to prevent you looking at the hammer when it descended on the chisel? A. Well, I was keeping track of the line where I was cutting. Q. In keeping track of the line, wouldn't you necessarily have to keep your eye on the chisel and the hammer as it fell too? A. No, sir. Q. Would you permit yourself to hold a chisel with a man who was using a dangerous hammer? A. Not if I knew it, I would not. Q. Were you not yourself in duty bound to make an examination of the hammer before you commenced to work? A. No, sir; that was not my duty. Q. Didn't you know it was your duty to report any defective tools you might find in your line of work to the gang foreman that might be in your charge? A. Any one I had charge of. Q. You didn't take charge of it and your helper might have charge of it, and you would still sit by and allow him to use a defective tool on the chisel. A. Not if I knew it. Q. Weren't you called upon to use your eyesight? A. Not that I remember of. Q. You knew sparks and chips would fly from this casting? A. Yes, sir. Q. If there were glancing blows on that chisel, you might be injured that way if the hammer was defective and there might be pieces fly from it, you would know that? A. If the chisel was not held in proper position. Q. Or if the hammer was badly battered the pieces might fly off? A. It is all a man can do to hold one of them chisels and keep track of the line. He cannot look around and examine anybody else's tools; and it is not customary. Q. Now, if you were particularly careful in selecting the chisel that you were holding yourself, will you explain to the jury why you would not make an examination of the tool your helper was using, and see whether it was just as safe as the one you used? A. I had nothing to do with the helper's tools. Q. You relied upon the fact that the helper would get a good tool, one that was not defective and use it, is that it? A. Yes, sir. Q. Now, Fogleman came to you about 7 o'clock, did he, to work? A. Somewhere in that neighborhood in the morning. Q. Well, did he have the hammer when he came? A. Well, I don't remember whether he did or not. Q. You knew he could not do the work that you had to do without the hammer? A. When I held the chisel up and was ready for him, he had the hammer then. Q. That is the first time you noticed the hammer, was it? A. I never took no particular notice of the hammer. He just started right in striking when I says, 'We are ready.' Q. When you said 'We are ready,' you are assuming he had the hammer? A. Yes, sir. Q. Did you notice it at the time when you said, 'We are all ready'? A. No. Q. You never took any notice of it even then? A. No. Q. Did you see Stevens or Robinson there while you were working and cutting away this saddle? A. I never noticed anybody in particular. Q. Did you know Stevens and Robinson were right on the other side of the bench from you? A. I never noticed anybody. Q. As a matter of fact, you were not taking notice of anything that morning? A. Not but what I was working on; that is all I was watching—my job fitting the saddle. Q. Now, although you were facing in this direction, yet you didn't see whether any persons were working here? A. I never noticed. Q. Although you were standing and facing that way, and looking this way; but you were looking at your hammer? A. I was looking at the edge. There was a little bit of a line that I started, and I watched right close to it. Of course, I could not see the line half the time, but it is a mark made by machinists to govern where to cut, and I was holding my chisel on that line. Q. What was absorbing your attention in the dressing of this casting, and where was your attention directed? A. Directed right on the line of the cutting edge of the chisel. Q. What line do you mean? A. The line where I was taking off material to fit; where I had marked it off. Q. Is the dressing and fitting of a smokestack saddle particular work? A. Yes, sir. Q. What is there about it that requires careful and close work? A. It must fit nice and snug over the boiler, and leave no holes. It has a curved surface. Q. On account of the curvature on the top of the boiler? A. Yes, sir. Q. Was it that that was absorbing your attention at the time of dressing the casting to that line? A. Yes, sir. Q. Is that why you didn't observe whether or not there were other parties before you? A. Yes, sir." The helper, Fogleman, testified as follows: "Q. What did Quinlan appear to be giving his attention to at the time? A. He was holding the chisel, looked as though he was watching the line. He had his cap kind of pulled over his eyes, holding his chisel. I don't remember the position in which he was holding it, but he was holding it at arms' length. Q. Where did his attention appear to be directed? A. To the cutting end of the chisel. Q. Following the lines? A. Seemed to. I was watching where I was striking at the other end of the chisel. Q. You were directing your attention to the surface of the chisel? A. To the center part of it. Q. That is where your attention was directed? A. Yes, sir. Q. Where did Quinlan's attention appear to be directed at the same time your attention was directed there? A. At his chisel, cutting to the line where he was cutting. His attention seemed to be directed there. I didn't see him look around at anything. In fact, he didn't have time. I was striking every time he set the chisel. Q. State what you mean by that? A. Every time I would strike and cut a chip he would bring his chisel back, and set it at the place where he wanted to cut, and every time the chisel cut he would bring it back and set it. Of course, I had to wait until he set his chisel, and I didn't come down as fast as I pleased. I struck when he had his chisel set and therefore I had to watch the chisel." C. B. De Dual, a machinist, testified as follows: "Q. You observed him [Quinlan] while he was at work, did you? A. Yes; at times. Q. You observed where his attention was directed at those times when you did observe him? A. Yes, sir. Q. State to the jury where his attention was directed? A. His attention was directed to the smoke saddle that he was chipping."

It is the duty of the court to harmonize special findings with each other, and with the general verdict, if that can be done. The jury has found specially that the plaintiff was a careful and prudent man, and was in the exercise of reasonable care, although he did not observe what he might have seen had he looked. The reason he did not observe the sledge as it rose and fell is fairly stated by the answer to question No. 19. Finding No. 20, considered in connection with the others and with the general verdict, evidently means no more than that no physical obstruction to a view of the hammer precluded the plaintiff from seeing it. The other findings merely established the fact of opportunity to see defects which were visible to any one looking at the sledge and that the plaintiff with good eyesight did not see. Under the circumstances, the question was one of fact, and, being a question of fact, the inference of the jury expressed in the general verdict is controlling. It is very true that in many cases this court can, and will, disregard a conclusion of fact drawn by a jury. No matter what may be the opinion of the jury, the court will not tolerate the conclusion that a man did not see what he could not avoid seeing. If a person with good eyesight stand upon a railway track, have an unobstructed view of an approaching train, and look in the direction of the train, a jury cannot be allowed to say, after he is run down, that he did not see the train. In such a case different minds could not rightfully reach different conclusions. Only one inference could rightfully be drawn and it would be the duty of the court to disregard any other. Usually the question arises in cases where a duty to be observant exists and the facts are to be estimated with reference to that duty. Here the legal obligation to see is wanting, and different opinions might well be entertained upon the question whether the plaintiff must have seen. Therefore the question was one for the jury. St. L., F. S. & W. R. Co. v. Irwin, 37 Kan. 701, 16 Pac. 146, 1 Am. St. Rep. 266; A., T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Rowan, 55 Kan. 270, 39 Pac. 1010; Rouse v. Ledbetter, 56 Kan. 348, 43 Pac. 249; Railway Co. v. Michaels, 57 Kan. 474, 46 Pac. 938; Cement Co. v. Moore, 65 Kan. 768, 70 Pac. 864; Hoffmeyer v. Railroad Co., 68 Kan. 831, 75 Pac. 1117. Certain decided cases cited by the defendant may be briefly discriminated.

In Lanyon Zinc Co. v. Bell, 64 Kan. 739, 68 Pac. 609, the plaintiff's work lay amid stacks of zinc spelter. They were a necessary part of his environment. Their condition was open and observable. No negligence of the defendant was shown, and the plaintiff was held to be chargeable with knowledge of what he could and under the law was bound to see. In this case the defective sledge had no rightful place in the midst of the plaintiff's surroundings. It was an intruder of whose presence the plaintiff was ignorant, one which he was not bound to observe, and one which could be there only through the defendant's negligence. In McQueen v. Cent. Branch U. P. R. R. Co., 30 Kan. 689, 1 Pac. 139, an employé injured because of defective wheels on a hand car had used the car, had examined it, and several times had wiped oil off the defective wheels. Of course, he not merely had full opportunity to see, but must have known, the condition of the wheels. In Libbey v. A., T. & S. F. Ry. Co., 69 Kan. 809, 77 Pac. 541, a railroad conductor was struck by a train moving upon a track in the railway yards. Railway tracks are warnings of danger. They are laid for the purpose of running trains upon them, and every man must be vigilant in keeping out of the way of trains upon them. The following sentences from the opinion sufficiently distinguish the case from the one now under decision: "He knew the dangers of the place; he voluntarily and unnecessarily put himself into a place of danger; and he took no precaution for his own protection. In stepping upon a railroad track in front of a moving train without looking or listening, he ignored the plainest dictates of ordinary prudence." In the case of Jackson v. K. C., L. & S. W. R. R. Co., 31 Kan. 761, 3 Pac. 501, a train conductor continued to use a defective step with full knowledge of the defect until he was hurt. Comment is scarcely necessary. In the case of U. P. Ry. Co. v. Estes, 37 Kan. 715, 16 Pac. 131, an employ  voluntarily and unnecessarily placed himself in a place of danger; and in the case of Carrier v. Railway Co., 61 Kan. 447, 59 Pac. 1075, an employ  voluntarily and knowingly chose an unsafe, instead of a safe, way of doing his work. In A., T. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Withers, 69 Kan. 620, 77 Pac. 542, 78 Pac. 451, the syllabus reads: "One may not knowingly stand upon a railroad track in a switch yard, or so near thereto as to be in an equally dangerous position, where he knows, or has reason to know, that cars may run at any time (another position being equally available), neglect to use his ordinary faculties to guard against danger, and, when injured through the negligence of the railroad company by a car passing along such track, recover damages. His contributory negligence bars such recovery." This is a restatement of the rule applied in the Libbey Case. The plaintiff Quinlan was in a place of safety, and was not required to be on guard against the use of a defective sledge. In the case of A., T. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Welkal, 73 Kan. 763, 84 Pac. 720, it was held the plaintiff assumed the risk of injury from flying pieces of steel chipped off in furrowing out a key seat in a steel shaft. The decision is sound, but not pertinent. The hazard was one which naturally and necessarily attended the work. So in this case the plaintiff and his helper assumed the risk of injury from chips of the casting they were dressing. But the doctrine of assumption of risk does not apply when the master without notice or warning to the servant exposes him to some danger which does not inhere in the employment. In the case of Rush, Adm'x, v. Mo. Pac. Ry. Co., 36 Kan. 129, 12 Pac. 582, a switchman worked in the defendant's yards, doing switching every day for 2½ months. It was held he must have known the condition of those yards. He made no complaint of their condition, and it was held he assumed the risk. In this case a defective sledge was unexpectedly placed, not in the plaintiff's hands, but in the hands of his helper. The plaintiff was busy with work which did not require him to use or see the condition of the tool, and within an hour or two he was injured. In the case of A., T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Wagner, 33 Kan. 660, 7 Pac. 204, it was not shown that the railway company was negligent, and the danger from which the plaintiff suffered was an ordinary and usual one naturally attending the work in which he was engaged. In the case of U. P. Ry. Co. v. Monden, 50 Kan. 539, 31 Pac. 1002, it was the plaintiff's legal duty to be vigilant in noting marks and signs to designate an approach to a junction. He had made one trip over the road. It was held the court should have instructed the jury upon the question whether the plaintiff ought not to have known there was no marker at a particular junction. The case of Railway Company v. Sledge, 68 Kan. 321, 74 Pac. 1111, relates to the continued use of a defective appliance after a promise to repair. In the case of Walker v. Scott, 67 Kan. 814, 64 Pac. 615, Scott was engaged in digging a trench, and was injured by a slipping of the bank. The following extract from the opinion shows how foreign the decision is to the present controversy: "He was fully alive to all the dangers of his employment, and knew the conditions as completely as any one could. It was his judgment and belief that a cave-in would occur." The case of Donnelly v. Packing Co., 68 Kan. 653, 75 Pac. 1017, involves a question of co-service, a subject which already has been sufficiently discussed. In the cases of A., T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Schroeder, 47 Kan. 315, 27 Pac. 965, S. K. Ry. Co. v. Moore, 49 Kan. 616, 31 Pac. 138, and S. K. R. Co. v. Drake, 53 Kan. 1, 35 Pac. 825, the injured employ s had full actual knowledge of all the dangers attending their work. Much reliance is placed by the defendant upon the case of Gillaspie v. United Iron Works Co. (Kan.) 90 Pac. 760. There the plaintiff was injured by a piece of steel flying from the battered top of a snap or set when struck by a sledgehammer in the process of riveting metal beams together. The plaintiff went personally with another workman to a toolbox and selected the defective tool with all its imperfections staring him in the face. Besides this, he personally assisted in heating a piece of wire and bending it around the snap for a handle. He saw and knew the condition of the snap, and this court held him to the consequences of his actual knowledge, all of which were within the comprehension of an ordinarily intelligent man. If the plaintiff in this case had voluntarily gone to the cupboard where the helper's tools were kept, had selected a hammer head, had heated a wire, and bent it around the hammer head for a handle, and then had turned the tool over to his helper to be used, the two cases could be paralleled, and the court would say of the plaintiff, as it did of Gillaspie, that he saw the battered faces of the sledge, knew the cause of its condition, knew that slivers of steel would fly from it, and knew the danger attending its use. The defendant has cited no decision of this court which would warrant its release from liability. On the contrary, the cases cited together with the others which have been referred to establish a consistent body of legal principles which authorize a recovery by the plaintiff and with which the court is entirely satisfied. Some decisions from other states are presented for consideration. They have all been examined. Some of them are quite wide of the mark. One or two contain statements difficult to reconcile with the settled views of this court. So far as they do this, they are disapproved. All of them are distinguishable by giving close attention to the facts. None of them presents the peculiar situation disclosed by the evidence and findings under review.

If the plaintiff, a skilled machinist, had been voluntarily and deliberately using the defective tool, the entire aspect of the case would be different. He would not be permitted to escape the consequences of knowledge. If the helper had been a machinist of equal grade and capacity with the plaintiff, or of sufficient capacity to estimate the fitness of tools for service, and the master had left it to the workmen to determine when a tool was worn out or unfit for further use and to report the fact, it might be said that each workman should be on guard against the use of defective tools by his associates. Then the cases cited might be controlling. But the plaintiff in this case had no supervision over helper's tools so far as fitness for use was concerned. Those tools belonged to a distinct class. Helpers were not themselves able to pass upon the question of the fitness of their tools. The master undertook to supply this deficiency of knowledge and judgment through its foreman, so that, whenever a helper took up a tool for work, the machinist had the master's guaranty that it was safe for use, and would not injure him.

Since other opinions must be printed in the same volume of reports with this one, the discussion cannot be extended further. In the light of what has been said, the court rightfully overruled the demurrer to the evidence. The jury was properly instructed, the motion for judgment on the findings was properly overruled, and a new trial was rightfully denied.

The judgment of the district court is affirmed.

HARRINGTON v. BUTTE, A. & P. RY. CO.
(Supreme Court of Montana. Feb. 10, 1908.)

1. APPEAL—NEW TRIAL—GROUNDS.

An order granting defendant a new trial will not be reversed because the ground on which it was based was without merit, if defendant was entitled to a new trial on any of the grounds urged.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, § 3408.]

2. TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—CONSIDERATION.

In reviewing objections to instructions, the entire charge will be considered as a whole.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 46, Trial, §§ 703-717.]

3. SAME—VERDICT—ACCEPTANCE.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1090, declares that, when a verdict is announced, if it is informal or insufficient, it may be corrected by the jury under the advice of the court, or the jury may be again sent out. Section 1171 provides for a new trial on various grounds, including misconduct of the jury in resorting to chance in arriving at a verdict. Held, that the court, on the return of a verdict, was not authorized to inquire by what method it had been reached, and, on ascertaining that it had been found by the quotient method, to direct the jury to retire and return a verdict by "deliberation and reasoning."

4. NEW TRIAL—GROUNDS—PROOF.

Under the express provisions of Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1172, 1173, the fact that chance has intervened in the deliberations of a jury, which is made a ground for a new trial by section 1171, must be made to appear to the court by affidavit.

5. APPEAL—DISCRETION—REVIEW.

Where there is a conflict of evidence on an application for a new trial because of misconduct of the jury, the determination of the trial court will not be interfered with on appeal, unless there is a clear abuse of discretion.

Appeal from District Court, Silver Bow County; Geo. M. Bourquin, Judge.

Action by Bernard Harrington, by Jeremiah P. Harrington, his guardian ad litem, against the Butte, Anaconda & Pacific Railway Company. From an order granting defendant a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Peter Breen, Jesse B. Roote, and John J. McHatton, for appellant. D. Gay Stivers and Forbis & Evans, for respondent.

BRANTLY, C. J. The plaintiff, an infant, brought this action by his guardian ad litem to recover damages for a personal injury alleged to have been occasioned by the negligence of the defendant through its servants and employes, in running its cars at a point upon its line of road where it crosses a highway called "North Wyoming Street," immediately north of the city of Butte. The defendant is the owner of a line of road running from Anaconda to Butte, with the usual necessary side tracks, switches, spurs, etc. At the point where the accident occurred there are two tracks on a grade ascending from the east to the west. It seems that in switching cars from the north to the south track, they are pushed up the grade toward the west over the north track, and, being uncoupled from the engine, which then moves away toward the east, are allowed to drift back by their own weight over upon the south track, one or more brakemen being in charge to check the momentum. Wyoming street is used extensively by the people living in the vicinity of the crossing.

On July 5, 1906, the day of the accident, a number of people, among whom were several children, including the plaintiff, had gathered near the crossing, being drawn together by the peculiar appearance and behavior of a man who was singing and acting as if intoxicated. It is alleged that by reason of the negligence of the defendant in failing to have a watchman at the crossing to warn passengers over the highway or persons present of the danger, and the reckless and careless management of defendant's employes in the switching of cars, the plaintiff was knocked down and run over by one of defendant's cars, whereby he suffered the loss of his left arm and other injuries, thus being permanently disabled and disfigured in his person. The issue made by the pleadings and submitted to the jury was whether the injury was the result of negligence of defendant's employes, or of the act of plaintiff himself by suddenly coming upon the track in front of the moving car, and thus rendering it impossible for defendant's employes to avoid the injury. The trial resulted in a verdict for the plaintiff for $20,000, and judgment was entered accordingly. The defendant moved for a new trial on several of the statutory grounds, including alleged errors in the instructions and irregularity in the proceedings of the court; by which the defendant was prevented from having a fair trial. The motion was sustained, on the ground of error in one of the instructions which the court deemed prejudicial; the presiding judge stating in the order that "other errors, if such, could be avoided at the new trial." The plaintiff has appealed.

While it is contended by counsel for the appellant that there is no error in any of the instructions, it is conceded that, though the court was mistaken in granting the order on the ground it did, yet, if the order should have been granted upon any of the grounds urged, it should be affirmed. The concession is properly made, because, if the defendant was entitled to a new trial upon any of the grounds urged, the order was properly made, though it was based upon a ground that was devoid of merit. We shall not comment upon the particular instructions of which complaint is made further than to say that, while some of them are open to criticism, in that they are inaccurate and somewhat vague in expression, yet, when read in connection with others on the same subject, the complaint made of them appears to be without substantial merit. It is a familiar rule that, in reviewing a charge of a trial court, it will be examined as a whole. While one or more paragraphs, standing alone, may be inaccurate or even prejudicially erroneous; yet, if these are qualified and explained by the other portions of the charge in pari materia, and, taken together with them and the rest of the charge, fully and fairly submit the case to the jury, the verdict and judgment should be sustained. Upton v. Larkin, 7 Mont. 449, 17 Pac. 728; Cushing v. Quigley, 11 Mont. 577, 29 Pac. 337; Cannon v. Lewis, 18 Mont. 402, 45 Pac. 572; State v. Fuller, 34 Mont. 12, 85 Pac. 369, 8 L. R. A. (N. S.) 762. While, as stated, some paragraphs of the instructions are not sufficiently explicit and comprehensive, we do not think any error therein sufficient to warrant the granting of a new trial.

We are nevertheless of the opinion that a new trial should have been granted on the ground of irregularity in the proceedings of the court. When the jury came in with their verdict, the following proceedings were had: The foreman handed a written verdict to the judge, who, having examined it, handed it to the clerk. The clerk then marked it filed, signing his name to the filing mark. He thereupon read it aloud to the court and jury, as follows: "We, the jury in the above-entitled action, find our verdict in favor of the plaintiff, and against the defendant, for the sum of $18,750. Michael Hennigan, Foreman." Inquiry was made of the jury whether this was their verdict. The inquiry was answered in the affirmative by the foreman. The jury being polled, each juror answered that the verdict was his. Immediately thereafter the court inquired of the jury by what method they had reached the verdict, stating that a quotient, or chance, verdict was void, and defining what is meant by the expressions "quotient" and "chance." Several of the jurors stated that they had arrived at the amount of damages found by having each one write down the amount he thought plaintiff entitled to and dividing the sum by 12. Thereupon the court directed the jury to retire and find a verdict by "deliberation and reasoning thereon," and, if they found for plaintiff, to find as their best judgment dictated upon the evidence and instructions, excluding the element of chance. The clerk then handed to the foreman the verdict already announced, whereupon the jury retired to their room. Presently the jury again returned into court, presenting to the court the same written verdict, except that the amount, $18,750, had been erased and $20,000 written in place of it. Thereupon the jury were discharged. At none of these proceedings were the parties or their counsel present.

We are of the opinion that the action of the court was wholly unauthorized, in that it was in total disregard of the provisions of the statute applicable. Section 1090 of the Code of Civil Procedure declares: "When the verdict is announced, if it is informal or insufficient in not covering the issue submitted, it may be corrected by the jury under the advice of the court, or the jury may be again sent out." After the verdict has been announced, it has passed from the control of the jury, except for the purposes declared by the statute. The purposes for which it may be retained are clearly stated. If it is informal, it may be corrected under the advice of the court; or, if it does not cover all the issues, it may be corrected in like manner, and for either purpose the jury may again be sent out. Except in these respects it cannot be altered or amended in any particular. The section of the statute quoted is the law upon the subject in this state (Code Civ. Proc. § 3453), and, though it must be liberally construed with a view to effectuate its objects and to promote justice, the court cannot go beyond its plain provisions. In the absence of such statute, we doubt not that it would be the duty of the court to do exactly what the statute permits, this course being required in order to obviate the necessity of another trial and the attendant expense and inconvenience. The doing of these acts in no wise interferes with the substantial rights of the parties. But the plain purpose of the provision is to prevent the receipt of informal or insufficient verdicts. It does not extend to matters going to the substance that do not appear upon their face. If the verdict covers the issue, and is complete on its face, the court must receive it, for it is the utterance of the jury to which the parties are of right entitled, without interference by the court. In the cases enumerated in section 1171 of the Code of Civil Procedure, upon application by the party aggrieved, a verdict may be set aside, but not otherwise. These provisions are explicit, and limit the power of the court to correct the decision or verdict in matters of substance, and the power must be invoked in the manner and within the time prescribed in sections 1172 and 1173. Ogle v. Potter, 24 Mont. 501, 62 Pac. 920. Any other rule would render the right of trial by jury nugatory, because, if inquiry could be made into the method pursued by the jury in one case, it could with equal propriety be resorted to in all other cases. The consequence would be that a verdict would be the result or the judgment, not of 12 men, but of 13, the last being always the controlling factor.

In Norris v. Burke, 15 Mont. 214, 38 Pac. 1065, the identical question involved here was considered by this court. The trial court had submitted instructions under which, if the jury found for the plaintiff, the verdict should have been for a certain sum. The jury having returned a verdict for a less sum, the trial judge concluded that it was incumbent upon him to require a verdict to be returned according to the instructions, and in effect directed the jury to retire again and so find. The provisions of the Code then in force (Comp. St. 1887, div. 1, §§ 271, 296, 297, 298) were substantially the same as sections 1090, 1171, 1172, and 1173, cited above. This court said: "The fact is that the court refused to receive the verdict, not because it was insufficient or informal, but the real ground of the refusal was the insufficiency of evidence to justify the verdict, and that it was against the law. But this is a ground for a motion for a new trial. Code Civ. Proc. § 296, subd.

6. A motion for a new trial is a matter of some formality. A statement is prepared and carefully stated, and the case is usually heard by the court, with both sides represented by counsel, and, if either party is dissatisfied, an appeal is taken to the Supreme Court upon the record so made. But the court in the case at bar, in refusing to receive the verdict, acted upon precisely the same ground which is one of the principal reasons for granting a motion for a new trial. It is our opinion that a question of so serious an import as setting aside a verdict because the evidence was insufficient to sustain it, or that it was against the law, the Code intended should be carefully heard and deliberately determined by the district court on a motion for a new trial, and not by the simple act of refusing to receive a verdict. In this view the provisions of section 271 of the Code of Civil Procedure still have a meaning, and, it appears to us, a very clear one. The idea is this: That, lest a party should be unreasonably put to the labor of making a motion for a new trial by reason of a clerical error or informality having occurred in the verdict, or because the jury inadvertently omitted to find upon an issue presented, then, as a remedy against such accidents, we have the provisions of section 271, allowing such informalities to be corrected before they had gone too far." That case is conclusive upon the point involved here.

That a jury has resorted to chance in order to reach a verdict is one of the grounds of motion for a new trial enumerated in section 1171. Under the provisions of sections 1172 and 1173 the fact that chance has intervened in their deliberations must be made to appear to the court, on motion for a new trial, by affidavit, and in this particular case the verdict may be impeached by the affidavits of jurors themselves. On motions for new trials it is frequently the case that there is a conflict in the evidence presented by the affidavits. This court will not interfere in such case with the action of the trial court upon the motion, unless there is a clear abuse of discretion. The action of the court in this instance amounted to a summary granting of a new trial on its own motion upon the unsworn statements made by some of the jurors. Doubtless if the matter had come up regularly on motion for a new trial, there would have been dissenting jurors who would have contradicted the statements of those who had admitted that chance had entered into their deliberations. Hence it is apparent that, if the course pursued by the trial court were permissible, it would lead to untold abuses, and allow the trial court to set aside, in its own discretion, all the provisions of statute touching motions for new trials. The order is affirmed.

O'FLYNN v. CITY OF BUTTE.

(Supreme Court of Montana. Feb. 10, 1908.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — DEFECTIVE SIDEWALKS—INJURIES—CLAIM.

Where written notice of claim for injury on a defective city sidewalk containing the time when and the place where the injury was alleged to have occurred was received in evidence, and an indorsement indicated that it had been referred to the judiciary committee of the city council and the claim disallowed, the proof sufficiently showed a compliance with Laws 1903, p. 166, § 1, requiring notice to a city or town of an injury by a defect in a sidewalk as a condition precedent to a recovery therefor.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 36, Municipal Corporations, §§ 1696-1707.]

2. SAME—EXISTENCE OF DEFECT—NOTICE TO CITY—QUESTION FOR JURY.

Evidence held to require submission to the jury of the question whether a patent defect in a sidewalk by which plaintiff was injured had existed for such a length of time as to charge defendant city with notice thereof.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 36, Municipal Corporations, § 1750.]

3. APPEAL—PREJUDICE—EVIDENCE.

Where, in an action for injuries on a defective sidewalk, it did not appear that there was any other broken board in the immediate vicinity of the one claimed to have caused the accident, and a witness testified that she had fallen at the same place a week before, defendant was not prejudiced by evidence of plaintiff's daughter that she stated to such witness where plaintiff claimed to have been injured.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, §§ 4161-4170.]

4. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — DEFECTIVE SIDEWALK—INJURIES TO PEDESTRIANS—ACTION—INSTRUCTIONS.

An instruction that a person in the exercise of ordinary care, and without knowledge of any defects in, or the dangerous condition of, a sidewalk, might rely on the presumption that the sidewalk was in an ordinarily safe condition for travel, was not objectionable for failure to charge that, if the traveler had previous knowledge of the dangerous condition of the walk, the presumption did not apply, the rule not being changed by knowledge on the part of the person injured.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 36, Municipal Corporations, § 1677.]

5. TRIAL—REQUEST TO CHARGE.

Where, in an action for injuries to plaintiff, caused by a defective sidewalk, the court charged that plaintiff was entitled to presume that the walk was ordinarily safe for travel, and defendant relied on plaintiff's knowledge of the condition of the walk as nullifying the effect of such presumption, it was its duty to request an instruction covering such point.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 46, Trial, §§ 628-641.]

6. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — DEFECTIVE SIDEWALKS—INJURIES TO PEDESTRIAN—ACTION—PLEADING.

Where a complaint alleged that defendant city carelessly and negligently permitted the sidewalk on which plaintiff was injured to be and remain in a dangerous and unsafe condition for a long time prior to the date of the injury, and that such dangerous condition of the walk was known to defendant for a long time prior to the date of the injury, it sufficiently negated the idea that the defect was not known to defendant for a sufficient length of time prior to the injury to enable repairs to be made.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 36, Municipal Corporations, §§ 1711-1716.]

7. SAME—EVIDENCE.

Where, in an action for injuries on a defective sidewalk, a witness testified that she had fallen on the walk at the same place a week before, and that two days after plaintiff was injured the loose plank which constituted the defect was in the same condition as when witness fell, the proof sufficiently showed that the condition of the walk remained the same from the time the witness fell until plaintiff was injured.

8. TRIAL — RECEPTION OF EVIDENCE — OBJECTION—SCOPE.

Where evidence that a witness had previously fallen at the same place where plaintiff was injured by an alleged defect in a city sidewalk was objected to as incompetent and too remote, the objection was insufficient to present the question that such evidence was incompetent for any purpose, either as bearing on notice to the city or the dangerous character of the walk.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 46, Trial, §§ 191-227.]

Appeal from District Court, Silver Bow County; Geo. M. Bourquin, Judge.

Action by Ellen O'Flynn against the city of Butte. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Edwin S. Booth and William E. Carroll, for appellant. John J. McHatton, for respondent.

SMITH, J. Plaintiff brought this action to recover damages for injuries alleged to have been received by her through stepping upon a defective plank in a sidewalk in the defendant city. She had a verdict in the district court of Silver Bow county for the sum of $5,000. Judgment was entered in her favor for that amount, and from such judgment and an order denying a new trial, the city appeals.

The first contention of the appellant is that no notice to the city council was given of the claim of plaintiff, as provided by section 1 of an act relating to actions against cities and towns for damages to persons injured on streets and other public grounds. Laws 1903, p. 166. That act provides that "before any city or town shall be liable for damages, for or on account of any injury or loss alleged to have been received or suffered by reason of any defect in any bridge, street, road, sidewalk, culvert, park, public ground, ferry boat or public works of any kind, * * * the person so alleged to be injured * * * shall give to the city or town council, or other governing body of such city or town, within sixty days after the alleged injury, notice thereof; said notice to contain the time when and the place where said injury is alleged to have occurred." No discussion of this question is found in the brief of counsel for the appellant, and the court would, for that reason, be justified in passing it. We find, however, from the record, that at the trial written notice of the injury and a claim for damages containing the time when and the place where the injury was alleged to have occurred was offered and received in evidence, without objection. The claim is indorsed: "Marked No. 1,200, claim of Ellen O'Flynn for injuries, filed on the second day of Sept. 1904. P. H. Sibley, City Clerk." Also: "Disposition. Sept. 7, 1904. Read and referred to judiciary committee. Oct. 19, 1904, disallowed." The reference to the judiciary committee seems to show that the claim was presented to the city council, and that is evidently the fact; otherwise the city attorney would have objected to the admission of the paper in evidence.

The plaintiff testified that she was passing along the sidewalk in question, accompanied by her son. She said: "We came to 521 North Wyoming street and without any cause I kicked my foot against a board which stuck a little bit out, and in the meantime my son stepped on the end and the board sprang up, and in the meantime my two feet got tangled in the hole." It is contended by the appellant that the evidence is insufficient to show that the alleged defective condition of the sidewalk "had existed for such a length of time that the defendant, through its officers, had actual notice thereof, or that by the exercise of any, except the most extraordinary care, could have had notice or knowledge thereof. From all of the evidence it appears that the defect, if any existed, was latent, else it would have been discernible to plaintiff herself who had used the sidewalk at least once a week for many months prior to the time." It is true that there was testimony on the part of the defendant to the effect that the defective condition of the sidewalk was not discernible to the eye, that the defect consisted in the fact that one or more boards were not nailed down to the stringers, and that there was no broken board. The plaintiff's witnesses, however, testified that one board was broken. Plaintiff herself said at the trial: "The sidewalk was broke about two feet in off the street, and this long board which was loose, without anything in it, projected over that hole. There was nothing to steady that board, and my son stepped on that and it popped up." As the jury evidently believed the testimony of the plaintiff and her witnesses on this subject, having returned a verdict in her favor, we must conclude that the defective condition of the sidewalk was not latent, but that it could be seen.

No actual notice of the condition of the walk was brought home to the city, so that it becomes necessary to inquire whether knowledge of the defect can be imputed to the defendant; and in this connection we have this testimony of the plaintiff: "I went over this sidewalk every week. As to whether I was familiar with this sidewalk prior to the time I fell, I used to pass there, and it was always in pretty bad shape. I noticed that. I did not notice the particular condition of the walk at the place I fell. I was not referring to about the same place I fell. I was referring to all along the sidewalk. There were several breaks further up and down."

Mrs. Richards testified: "The board was broken like in the center, kind of split and raised up at both sides. * * * I picked up the board, and then I laid it down, * * * because I thought somebody else would fall on it. When the board was laid against the fence there was kind of a hole under where the board had been. There were two parts of the broken board, and I think one was a little longer than the other. The outside portion of the board next the street was a little higher than the one next the fence. When I picked up the portion next to the fence the portion next to the street was still lying there, kind of tilted up from the outside of the walk." Miss Christie Sullivan testified: "There was a hole in the sidewalk. I fell down there myself a week before. The board was broken in two, and that is what caused the hole in the sidewalk." Margaret Sullivan, a sister of Christie, testified that she was with her sister when she fell, and that the board was broken.

The plaintiff offered in evidence sections 5 and 19 of Ordinance No. 120 of the defendant city, reading as follows:

"Sec. 5. It shall be the duty of the street commissioner to inspect all sidewalks, and keep the same in repair and in a safe and passable condition and to inspect daily the reports of the police officers for information relative to their condition. Whenever a sidewalk needs renewal he shall report the same to the city council, giving the name of the street, the lot and block number or other description and the name of the owner, if known."

"Sec. 19. It shall be the duty of the city marshal and all policemen to report to the street commissioner or note upon their daily reports all defects in sidewalks, and in case of accident they shall report the particulars to their superior officer, together with the names of any witnesses, if known to them."

See Leonard v. City of Butte, 25 Mont. 410-418, 65 Pac. 425.

In the light of this evidence we think the question whether this patent defect had existed for such a length of time as to charge the defendant city with notice thereof should have been, as it was, submitted to the jury.

But it is contended by the counsel for appellant that the testimony of the witness Christie Sullivan was improperly admitted, for the reason that the place where she fell was not identified as being the same place where Mrs. O'Flynn was injured. Plaintiff testified that she told her daughter Mary where she fell, and that the place was in front of the premises No. 521 North Wyoming street, occupied by Charles Ferns. Mary testified that she afterwards visited the place and told Christie Sullivan where the mother claimed to have been hurt. She said: "It was 521 North Wyoming street that mamma was hurt, and I told her [Christie] the place and how it happened." Christie Sullivan then testified: "She [Mary] told me where her mother claimed to be injured. I know 521 North Wyoming street, Ferns' place." After describing the place where she fell she continued: "I saw this plank a couple of days after Mrs. O'Flynn fell, and the condition was just about the same. It had not changed. * * * There might have been other broken places, but I did not notice them." Patrick O'Flynn, the husband of plaintiff, testified that he examined the place where his wife said she was injured, that he examined the broken board, and that there was no other board broken in front of No. 521 or in the immediate vicinity of that sidewalk. It appears, therefore, that Christie Sullivan had personal knowledge of the place where she fell. She identified it as in front of No. 521 North Wyoming street, Chas. Ferns' place. This being the same place where plaintiff was injured, we think there was no prejudicial error in permitting Mary to state that she told Christie where Mrs. O'Flynn claimed to have been injured, especially in view of the fact that there appears to have been no other broken board in the immediate vicinity.

Appellant objects to instruction No. 5, which reads as follows: "You are instructed that a person, in the exercise of ordinary care, and without knowledge of any defects in, or dangerous condition of, the sidewalk, is entitled to rely upon the presumption that the sidewalk is in an ordinarily safe condition for travel, and that they are not exposing themselves to danger while walking thereon and thereover." It is said that the court should have told the jury in this connection that the presumption referred to is a rebuttable one, "and in the event of there being evidence showing upon the part of the traveler a previous knowledge of the dangerous condition of the sidewalk then the presumption does not apply." But the answer to this criticism is that the rule of law is not changed in any event by knowledge on plaintiff's part. The rule remains the same whether applicable to the particular case or not. In this case it may have been a question whether plaintiff had knowledge of the defect; if so, that was for the jury to determine, under proper instructions, and if defendant's counsel relied upon that knowledge on her part as nullifying the effect of the presumption, an instruction covering the point should have been requested. No other complaint is made of this instruction.

It is said of instructions Nos. 2, 8, 9, and 12 that they do not follow the issues in the case, by reason of the fact that the complaint fails to allege that the defendant had notice or knowledge of the defect in the sidewalk in time sufficient to have repaired the same. The allegations of the complaint are that the defendant carelessly and negligently permitted the sidewalk to be and remain in a dangerous and unsafe condition "for a long time" prior to the date of the injury, and that this condition of the sidewalk was, at the time of the injury and "for a long time prior thereto, known to the defendant." The allegations of carelessness and negligence negative the idea that the defect was not known to the defendant for a sufficient length of time, prior to the injury, to enable repairs to be made, and in each of the instructions last referred to, the court covered the point by telling the jury that the defendant must have had notice, actual or constructive, of the defective condition for a sufficient length of time prior to the injury to enable it, in the exercise of reasonable diligence, to repair or remedy the same.

Again, it is said that, if the evidence of Christie Sullivan was admitted on the theory of constructive notice to defendant by reason of the length of time the walk was out of repair—and we understand, from reading the record, that that was the theory of the plaintiff in introducing it—then that testimony should have been followed by proof that the condition of the walk remained the same from the time that she fell until the date of the injury to the plaintiff. Assuming that defendant's counsel are correct in their deduction, the contention is disposed of by the quotation heretofore made from the testimony of Christie Sullivan. She testified that two days after Mrs. O'Flynn was injured the plank was in the same condition as when the witness fell. We think this testimony was sufficient to warrant the court in submitting the question to the jury.

We have said that it is apparent to us from the record that the testimony relating to the accident to Christie Sullivan was admitted by the court as bearing upon the length of time the defect had existed in the sidewalk, and not as proof of the dangerous character of the walk. Defendant seems to argue, although not very strenuously—perhaps it is merely a suggestion—that the testimony was not competent for any purpose. But no such objection was urged at the trial. The witness was asked this question: "Now, do you know of anything being wrong with the sidewalk at that particular place up there at any time prior to the time Mary O'Flynn told you about her mother being hurt?" "Mr. Foretell: Objected to for the reason that the location and time are not fixed and for that reason it is incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial." After the witness had answered that she fell there herself a week before, because of a hole in the sidewalk, the city attorney said: "Objected to as incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, and move that the answer be stricken out for the reason that it is too remote." It appears, therefore, that the objection that this testimony was incompetent for any purpose, either as bearing upon notice to the city or the dangerous character of the sidewalk, was never urged in the court below.

We find no reversible error in the case, and the judgment and order appealed from are therefore affirmed.

Affirmed.

CARLSON v. BARKER.

(Supreme Court of Montana. Feb. 10, 1908.)

1. APPEAL—PRESENTATION OF GROUNDS OF REVIEW—PLEADING—COMPLAINT.

In an action to recover wages due for services to a partnership of which defendant was a member, an allegation that the partners, upon winding up their affairs, had an accounting, and as part consideration for same defendant agreed to pay plaintiff the balance due him from the firm, while somewhat indefinite and uncertain, sufficiently stated a consideration for defendant's promise to pay plaintiff the money due him from the firm, as against an objection first made on appeal that the complaint did not state a cause of action.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 2, Appeal and Error, §§ 1226-1240.]

2. PLEADING—UNCERTAINTY—MODE OF OBJECTION.

If a defendant desires a complaint to be made more definite and certain, the proper course is to file a special demurrer for that purpose in the trial court.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 39, Pleading, § 518.]

3. APPEAL—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR—INSTRUCTIONS.

In an action to recover wages due for services to a partnership of which defendant was a member, he having agreed to pay the debt upon a final settlement between the partners, an instruction that, unless defendant, at the time of making the promise, had funds of the partnership sufficient to pay the debt, there was no consideration for his promise, if erroneous, was harmless error, where the jury, by finding for plaintiff, must have found that defendant did have sufficient funds to pay the debt.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, §§ 4225-4228, 4230.]

4. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF—PROMISE TO PAY DEBT OF ANOTHER—AGREEMENT BY PARTNER TO PAY FIRM DEBT—CONSIDERATION.

Civ. Code, § 3612, subd. 3, provides that a promise to answer for the antecedent obligation of another need not be in writing, where the promise is made upon a consideration beneficial to the promisor. Upon the winding up of a copartnership of which defendant was a member he retained certain partnership funds and agreed to pay plaintiff a debt due him from the firm. Held, that defendant's promise was upon a consideration, beneficial to himself under section 3612, and was valid, though not in writing.

Appeal from District Court, Cascade County; J. B. Leslie, Judge.

Action by Emil Carlson against David L. S. Barker. From a judgment for plaintiff and order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Downing & Stephenson, for appellant. A. C. Gormley, for respondent.

SMITH, J. This is an appeal from a judgment of the district court of Cascade county, and an order denying the defendant a new trial. The jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for the full amount demanded in the complaint. It is believed that a reference to the pleadings and the charge of the court will be sufficient to explain the nature of the action and the questions involved on the appeal, without any extensive recital of the evidence. The complaint reads as follows:

"The plaintiff complains of the defendant and alleges:

"First. That during the times hereinafter mentioned the defendant, David L. S. Barker, and one Nels Carlson, and one Olaf Lindquist, were interested together as partners in a certain lease upon the Ripple quartz lode mining claim, near Nelhart, Cascade county, Mont., the defendant, David L. S. Barker, owning a one-half interest in said lease and the said Nels Carlson and Olaf Lindquist each owning a one-quarter interest in said lease.

"Second. That on or about the 9th day of July, 1903, the plaintiff was hired and employed as a miner by the said lessees, David L. S. Barker, Nels Carlson, and Olaf Lindquist, to work in the said Ripple mine, so leased by them, and was to receive the usual and customary wages of three and one-half dollars ($3.50) per day; that the plaintiff continued to work for said parties as aforesaid until on or about the 1st day of April, 1904; that the value of his services at three and one-half dollars ($3.50) per day amounted to eight hundred seventeen dollars and twenty-five cents ($817.25); that the plaintiff has received from time to time, on account of said services, the sum of five hundred twenty-seven dollars and thirty-eight cents ($527.38), leaving a balance due and unpaid of two hundred eighty-nine dollars and eighty-seven cents ($289.87).

"Third. That when the said lessees of the Ripple mine ceased to work the same under their said lease on or about the 10th day of April, 1904, they had a settlement and accounting of all their business connected with said lease, and on said settlement and accounting, and as part consideration for the same, the defendant, David L. S. Barker, promised and agreed to pay the plaintiff the said balance of two hundred eighty-nine dollars and eighty-seven cents ($289.87), due and unpaid him as aforesaid.

"Fourth. That the said sum of two hundred eighty-nine dollars and eighty-seven cents ($289.87) has not been paid nor has any part thereof; that the defendant has refused to pay the same, though payment thereof has been demanded of him by the plaintiff."

There was no demurrer on the part of the defendant, but an answer was filed denying each and every allegation of the complaint. The court charged the jury as follows:

"You are instructed that the defendant in this case has denied all of the allegations of the complaint, and before the plaintiff can recover in this case he must prove by a preponderance of the testimony that the copartnership between the defendant, Nels Carlson, and Olaf Lindquist, existed, and during its existence that the plaintiff worked for said partnership, as alleged in the complaint, at the price of $3.50 a day, that a balance remains due the plaintiff unpaid of $289.87, that when said partnership ceased to work said lease the said partners had a settlement and accounting of all their business connected with said lease, and as a part consideration that defendant had moneys in his hands belonging to said copartnership, and promised and agreed with his copartners to pay the balance of $289.87 alleged to be due the plaintiff; and, if you find the facts to be as set forth in this instruction, it will be your duty to return a verdict for the plaintiff for $289.87, with interest at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum from the 2d of August, 1906, unless you find from a preponderance of the testimony the facts to be as set forth in the next instruction.

"You are further instructed that, although you find from the evidence that the defendant, David L. S. Barker, and Nels Carlson made an agreement by which David L. S. Barker agreed to pay the plaintiff the sum of $289.87, if you should further find that before the said Emil Carlson, the plaintiff herein, released the copartnership from said indebtedness, not notifying the said David L. S. Barker of his acceptance of him for the payment of said moneys, the said Nels Carlson and the said David L. S. Barker made another agreement by which the said David L. S. Barker paid the moneys in his hands to Nels Carlson instead of paying them to Emil Carlson, in that event you are instructed to find a verdict for the defendant in this case.

"It is not necessary, in order to make defendant liable, that he should have made to the plaintiff the promise to pay said $289.87, but a promise in consideration of his having funds belonging to said copartnership sufficient to pay the same and made to his copartner, Nels Carlson, in a settlement of the copartnership affairs, with authority in Nels Carlson to make such settlement from his copartner Lindquist, would be sufficient to bind the defendant so far as the promise is concerned.

"You are instructed that it is not sufficient for you to find that the sum of $289.87 was due and owing to the plaintiff from the firm of Carlson & Co., but that, in order to find for the plaintiff in this case, you must find also that the partners, David L. S. Barker, Nels Carlson, and Olaf Lindquist, had a settlement, and that in consideration of such settlement the defendant, David L. S. Barker, promised and agreed to pay Emil Carlson the said sum of $289.87, and, unless you find that there was such a settlement and such an agreement upon the part of the defendant, David L. S. Barker, you are instructed to find a verdict for the defendant.

"You are instructed further that, unless you find that the defendant, David L. S. Barker, had moneys in his possession amounting to $289.87, belonging to the firm of Carlson & Co., that there would be no consideration for an agreement upon his part to pay the sum to the said Nels (Emil?) Carlson, plaintiff herein."

It will be seen from the foregoing that the cause was tried upon the theory that paragraph 3 of the complaint was a necessary and material part thereof, without which the complaint did not state a cause of action, and that the defendant was not severally liable to the plaintiff, and could not be sued alone for the partnership debt as such. We shall not examine the correctness of this theory, but shall treat the case as it was treated in the district court.

The first contention of the appellant is that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, because paragraph 3, "construed most favorably to the plaintiff, does not state any consideration for the promise of the defendant to pay." We cannot agree with appellant's counsel in this view. Paragraph 3 does state, in a general way, that there was a consideration and what that consideration was. It is true that it does not state in detail what the arrangement between the parties was. If the defendant desired to have the complaint made more definite and certain in this regard, he should have raised the point by special demurrer in the court below.

The district judge instructed the jury that before the plaintiff was entitled to recover he must show by a preponderance of the testimony (1) that the so-called copartnership composed of Barker, Nels Carlson, and Lindquist existed; that during its existence the plaintiff worked for it, as alleged in the complaint, at the price of $3.50 a day, and a balance remained due and unpaid to him of $289.87; (2) that the simple promise of the defendant Barker to pay this amount to the plaintiff was not sufficient to warrant a verdict for the plaintiff, but the jury must go further and find that at the time of making the promise the defendant had funds in his hands belonging to the copartnership sufficient to pay the amount; that unless Barker did have funds to that amount there would be no consideration for his agreement to pay the plaintiff. Whether the court below was right or wrong in imposing this additional limitation upon the plaintiff's right to recover is immaterial, because the jury found for the plaintiff, and must have found that the defendant did have this amount in his hands at the time he made the agreement with Nels Carlson, his copartner.

It only remains to be ascertained whether there is any testimony warranting such a finding. An examination of the testimony of Nels Carlson discloses the fact that he testified that at the time Barker promised to pay the plaintiff's claim they were engaged in an effort to finally adjust the affairs of the copartnership; that it was ascertained that the firm owed the sum of $852.11, of which Barker agreed to pay one half, and Nels Carlson and Lindquist the other half; that at this time Barker had in his possession the sum of $471.69 belonging to the partnership, being the proceeds of certain ore sold by the firm to the East Helena smelter; that in the settlement this fact was taken into consideration, and the portion of the debts Barker was to pay was ascertained and adjusted on the basis of his retention of the whole amount received from the smelter. There is no other matter involved in the appeal save this one question of fact. The district court submitted the case to the jury upon this theory, and the jury resolved the issue in favor of the plaintiff. The defendant does not complain of the instructions of the court, but insists that the promise of Barker, made to his copartner, to pay the plaintiff's claim, was without consideration and within the statute of frauds, because not in writing.

We may assume, in passing, that Barker was not severally liable for the plaintiff's claim, although, in the light of sections 3250 and 1940 of the Civil Code, there may be grave doubts upon that subject, and we do not resolve them; but there can be no doubt that under the testimony of Nels Carlson, stamped as true by the verdict of the jury, an independent consideration passed to the defendant, Barker, and that his agreement to pay the claim was a good promise, by virtue of the provisions of section 3612 of the Civil Code, which reads as follows: "A promise to answer for the obligation of another, in any of the following cases, is deemed an original obligation of the promisor, and need not be in writing: * * * (3) Where the promise being for an antecedent obligation of another * * * is made upon a consideration beneficial to the promisor, whether moving from either party to the antecedent obligation, or from another person." See McCormick v. Johnson, 31 Mont. 266, 78 Pac. 500.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

Affirmed.

RAYMOND v. BLANCGRASS et al.

(Supreme Court of Montana. Feb. 1, 1908.)

1. PLEADING—DEMURRER—HEARING—COMPLAINT—STATEMENT OF CAUSE—SUFFICIENCY.

In determining whether a complaint states a cause of action or entitles plaintiff to any relief, matters of form and allegations that are irrelevant or redundant will be disregarded, and if upon any view plaintiff is entitled to any relief, the pleading will be sustained.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 39, Pleading, §§ 45, 66-75, 555.]

2. TROVER AND CONVERSION—GROUNDS—TITLE AND RIGHT OF POSSESSION.

A complaint which alleges that defendants at a certain time and place combined and conspired together to hinder and defraud plaintiff in her rights in her husband's property, that while she had an action pending against her husband for separate maintenance they wrongfully took and carried away certain sheep then and there the property of her husband and in his possession, does not state a cause of action for conversion, for in such an action plaintiff must allege and prove a general or special ownership in the property and a right to the immediate possession of it at the time of the unlawful taking.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 46, Trial, § 197.]

3. EQUITY—DECREE—NATURE—JUDGMENT.

While decrees in equity often extend to matters beyond the purview of judgments at law, they are nevertheless judgments within Code Civ. Proc. § 1000, defining a judgment as the final determination of the rights of the parties in an action or proceeding, and, so far as the decree awards a recovery of money, it is in no wise different from judgments at law.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 19, Equity, §§ 932-940.]

4. JUDGMENT—LIEN—DECREE IN EQUITY.

Where properly docketed, a decree in equity becomes a lien upon the real estate of the judgment debtor.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 30, Judgment, § 1322.]

5. EQUITY—DECREE—ENFORCEMENT—STATUTORY PROVISIONS—EXECUTION.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1214, providing that when a judgment is for money it may be enforced by a writ of execution, and section 1825 providing that, whenever an order for the payment of a sum of money is made by the court pursuant to provisions of the Code, it may be enforced by execution in the same manner as if it were a judgment, a decree in equity for the payment of money may be enforced by execution in the same manner as a judgment in an action at law.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 19, Equity, §§ 1053, 1055.]

6. SAME—APPROPRIATE PROCESS—EXECUTION.

When no method is specifically provided for enforcing a decree in equity for the payment of money, the court would be authorized to enforce it by execution as the most effective process in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 205, providing that, when jurisdiction is conferred on a court, all the means necessary to carry it into effect are also given, and if the course of proceeding is not specifically pointed out any suitable process may be adopted.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 19, Equity, §§ 1053-1055.]

7. HUSBAND AND WIFE—SEPARATE MAINTENANCE OF WIFE—DECREE—RIGHT OF ENFORCEMENT.

Where a wife recovers a judgment against her husband for separate maintenance, she becomes his creditor for the amount adjudged due at the time, and for amounts accruing from month to month, occupies toward him the position of any other creditor, is entitled to the same relief in equity if she seeks the satisfaction of her claim, and may maintain an action at law upon any ground available to any other creditor.

8. TORTS — PREVENTING SATISFACTION OF CREDITOR'S CLAIM.

A creditor who has been prevented from having satisfaction of his claim by the wrongful act of a third person acting with or independently of the debtor may maintain an action for damages against such person for the value of the property put beyond the creditor's reach.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 45, Torts, §§ 14, 15.]

9. SAME—NECESSITY OF SPECIAL INJURY.

A judgment creditor has no cause of action against one who has conspired to defeat his judgment, unless he can show some special injury different from that suffered by other creditors.

10. HUSBAND AND WIFE—SEPARATE MAINTENANCE — DECREE — ENFORCEMENT — ACTIONS AGAINST THIRD PERSONS.

One who has obtained a decree against her husband for separate maintenance cannot sue others to recover damages for conspiracy during the pendency of that suit to defeat the suit and make ineffective the decree which might be obtained therein by removing the property of plaintiff's husband, since prior to a decree the husband would not be her debtor.

11. CREDITOR'S BILL—GROUNDS.

A complaint alleged that defendants, by the conversion of certain property of plaintiff's husband, conspired to render ineffective any decree which might be recovered in a separate maintenance suit pending at the time of the alleged conversion, but there was no allegation that the husband was involved in the conversion, that plaintiff had acquired a lien on the property, nor that there was a trust in her favor. Held, that the complaint was not good as a creditor's bill.

12. DISCOVERY—BILL OF DISCOVERY—GROUNDS.

A complaint which alleges that defendants conspired, pending a suit by plaintiff against her husband for separate maintenance, to defraud plaintiff of her rights in her husband's property and to render ineffective any decree which might be obtained against him, and wrongfully took and carried away certain property of her husband then in his possession to plaintiff's damage, etc., is not good as a bill of discovery, since the relation of the parties toward the subject-matter of the controversy is clearly understood, and no discovery is necessary.

13. EQUITY—SUBJECTS OF EQUITY JURISDICTION—TORTS—RECOVERY BY CREDITOR OF PERSON INJURED.

Where property of a debtor has been converted by third persons, the creditor cannot sue and recover in equity from such persons on the mere ground that he is a creditor and that the debtor has no other property.

14. EXECUTION—SALE—RIGHT OF PURCHASER—STATUTORY PROVISIONS—CONSTRUCTION.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1232, relating to sheriff's sale under execution, provides that, when the purchaser of any "real" property, not capable of manual delivery, pays the purchase money, the officer making the sale must execute and deliver to him a certificate of sale. Section 1233 and the following sections direct the sheriff relative to the sale of real estate and provide for redemption. Held, that the word "real" in section 1232 was used by mistake, and the word "personal" should be substituted therefor in the application of the section.

15. EQUITY—ADEQUACY OF LEGAL REMEDY.

Civ. Code, § 4662, subsec. 3, provides that "personal property" includes things in action. Code Civ. Proc. § 1218, provides that all property or any interest therein of the judgment debtor not exempt by law is liable to execution, and all property not capable of manual delivery may be attached on execution in like manner as on writs of attachment. Section 1224 requires the sheriff to execute a writ by collecting or selling the things in action, etc. Section 1232 provides that the officer making the sale must execute and deliver to the purchaser of real (personal) property not capable of manual delivery a certificate of sale upon payment of the purchase money. Section 895, as amended by Laws 1899, p. 189, provides for attachment of debts, credits, and other personal property not capable of manual delivery by serving upon the debtor or person responsible a copy of the writ, etc. Held, that a wife who obtained a judgment against her husband for separate maintenance had a remedy against persons who had converted the husband's property by execution against her husband to collect amounts due under her judgment under which his claim against such persons might have been sold and bought in by her, whereupon she could sue them at law, and that she could not otherwise maintain an action against them in equity, since equity will aid only where an adequate remedy is not found in the provisions of law.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 19, Equity, §§ 151-155.]

Appeal from District Court, Lewis and Clark County; J. M. Clements, Judge.

Action in equity by Mary Raymond against John Blancgrass and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, John Blancgrass and Philip Chevalier appeal. Reversed.

Albert I. Loeb, Walsh & Nolan, and I. Parker Veazey, Jr., for appellants. E. A. Carleton, for respondent.

BRANTLY, C. J. It is alleged in the complaint herein that on April 29, 1904, the plaintiff, in an action brought for that purpose against her husband, Pierre Raymond, in the district court of Lewis and Clark county, obtained a decree providing for the separate maintenance of herself and her four minor children, which the decree awarded to her custody; that the decree directed the husband to pay to her monthly, and on the first day of every month thereafter during the joint lives of plaintiff and defendant, or until reconciliation should be effected, or until the further order of the court, the sum of $80; that it further directed that the defendant forthwith pay to her the sum of $50 to purchase necessary clothing for the plaintiff and her children, and also an additional sum of $48 to pay rent then due and owing by the plaintiff; that none of said sums have been paid by the defendant, or any one in his behalf, but are long past due; and that the said defendant is wholly insolvent, has no other property within the jurisdiction of the court out of which the sums so awarded may be realized, and is, and has been since soon after the rendition of the decree, a nonresident of the state of Montana. It is then alleged as follows: "(5) Plaintiff further avers: That no reconciliation has ever taken place between her and her said husband, Pierre Raymond, and there is no likelihood that any will ever occur between them. That ever since said decree of separate maintenance was entered the said Pierre Raymond has utterly failed and neglected to contribute in any manner whatsoever to the support or maintenance of the plaintiff or her said minor children, nor has he communicated with them in any way, but has utterly abandoned this plaintiff and her said children. (6) That such proceedings were had in this court under and by virtue of said decree of separate maintenance. That the visible and known property of said Pierre Raymond, after he had departed without this state and had refused and failed to comply with said decree, was set apart by the court for the benefit of plaintiff and her said minor children in order to carry out and make effectual the provisions of said decree, but that the funds derived from the sale of said property of said Pierre Raymond have become almost exhausted, and will, in a very short period of time, be wholly consumed, thereby leaving plaintiff and her said minor children without any means of support, as this plaintiff is without any other property or means of her own. (7) Plaintiff avers that she brings this suit in behalf of herself and her said minor children to enable her to provide the means for her and their support and to secure to her and them the rights and benefits to which they are entitled under and by virtue of the aforesaid decree. (7a) Plaintiff further avers: That on or about March 10, 1904, at Lewis and Clark county, in the state of Montana, these defendants combined, connived, and conspired together to hinder, delay and defraud the plaintiff of her rights in the property of her said husband, and said defendants combined, connived, and conspired together to defeat the plaintiff in her said suit for separate maintenance against her husband, which was then pending in this court, as these defendants well knew, to make ineffectual any decree which she might obtain against her husband. And so it was that at the time and place aforesaid these defendants unlawfully and wrongfully took and carried away 150 head of sheep, of the particular kind known as wethers, then and there the property of the said Pierre Raymond and in his possession, and which said wethers were of the value of $900, and converted and disposed of the same to their own use to the damage of plaintiff in the sum of $900. (8) That in the unlawful taking and converting of said 150 head of wethers, as aforesaid, the defendants have been guilty of fraud, oppression, and malice." The prayer demands judgment for the sum of $900, with interest on this sum since March 10, 1904, and costs of suit, and that the amount, when recovered, be devoted by the court to the payment of the sums awarded plaintiff under the decree. The defendants in their answers admit the rendition of the decree, as alleged, but put in issue all the other allegations of the complaint. At the commencement of the trial the defendants objected to the introduction of any evidence in support of the allegations of the complaint on the ground that they do not state a cause of action. The objection was overruled. At the close of plaintiff's case the defendants made separate motions for nonsuit, basing their motions upon the same ground upon which their objection was made. The motion of defendant Blaise was sustained, and the cause dismissed as to him. Those of the other defendants were denied. The latter declined to offer any evidence. The court submitted the case to the jury for two special findings, viz., whether the defendants converted the sheep, and what was their value at the time of the conversion. The jury having found that the defendants were guilty of the conversion, and that the sheep were of the value of $712.50, judgment was rendered and entered in favor of plaintiff for this sum, with interest and costs. The defendants Blancgrass and Chevalier have appealed from the judgment and an order denying them a new trial.

The question submitted for decision is whether the complaint states facts sufficient to warrant any relief. It is not clear from an inspection of it whether it attempts to state a cause of action for a conversion, or one for damages in the nature of an action on the case for the wrongful conduct of defendants, by which plaintiff has been prevented from having satisfaction, pro tanto, of her judgment, or whether the plaintiff has attempted to invoke the aid of equity to reach an asset of her husband which cannot be reached by the ordinary process of execution. The form in which an action is brought is of no consequence; nor does it matter that the complaint contains allegations not appropriate to the purpose sought to be attained. In determining the issue of law presented by a general demurrer to the complaint, or by any other appropriate method of raising the question—as here, by an objection to the admission of evidence at the trial, on the ground that the facts stated do not warrant any relief—matters of form will be disregarded, as well as allegations that are irrelevant or redundant; and if, upon any view, the plaintiff is entitled to relief, the pleading will be sustained. Donovan v. McDevitt, 36 Mont. —, 92 Pac. 49.

We inquire, first, whether the complaint states a cause of action in conversion. In such an action the plaintiff must allege and prove a general or special ownership in the property and a right to the immediate possession of it at the time of the unlawful taking by defendant. Harrington v. Stromberg-Mullins Co., 29 Mont. 157, 74 Pac. 413; Glass v. Basin & Bay State Min. Co., 31 Mont. 21, 77 Pac. 302. The allegations of the complaint here do not meet this requirement. It is nowhere alleged that the plaintiff was the owner of the sheep at the time of the conversion, nor that she had any special property in them, nor that she was in possession of them. Indeed, the contrary appears, for it is alleged that "these defendants unlawfully and wrongfully took and carried away 150 head of sheep * * * then and there the property of the said Pierre Raymond, and in his possession," etc. The idea that plaintiff had any interest in them, even by possession, is thus excluded. Further, the conversion took place prior to the rendition of the decree, and it is not alleged that the cause of action arising out of it was set apart to the plaintiff under the terms of the decree, supposing this could have been effectively done. Does it, then, state a cause of action for damages, upon the theory that, by the wrongful acts of the defendants, the plaintiff has been prevented, in part, from having satisfaction of her judgment against her husband? Just here it may be observed that the result of the action for separate maintenance was a personal judgment against Raymond which could be enforced by execution as any other judgment. "A judgment is the final determination of the rights of the parties in an action or proceeding." Code Civ. Proc. § 1000. While decrees in equity often extend to and cover matters entirely beyond the purview of judgments at law, they are nevertheless judgments within the definition of the statute, supra, and, so far as they award in any case a recovery of money, they are in nowise different from judgments at law. In legal effect there is no distinction. 5 Ency. Pleading & Practice, 489. When properly docketed they become liens upon the real estate of the debtor. They are enforced by execution just as are judgments in legal actions. Code Civ. Proc. § 1214. An order directing the payment of money is, pro hæc vice, a judgment, and may be enforced by execution. Code Civ. Proc. § 1825. Even if the statute did not contain this specific provision, the court would adopt the most appropriate process. Code Civ. Proc. § 205. And it cannot be doubted that the execution would be most effective and appropriate. The plaintiff, then, by the recovery of her judgment against her husband, became his creditor for the amount adjudged to be due her at the time of its entry, and also for the amounts accruing thereon from month to month, and occupied toward him the position of any other creditor. At least she "stands in the equity" of a creditor, and is entitled to the same relief in equity when she seeks to have her claim satisfied. Twell v. Twell, 6 Mont. 19, 9 Pac. 537; Bump Fr. Con. (3d Ed.) 505; 14 Cyc. 293; 5 Ency. Pleading & Practice, 489. Such being the case, she is also entitled to maintain an action at law upon any ground which would be available to any other creditor.

The substantive statement in the complaint is that "said defendants combined, connived, and conspired together to defeat the plaintiff in her said suit, * * * which was then pending in this court, as these defendants well knew, to make ineffectual any decree which she might obtain against her husband; and so it was that at the time and place aforesaid these defendants unlawfully, etc., * * * took and carried away, etc., * * * to the damage of plaintiff in the sum of $900." There can be no doubt of the soundness of the proposition that a creditor who has been prevented by the wrongful acts of a third person acting in connection with or independently of the debtor from having satisfaction of his claim may have his action for damages against such person, the measure of recovery being the value of the property put beyond the creditor's reach. This is sustained both by reason and authority. But when it is sought to apply it to particular cases, difficulty is encountered. In Pennsylvania the action may be maintained by any creditor, whether he has a lien upon the property eloiigned or secreted or not, or whether he has reduced his claim to judgment. Penrod v. Mitchell, 8 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 522; Mott v. Danforth, 6 Watts (Pa.) 304, 31 Am. Dec. 468; Kelsey v. Murphy, 26 Pa. 84. In Mott v. Danforth, supra, the court seems to rely for support of its decision both upon cases adjudged at common law in England and upon the provisions of the statute of Elizabeth (13 Elizabeth, c. 5) relating to fraudulent conveyances and imposing penalties upon the guilty participants. But the rule of these cases is exceptional. Speaking generally, the courts of this country adhere to the rule that the action cannot be maintained unless the plaintiff, by judgment, execution, or attachment, has secured a lien upon the particular property, and thus has a vested right therein which has been rendered nugatory by the acts of the defendant, the plaintiff thereby having sustained a specific injury different from that suffered by other creditors. In other words, in order to warrant a recovery, the plaintiff must allege and show that he had a specific right to subject the particular property to the satisfaction of his judgment, and that the defendant, either alone or with others, has deprived him of this right. Otherwise a recovery would be had upon the plaintiff's bare chance to have satisfaction of a claim which he possessed in common with other creditors—a wrong too remote, indefinite, and contingent to be the ground of an action. This is declared to be the rule by the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts in Lamb v. Stone, 11 Pick. (Mass.) 527, where it is said: "The plaintiff complained of the fraud of the defendant in purchasing the property of his absconding debtor in order to aid and abet him in the fraudulent purpose of evading the payment of his debt. The court ask, what damage has the plaintiff sustained by the transfer of his debtor's property? He has lost no lien, for he had none. No attachment has been defeated, for none had been made. He has not lost the custody of his debtor's body, for he had not arrested him. He has not been prevented from attaching the property, or arresting the body of his debtor, for he had never procured any writ of attachment against him.

He has lost no claim upon, or interest in the property, for he never acquired either. The most that can be said is that he intended to attach the property, and the wrongful act of the defendant has prevented him from executing this intention. * * * On the whole, it does not appear that the tort of the defendant caused any damage to the plaintiff. But, even if so, yet it is too remote, indefinite, and contingent to be the ground of an action." See, also, Wellington v. Small, 3 Cush. (Mass.) 145, 50 Am. Dec. 719; Bradley v. Fuller, 118 Mass. 239. In the early case of Smith v. Blake, 1 Day, 258, the Supreme Court of Connecticut announced the same view and stated, as a further objection to the maintenance of such an action, that the result would be that the defendant would be subject to a like action by every one of the creditors of the insolvent debtor, and thus be liable to pay many times the value of the property, whereas the only penalty imposed upon him by law is that he shall reap no benefit by his fraudulent conduct. The doctrine of this case is reaffirmed by the same court in the case of Hatstat v. Blakeslee, 41 Conn. 301, where the case of Smith v. Blake is cited with approval. In Moody v. Burton, 27 Me. 472, 46 Am. Dec. 612, the Supreme Judicial Court of Maine had before it the question whether a judgment creditor, with execution returned unsatisfied, could maintain an action against a third person who had conspired with the judgment debtor to put his property beyond the reach of his creditors. It was held that the action could not be maintained, because the plaintiff did not show a right to, or interest in, the property superior to that of any other creditor, and hence that the injury was too remote to sustain a judgment; and further, because, since the creditor could show no specific interest in, or lien upon, the property, but only a bare chance to reach it, there was no standard by which the injury could be measured. The same conclusion was reached in Klous v. Hennessey, 13 R. I. 332, the court holding that the fundamental reason why the action could not be maintained is that the "damage, which is the gist of the action, is too remote, uncertain, and contingent, inasmuch as the creditor has not an assured right, but simply a chance of securing his claim by attachment or levy, which he may not succeed in improving." In Hall v. Eaton, 25 Vt. 458, the right to maintain the action was denied, the court basing its decision upon Lamb v. Stone and Moody v. Burton, supra. The decisions of the New York Court of Appeals are conflicting. In Braem v. Bank, 127 N. Y. 508, 28 N. E. 597, the right to maintain the action is denied, the court apparently distinguishing that case upon its facts from the earlier case of Quinby v. Strauss, 90 N. Y. 664, wherein it was held that the action would lie in favor of a judgment creditor. The two cases seem, on principle, to be directly in conflict. In Adler v. Fenton, 24 How. (U. S.) 407, 16 L. Ed. 696, the Supreme Court of the United States refused to sustain an action by a general creditor against the fraudulent grantees of the debtor, repudiating the doctrine of the Pennsylvania cases. In the case of Findley v. McAllister, 113 U. S. 104, 5 Sup. 401, 28 L. Ed. 930, the general rule that in order to sustain the action the plaintiff must show a specific interest in the fund or property sought to be applied to the satisfaction of his judgment was recognized, the court citing and distinguishing Adler v. Fenton, supra. The same rule has been recognized by the Supreme Court of Wisconsin. Field v. Siegel, 99 Wis. 605, 75 N. W. 397. A collection of cases may be found in the notes to this case, reported in 47 L. R. A. 433. It thus appears that under the rule established by the great weight of authority in this country, although it is made clearly to appear that the defendant has willfully become a party to a conspiracy to defeat the judgment of the creditor, such a creditor has no cause of action against him, unless he can show that he has suffered some special injury different from that suffered by the other creditors. Applying the rule announced in the cases cited to the allegations of the complaint, we find that they are not sufficient to sustain the action, in that it does not appear therefrom, even by inference, that the plaintiff had any special right in the property alleged to have been fraudulently taken from the possession of her husband by the defendants. At the time the conversion occurred the suit was pending. She had no judgment, and therefore, at that time, was not a creditor of her husband, for the relation of creditor was fixed by the entry of the decree in the separate maintenance action. Prior to that time her husband was not her debtor, and in this respect she occupied a different relation toward him from that of any other creditor.

Counsel for respondent contends, however, that the complaint is in form and substance a creditor's bill, and in support of this contention among other cases cites Twell v. Twell, 6 Mont. 19, 9 Pac. 537; Ryan v. Speith, 18 Mont. 48, 44 Pac. 403, and Wilson v. Harris, 21 Mont. 407, 54 Pac. 46. But none of these cases are in point, nor are any of the others cited. It does not appear that Raymond, the debtor, had anything to do with the conversion of the sheep by the defendants, so that he might be said to have fraudulently disposed of or concealed them, and the purpose of the action is to annul the fraudulent conveyance which stands as an obstruction in the way of plaintiff's execution. The complaint has none of the attributes of a bill to reach property fraudulently conveyed. If it were otherwise sufficient for this purpose, it would fail, for the reason that it does not show that the plaintiff has acquired a lien on the property by attachment or execution, or that there is a trust therein in her favor.

Wilson v. Harris, supra; Westheimer v. Good-kind, 24 Mont. 90, 60 Pac. 813; Wyman v. Jensen, 28 Mont. 221, 67 Pac. 114. Nor has it any of the attributes of a bill of discovery, for that it appears expressly upon the face of it that the relations between the parties and their attitude toward the subject-matter of the controversy are clearly understood and no discovery is necessary. In fact, the manifest purpose of the action is to secure a judgment in favor of the plaintiff upon a cause of action for a conversion by the defendants existing in favor of her husband, the sole ground of her right to do so being that she is a creditor. Without pausing to discuss the features of that character of a creditor's bill, the purpose of which is to reach assets not liable to execution, it may be remarked that a creditor cannot, solely on the ground that he is a creditor, and that his debtor has no property other than an existing cause of action at law, bring suit upon such cause of action and obtain a judgment thereon as if he were the owner of it, and justify the action on the theory that he is proceeding by a creditor's bill. To hold the contrary would be equivalent to laying down the doctrine that, because an insolvent debtor does not bring action to rectify a wrong done him, his creditor may do so, and not only so, but may, in his own right, bring the wrongdoer to book by going into a forum and adopting a form of action wherein and whereby the wrongdoer is deprived of a trial according to the fundamental law requiring his case to be submitted to a jury according to the forms of law. Now, it is insisted by counsel for respondent, and conceded by counsel for appellant, that the legal cause of action existing in favor of Raymond which the plaintiff seeks to reach is property which may be subjected to the satisfaction, pro tanto, of plaintiff's judgment. If this is so, and there is every reason why it should be so under the statute (Civ. Code, § 4662), plaintiff had a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy at law, and therefore could not call equity to her aid until she had exhausted it. The statutes of Montana relating to the kinds of property that may be taken on execution are very broad, and under them any species of property may be seized, sold, and proceeds thereof applied to the satisfaction of the judgment. The procedure which would have given plaintiff all the relief to which she was entitled is found in the following sections of the Code of Civil Procedure:

"Sec. 1218. All goods, chattels, moneys, and other property, both real and personal, or any interest therein of the judgment debtor, not exempt by law, and all property and rights of property seized and held under attachment in the action, are liable to execution. Shares and interests in any corporation or company, and debts and credits, and all other property, both real and personal, or any interest in either real or personal property, and all other property not capable of manual delivery, may be attached on execution, in like manner as upon writs of attachment. Gold dust must be returned by the officer as so much money collected, at its current value, without exposing the same to sale. Until a levy, property is not affected by the execution."

"Sec. 1224. The sheriff must execute the writ against the property of the judgment debtor, by levying on a sufficient amount of property, if there be sufficient, collecting or selling the things in action, and selling the other property, and paying to the plaintiff or his attorney so much of the proceeds as will satisfy the judgment. Any excess in the proceeds over the judgment and accruing costs, must be returned to the judgment debtor, unless otherwise directed by the judgment or order of the court. When there is more property of the judgment debtor than is sufficient to satisfy the judgment and accruing costs within the view of the sheriff, he must levy only on such part of the property as the judgment debtor may indicate, if the property indicated be amply sufficient to satisfy the judgment and costs."

"Sec. 1232. When the purchaser of any real property not capable of manual delivery pays the purchase money, the officer making the sale must execute and deliver to the purchaser a certificate of sale. Such certificate conveys to the purchaser all the right which the debtor had in such property on the day the execution or attachment was levied."

Under section 1218 all property of every description, tangible and intangible, including debts, credits, and all other property not capable of manual delivery, may be attached on execution in like manner as upon writs of attachment. By reference to section 805 of the Code of Civil Procedure, as amended by the act of 1899 (Laws 1899, p. 139), debts, credits, and other personal property not capable of manual delivery are attached by serving upon the debtor, or person responsible, a copy of the writ and the notice therein directed. Under section 1224, supra, the sheriff must collect or sell things in action, and also sell the other property seized, until sufficient funds are realized to pay the judgment. It will be noticed that in section 1232, supra, which contains directions to the sheriff as to the delivery of a certificate in case of a sale of property not capable of manual delivery, the word "real" qualifies the term "property." When we examine all the provisions of the chapter together, it becomes apparent that the use of this term is a mistake, and that the term "personal" must be substituted for it. Section 1233 and the following sections direct the sheriff relative to sales of real estate and provide for redemption. If the word "real" be retained in section 1232, this section becomes inconsistent with the following sections, or else can be assigned no intelligent meaning. Real estate is never capable of manual delivery. If, however, the position of this section in the chapter be considered, and it be held to apply to the subject with which it evidently deals, it is clear that the substitution should be made, for thus all the sections are made consistent, and we have a provision which prescribes what shall be done in case of sales of personal property not capable of manual delivery, whereas, otherwise, we should find no such provision. Besides, section 698 of the Code of Civil Procedure of California, pertaining to the same subject, of which our section is a literal copy, except in the particular just mentioned, uses the word "personal," giving the section the meaning and application which the Legislature of that state, and of our own state as well, evidently intended it to have. Making the proper substitution in this section, and considering all the sections together, it is entirely clear that the plaintiff could have reached the asset of her husband sought to be reached in this action by the process of execution, and hence that the necessity to go into a court of equity to obtain aid did not exist. For, according to the contention of her counsel, the very purpose of her action was to reach an asset that she could not reach by this process. Nor is it any hardship upon plaintiff that she is compelled to pursue the remedy thus pointed out. This course is required of every creditor, and equity will aid only when an adequate remedy is not found in the provisions of law. The want of an adequate remedy at law "constitutes the very cradle of equity." Wilson v. Harris, supra.

The remedy pointed out is adequate. The execution could have been levied as easily as a service of summons could have been made in this case. If no other purchaser could have been found, the plaintiff could have become the purchaser herself, and thus have become vested with title to the cause of action, whereupon, if defendants had refused payment without suit, she could with legal propriety have sued in her own name. It is no answer to this reasoning to say that this course would have been somewhat less expeditious than the one pursued by the plaintiff. If the asset must be regarded as property to be subjected to the payment of debts, it must follow as a necessary conclusion that the way pointed out by the statute to reach it must be pursued.

Since the complaint does not state a cause of action from any point of view, the judgment and order must be reversed, and it is so ordered.

Reversed.

DUNBAR v. GRIFFITHS.

(Supreme Court of Idaho. Jan. 20, 1908.)

1. PLEADING—AMENDMENT.

Under the provisions of section 4228, Rev. St. 1887, the parties may amend any pleading once as a matter of course at any time before answer or demurrer filed, or after demurrer and before the trial of the issue of law thereon; but such right of amendment without leave of court does not extend beyond the time allowed by law for filing a demurrer or answer where no such pleading has in fact been filed, and the right to thereafter file such a pleading rests in the sound discretion of the court.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 39, Pleading, §§ 594-598, 653-675.]

2. SAME—LEAVE TO AMEND.

Under section 4229, Rev. St. 1887, great liberality must be exercised in the allowance of amendments to pleadings.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 39, Pleading, §§ 591-598.]

3. SAME—DISCRETION OF COURT—GROUNDS.

Where a party applies to the court under Rev. St. 1887, § 4229, for permission to file an amended pleading, and the application is one that addresses itself solely to the discretion of the court, and the party asks leave to make a showing as to the reasons why he had not previously offered the amendment and why he has delayed, and his reasons for invoking the discretion of the court, it is an abuse of discretion for the court to refuse to permit him to make such showing or state to the court his reasons and grounds therefor and to thereupon deny the application to amend.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 39, Pleading, §§ 599-635.]

4. SAME.

The sound legal discretion of the trial judge will be determined from the showing made, and the circumstances under which such showing was made or offered to be made.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 39, Pleading, §§ 599-601.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from District Court, Canyon County; Frank J. Smith, Judge.

Action by Joseph C. Dunbar against Walter Griffiths to quiet title. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Frank Martin, Lot L. Feltham, and Griffiths & Griffiths, for appellant. Rice & Thompson, for respondent.

AILSHIE, C. J. This appeal is from the judgment and an order denying a motion for a new trial. The action is one to quiet title. Plaintiff's complaint is in the usual form, alleging fee-simple title and exclusive right of possession. Defendant answered, denying plaintiff's title and right of possession, and alleged title and exclusive possession and right of possession in himself. The cause was tried on an amended complaint which appears to have been filed on the 2d day of September, 1904. The answer was filed on the 1st day of February, 1905. So far as the record is concerned, the case appears to have rested without any further proceedings being had thereon, except the taking of some depositions, until March 1, 1906. The case seems to have been previously set for trial for the latter date. Before entering upon the trial, the defendant filed an amended answer containing the same denials and affirmative allegations as contained in his original answer, and in addition thereto alleging that he was the owner of the property in question and that he deraigned title through a sheriff's deed issued on an execution sale in a case wherein Sweet, Dempster & Co. had procured judgment against W. C. Dunbar, a brother of the plaintiff. Defendant alleged that while W. C. Dunbar was heavily indebted and in an insolvent condition he purchased this tract of land and caused the same to be conveyed to his brother, Hiram C. Dunbar, and that the latter acquired no interest therein and paid nothing whatever therefor, and was cognizant of the fraud being perpetrated on the creditors of W. C. Dunbar, and that, in furtherance of the fraudulent purpose and with a view to concealing the fraudulent character thereof, Hiram C. Dunbar transferred the property, without consideration, and in furtherance of the fraud upon W. C. Dunbar's creditors, to the plaintiff herein. It was further alleged that the transfer and transaction whereby the plaintiff acquired the legal title to the property was fraudulent and void as against the creditors of William C. Dunbar, and that in truth and in fact the judgment debtor, William C. Dunbar, at all times prior to the execution sale, exercised the sole and exclusive control and right of possession over the property. The defendant did not seek any affirmative relief, nor did he ask for a decree quieting his own title, but only prayed that the plaintiff's prayer be denied and that his action be dismissed. The amended answer was filed March 1, 1906, being a year and one month after the filing of the original answer. On motion of the plaintiff the court made an order striking the amended answer from the files upon the ground that it had not been made until the time set for the trial of the case, and that it had been filed without leave of the court. The defendant at the time of this ruling made the following statement and offer to the court: "If there is any reason why any terms should be granted to the other side, we will agree to anything that the court decides in this matter. We have relied upon the fact that we would have the right to amend. We feel that, if the court will give us permission, we can present to the court proper showing why this amendment has not been made before, and to deny us this right practically denies us the right to make a defense in this case." The court denied the application and refused to give the defendant time or opportunity to make a showing why he should be allowed to go to trial on his amended answer as presented to the court. The trial proceeded, and, after the plaintiff rested, the defendant submitted evidence tending to prove each of the allegations of his amended answer, and tending to establish that the equitable title rested in him and that the plaintiff's legal title had been acquired in fraud of the creditors of the judgment debtor. The court excluded all the evidence tending to establish such defense, and entered judgment against the defendant and in favor of the plaintiff, quieting his title.

The defendant, who is appellant in this court, argues, first, that under the provisions of section 4228, Rev. St. 1887, he was entitled to amend his answer as a matter of course, at any time before actually entering upon the trial of the case. That portion of section 4228 on which appellant relies is as follows: "Any pleading may be amended once by the party of course, and without costs, at any time before answer or demurrer filed, or after demurrer and before the trial of the issue of law thereon, by filing the same as amended, and serving a copy on the adverse party, who may have ten days thereafter in which to answer or demur to the amended pleading." This section provides that, "Any pleading may be amended once by the party of course," provided that he does so "before answer or demurrer filed, or after demurrer and before the trial of the issue of law thereon." Hedges v. Dam, 72 Cal. 520, 14 Pac. 133; Spooner v. Cady (Cal.) 36 Pac. 104. The language of this section is somewhat uncertain as to the limitation of time within which this amendment may be made as a matter of course. It is clear to us, however, that, where an answer has been filed and a demurrer has been interposed, either the demurrer or answer may be amended as a matter of course at any time "before the trial of the issue of law thereon." We think, however, that this section must be read in connection with the other provisions of the statute (sections 4174, 4176, and 4140, Rev. St. 1887) fixing the time for demurrer or answer to a pleading. A plaintiff may demur to the defendant's answer within 10 days after service thereof. Section 4193, Rev. St. 1887. If he does not demur within that time, he has no absolute right to do so thereafter without leave of court. If he should let the time for filing a demurrer to the answer expire without demurring, we do not think the defendant would thereafter be entitled to amend his answer as a matter of course, but would be then bound to invoke the discretion of the court (which must be liberally exercised) as provided for under section 4229. In this case we think the court abused its discretion, at least in that he refused to allow the defendant to make a showing as to why he had not previously filed his amended answer and the reasons for his delay. Had the delay caused plaintiff any material injury or delay, the court could have protected him by imposing terms on defendant. Defendant might have been able to make a showing that would have established a clear and convincing case of abuse of discretion on the part of the court had the court still gone ahead and made the order striking the amended answer from the files. Since that showing is not before us and was not before the trial court, we cannot surmise or anticipate what it would have been; but in view of the condition of the case and the pleadings at that time and the statement of counsel and the refusal of the court to permit a showing, the whole transaction viewed together constitutes such abuse of discretion as calls for a reversal of the judgment. This court has often expressed the view that trial courts should be liberal in the matter of permitting amendments to pleadings where it appears that they are in good faith and their allowance would serve the ends of justice. Kroetch v. Empire Mill Co., 9 Idaho, 277, 74 Pac. 868; Kindall v. Lincoln Hdw. Co., 10 Idaho, 13, 76 Pac. 992; Murphy v. Russell & Co., 8 Idaho, 133, 67 Pac. 421.

The judgment will be reversed and a new trial granted. The cause is remanded accordingly. Costs awarded in favor of appellant.

(14 Idaho, 223)

STATE v. SHERIDAN.

(Supreme Court of Idaho. Feb. 5, 1908.)

1. LIBEL—CRIMINAL LIBEL—WHAT CONSTITUTES.

Under the provisions of section 6737, Rev. St. 1887, libel is a malicious defamation, expressed either by writing, printing, signs, or pictures, tending to impeach the honesty, integrity, virtue, or reputation of a person, and expose him to public hatred, contempt, or ridicule.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 32, Libel and Slander, § 404.]

2. SAME.

Under this section of the statute (Rev. St. 1887, § 6737), in order to constitute libel, it is not necessary that the alleged libelous matter charge the person named with a crime; but it is sufficient that the defamation tends to impeach the honesty, integrity, virtue, or reputation of such person, and thereby expose him to public hatred, contempt, or ridicule.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 32, Libel and Slander, § 404.]

3. SAME—ARTICLE LIBELOUS PER SE.

Under the statute (Rev. St. 1887, § 6737) a published article as follows: "Gooding and graft have become so thoroughly known as synonymous terms that the rank and file will have no more of it. Only federal office holders and those connected with the Gooding-Brady machine are zealous in the support of the big chief" (meaning the said Frank R. Gooding)—is libelous per se.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 32, Libel and Slander, § 404.]

4. SAME.

The fact that the alleged libelous article uses a slang word, upon which its libelous character depends, does not render the article any the less libelous by reason of that fact, provided the word used, although slang, has a well-recognized meaning, or is given a meaning by the article itself which conveys to the reader the understanding that the word is used in such a way as tends to impeach the honesty, integrity, virtue, or reputation of the person named in the article, and thereby exposes him to public hatred, contempt, or ridicule.

5. SAME—"GRAFT."

The word "graft," in its generally accepted meaning, as applied to individuals, public officials, corporations, etc., imputes to the person, officer, or corporation charged with grafting dishonesty; dishonest gain by reason of public office, or public or private position; irregular or unlawful means of support; the use of office or position for personal gain, without rendering fair or compensatory service; to steal; to swindle.

6. SAME—CONSTRUCTION OF WORDS—QUESTION FOR COURT.

Where a word is capable of two constructions, one actionable and the other not, it is the duty of the court to give to such word the construction which the circumstances show the word naturally bore, according to its plain, popular, and ordinary sense, and such as it would naturally be understood to have by persons hearing or reading it in the connection in which it is used, unless it affirmatively appears that it was used or understood in some other sense.

7. SAME—JUSTIFICATION.

Under section 6740, Rev. St. 1887, a defendant charged with libel is permitted to give in evidence, as a justification for the publication, the truth of the matter published; and, when the article published is libelous per se, the proof of the publication makes a prima facie case, and it is for the defendant to offer such proof as he may desire, showing the truth of the article published, and that the same was published with good motives and for justifiable ends.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 32, Libel and Slander, § 440.]

8. SAME—EVIDENCE.

Where an article is libelous per se, the prosecution is not required to prove the untruth of the article, or that the same was published with bad faith. The truth or good faith of the publication is a matter of defense.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 32, Libel and Slander, §§ 428, 440.]

9. SAME—PRIVILEGED ARTICLES.

An article which gives the opinion of a reporter as to the proceedings of a judicial, legislative, or other public official body is not privileged, under section 6743, Rev. St. 1887.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 32, Libel and Slander, § 410.]

10. SAME.

Under section 6743, Rev. St. 1887, in order for an article to be privileged, the article itself must be a fair, true report of a judicial, legislative, or other public official proceeding, or of a statement, speech, argument, or debate in the course of the same.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 32, Libel and Slander, §§ 407-411.]

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from District Court, Ada County; Fremont Wood, Judge.

R. S. Sheridan was indicted for criminal libel. Demurrer to the information sustained, and the state appeals. Reversed.

J. J. Guheen, Atty. Gen., Charles F. Koelsch, Pros. Atty., and Alfred A. Fraser, for the State. Frank Martin, for respondent.

STEWART, J. An information was filed against the defendant in the district court of Ada county, charging him with criminal libel. The charging part of the information is as follows: "That on the 18th day of July, 1906, one Frank R. Gooding, then being, and for a long time prior thereto having been, a public officer, to wit, Governor of the state of Idaho, duly elected, qualified, and acting as such, and said defendant, R. S. Sheridan, then being the proprietor, editor, and manager of a newspaper, to wit, the Evening Capital News, which newspaper was then, and ever since has been, published and in general circulation in Ada county, state of Idaho, the said R. S. Sheridan as such editor, proprietor, and manager did then and there willfully, unlawfully, maliciously, and with intent to injure said Frank R. Gooding, compose, print, and publish in the said newspaper a certain false and malicious defamation of and concerning the said Frank R. Gooding, Governor of Idaho, as aforesaid, and of and concerning the acts of said Frank R. Gooding as such Governor, which said malicious defamation was of the tenor and effect following; that is to say: 'Even so mild an indorsement as that of Governor Gooding's "splendid business administration" could muster but three votes in a Republican county convention near by, where the people are familiar with the record. Gooding and graft have become so thoroughly known as synonymous terms that the rank and file will have no more of it. Only federal office holders and those connected with the Gooding-Brady machine are zealous in support of the big chief' (meaning the said Frank R. Gooding). And which malicious defamation tends, and did then and there tend, to impeach the honesty, integrity, and reputation of the said Frank R. Gooding, Governor of the state of Idaho, as aforesaid, thereby exposing the said Frank R. Gooding to public hatred, contempt, and ridicule, all of which is contrary to the form, force, and effect of the statute in such case made and provided, and against the power, force, and dignity of the state of Idaho."

To this information the defendant filed a demurrer, alleging, first, that said information does not state facts sufficient to constitute a crime or public offense under the laws of the state of Idaho; second, that said information fails to state facts sufficient to constitute any public offense or any crime under the laws of the state of Idaho, and particularly as follows, to wit: "(a) Said information fails to state or charge any language as published by the defendant, Sheridan, which is libelous. (b) Said information fails to state or charge that the language which is claimed is libelous was published of and concerning Frank R. Gooding, Governor of Idaho. (c) It is nowhere alleged in said information in what way the words set forth could or did affect the party to be defamed injuriously, nor are any facts set forth in said information to which the language alleged to be libelous could so refer as to constitute said language libelous. (d) It is nowhere alleged in any averment in said information how or in what way or manner the words used tended to or did tend to impeach the honesty, integrity, or reputation of Frank R. Gooding, or in what way or manner said words did, or could be understood to, impeach the honesty, integrity, or reputation of said Frank R. Gooding. (e) The information in this case shows that the language which it is charged is libelous was published of and concerning an official body, to wit, a Republican county convention, and under the laws of the state of Idaho such publication was privileged. (f) The information in this case shows that the language which it is claimed is libelous was published concerning Frank R. Gooding as Governor of Idaho and as a candidate for renomination to the office of Governor of Idaho, and fails to show or charge that said language was not published in good faith and with the intention to inform the voters of Idaho of facts which were for the public good, or that the said publication was not made upon reliable information and with the full belief in the truth thereof." The demurrer was sustained by the court, and the state appeals from such decision, under the provisions of section 8043, Rev. St. 1887, as amended by the act of March 15, 1907 (Sess. Laws 1907, p. 508).

Counsel for the appellant contends that the language published and set forth in the information was libelous per se; while counsel for defendant and respondent contends that such language is not libelous per se, and requires an explanation, by innuendo, of the meaning intended to be conveyed by such publication. If the article set forth in the information and charged to have been published by defendant is libelous per se, then the information states facts sufficient to constitute a public offense under the laws of this state, unless the article shows upon its face to have been privileged. Section 6737, Rev. St. 1887, provides as follows: "A libel is a malicious defamation, expressed either by writing, printing, or by signs or pictures, or the like, tending to blacken the memory of one who is dead, or to impeach the honesty, integrity, virtue or reputation, or publish the natural or alleged defects of one who is alive, and thereby to expose him to public hatred, contempt, or ridicule." It will thus be seen that this section provides that libel is a malicious defamation tending to impeach the honesty, integrity, virtue, or reputation, and thereby to expose such person to public hatred, contempt, or ridicule. Under this statute the article published as alleged in the information is libelous per se. The article says: "Gooding and graft have become so thoroughly known as synonymous terms that the rank and file will have no more of it. Only federal office holders and those connected with the Gooding-Brady machine are zealous in support of the big chief" (meaning the said Frank R. Gooding). Section 6737, supra, does not require, in order to constitute libel, that the alleged libelous matter charge the person named with a crime. It is sufficient under the statute that the defamation tends to impeach the honesty, integrity, virtue, or reputation of such person, and thereby expose him to public hatred, contempt, or ridicule. The statute does not even require that the alleged libelous matter must impeach the honesty, integrity, virtue, or reputation of such person; but if it tends to do so it is libelous. An examination of the article alleged to be libelous discloses that the charge is made that "Gooding and graft have become so thoroughly known as synonymous terms that the rank and file will have no more of it. Only federal office holders and those connected with the Gooding-Brady machine are zealous in support of the big chief" (meaning the said Frank R. Gooding). In other words, this article charges Gooding and graft to be the same, or that Gooding is a grafter, and, by reason of being a grafter, the rank and file will have no more to do with him.

Counsel for appellant contends that the word "graft," as applied to individuals, officials, or corporations, has a definite and distinct meaning; while counsel for respondent contends that the word "graft" is merely a slang word, and that it has no fixed or settled meaning. The word "graft," as applied to individuals, officials, corporations, etc., is of comparatively recent origin, and has come into general use within recent years, yet during that time its use has been so general that its meaning has become fixed and well-recognized. In the Standard Dictionary, published in 1905, it is defined as follows: "An irregular or unlawful means of support; a steal or swindle; that which has been obtained by grafting; stolen goods." "Grafter" is there defined as one who grafts; a swindler or dishonest person. In the Century Dictionary and Cyclopedia (volume 3, p. 2591) the following definition is given: "Graft 3 (graft), n. Dishonest gain acquired by private or secret practices or corrupt agreement or connivance, especially in positions of trust, as by offering or accepting bribes (slang). Graft 3 (graft), v. 1. To engage in graft; live by graft (slang). Grafter 2 (grafter), n. One who takes or makes 'graft,' or dishonest private gain, especially in positions of trust, and in ways peculiarly corrupt (slang)." The New Dictionary of Americanisms, published by Louis Weiss & Co., New York, defines it as follows: "Graft—In thieves' parlance, to pick pockets, to help another to steal." The Dictionary of Slang and Colloquial English, published by E. P. Dutton & Co., New York, defines it: "Graft—To steal." In the case of Craig v. Warren, 99 Minn. 246, 109 N. W. 231, the Supreme Court of Minnesota defines the word as follows: "The word 'graft' is commonly used to designate an advantage which one person, by reason of his peculiar position of superiority, influence, or trust, extracts from another."

As to the definition taken from the Century Dictionary, as above given, respondent contends that the word is a slang term, and that the definition was merely an example to show how it is sometimes used. Respondent then quotes from a number of articles, secured from the press of the country, dealing with the word "graft," and the use made of it. These articles were promiscuously selected, and show many different uses given to the word "graft." It is history, however, that during the last four or five years the press and magazine writers have been very generous in the use of this word "graft," and it is doubtful if any other word in the English language, except the common ordinary everyday words, has been more generally used than the word "graft." This general use gives to it its meaning and fixes its standing. The fact that the word is yet a slang word does not detract from or render its meaning any less definite than it would have if it were a word used by the standard writers and authorities in the literary world. It is difficult to draw the line of demarcation between a slang word and a word standardized in good English. The promotion given a slang word, so as to entitle it to enter the society of good English, is based on its general use in the literature of the country; that it is no longer shunned or disregarded by standard writers. Many words, which are now good English, and recognized and used by the leading writers of the day, were formerly slang, and passed through the intermediate stage of colloquialism before they secured admission to the literary language. "There is no real difference in kind between the processes of slang and those of legitimate speech. Slang is only the rude luxuriance of the uncared-for soil, knowing not the hand of the gardener." Its richness, however, is not changed or added to by its subjection to the caretaker. The fact that a word may be slang to-day, and to-morrow may discard its associates and enter better society, does not necessarily give the word a different meaning, or change its use, or add any strength or force to its meaning. The change is only a matter of recognition on the part of the literary writers of the country. Even though the word "graft" may still be recognized as slang, yet its meaning and use have always been and will be the same. It takes its name and meaning from its use during the slang period. When standardized, its meaning is the same.

The fact that an article alleged to be libelous uses a slang word, upon which its libelous character depends, does not render the article any the less libelous by reason of that fact. If the word used, although slang, has a well-recognized meaning, or is given a meaning by the article itself which conveys to the reader the understanding that the word is used in such a way as tends to impeach the honesty, integrity, virtue, or reputation of the person named in the article, and thereby exposes him to public hatred, contempt, or ridicule, it is no less libelous. In the article in question in this case the writer has placed a construction upon the word "graft" as therein used. It says: "Gooding and graft are synonymous terms"—that is, each stands for the other, and means the same as the other—and "have become so thoroughly known that the rank and file will have no more of it." In other words, the rank and file will have no more of "graft," and no more of anything for which graft stands. The intention, evidently, of the writer, was to imply that by reason of the fact that Gooding and graft were synonymous terms there was in the word "graft" itself an inherent vice with which the rank and file would have nothing whatever to do; that it was odious, of a nature and character that met the disapproval, censure, and blame of the public. We think it will now be generally conceded that the word "graft," as applied to individuals, officials, corporations, etc., stands for dishonesty; dishonest gain by reason of public office or public or private position; irregular or unlawful means of support; the use of office or position for personal gain, without rendering fair or compensatory service; to steal or swindle. If this be a fair illustration of the meaning of the word "graft," the publication of an article signifying that a public official's name was synonymous with this word inevitably tends to impeach his honesty, his integrity, and his reputation, and by reason of such fact necessarily exposes him to public hatred, contempt, and ridicule.

Certainly, in the publication of the article involved in this case, the defendant did not intend to give Gooding a certificate of good character, testifying to his honesty and integrity, or apply to him an endearing term. The very reverse is disclosed by the language of the article. The defendant evidently intended, and did in fact say, that by reason of the fact that Gooding and graft were synonymous terms there was something in or about Gooding, because he was a grafter, which was odious and offensive to the rank and file, and, because of that, they would have nothing further to do with him. The language of the article is sufficient of itself to show its tendency, and requires no innuendo or explanation to give effect to that tendency. In the case of People v. Seeley, 139 Cal. 119, 72 Pac. 834, the Supreme Court of California, in discussing this question, says: "Of course, the publication must have the tendency to do some one of the things prescribed in the statute; but, in case the alleged libelous matter is such per se, it is sufficient to set it forth, and the law says it tends to impeach the honesty, integrity, virtue, or reputation of the party concerning whom it was published. The malicious defamation is complete when the defendant has done the thing or things set forth in the statute. The information states clearly that defendant did the thing defined as libel. As to whether or not the published matter tended to impeach the honesty, integrity, virtue, or reputation of the party concerning whom it was published, when the matter is libelous per se, is as easily ascertained by the inspection of it as it would be by a statement of the district attorney as to his opinion concerning it. It is provided in section 964 of the Penal Code: 'An indictment or information for libel need not set forth any intrinsic facts for the purpose of showing the application to the party libeled of the defamatory matter on which the indictment or information is founded; but it is sufficient to state generally that the same was published concerning him, and the fact that it was so published must be established on the trial.' If the facts are stated in ordinary and concise language, so that a person of common understanding knows what is intended, it is sufficient. It is clearly libelous under the statutes of this state."

Counsel for respondent contends that, where a word is capable of two constructions, one actionable and the other not, it is the duty of the court to give to such word an innocent construction if possible, or that construction which will render the same not libelous. The rule, however, as we understand it, is that where a word is capable of two constructions, one actionable and the other not, that construction will be adopted which the circumstances show the word naturally bore, and that all parts of the article should be taken together in order to determine the true meaning. Berea v. Powell (Ky.) 77 S. W. 381; Holmes v. Cilsby, 118 Ga. 820, 45 S. E. 684; Kilgour v. Evening Star Newspaper Company, 96 Md. 16, 53 Atl. 716. The rule of construction now adopted by the courts is that words are to be construed according to their plain, popular, natural, and ordinary sense, and as they would naturally be understood by persons hearing or reading them, unless it affirmatively appears that they were used and understood in some other sense. Cooper v. Greeley, 1 Denio (N. Y.) 358; More v. Bennett, 48 N. Y. 472; Little v. Barlow, 26 Ga. 423, 71 Am. Dec. 219; World Pub. Co. v. Mullen, 43 Neb. 128, 61 N. W. 108, 47 Am. St. Rep. 737; Edwards v. San Jose P. & P. Soc., 99 Cal. 431, 34 Pac. 128; 2 Current Law, 706; People v. Ritchie, 12 Utah, 180, 42 Pac. 209. We are not aware of any definition or general use made of the word "graft" which would indicate an innocent act or motive on the part of the person designated as a grafter; and our attention has not been called to any general use made of this word which would not have a tendency to impeach the honesty, integrity, or reputation of the person designated as a grafter. In thus holding we believe we are adopting the use and meaning of this word generally recognized, as applied to individuals, public officials, or corporations; and to charge one with being a grafter has a tendency to impeach his honesty, integrity, and reputation.

It is next contended by respondent, in support of the action of the lower court in sustaining the demurrer to the information, that the information should set forth and charge the particular dishonest act imputed to the person named in the article by the use of the word "graft." The defendant who wrote the article knows best the use made of the word "graft," as intended by him in the published article. He is permitted under section 6740,

Rev. St. 1887, to give in evidence, as a justification for the publication, the truth of the matter published. When the article published is libelous per se, the proof of publication makes a prima facie case, and it is for the defendant to offer such proof as he may desire in defense, showing the truth of the article published; and if it appears to the jury that the matter charged as libelous is true, and was published with good motives and for justifiable ends, the party is to be acquitted. It would be a strange doctrine, indeed, if the state was required, where an article published is libelous per se, to prove the untruth of the article, when the article charges the person named with a series of acts, any one of which is libelous. If this rule were to prevail, when the state proved one act the defense might claim that the article intended to charge some other act, and if that be proven untrue the defense might claim that it was intended to charge another act, and so on; but this rule is not the law where the article is libelous per se. Current Law, vol. 2, p. 707; Id. vol. 6, p. 414.

It is next claimed that the article in question was privileged. Section 6743, Rev. St. 1887, provides: "That no reporter, editor, or proprietor of any newspaper is liable to any prosecution for a fair and true report of any judicial, legislative, or other public official proceedings, or of any statement, speech, argument or debate in the course of the same, except upon proof of malice in making such report, which shall not be implied from the mere fact of publication." An examination of the article published discloses that the alleged libelous matter did not purport to be a report of any judicial, legislative, or other public official proceeding, or of any statement, speech, argument, or debate in the course of the same. The inception of the article says: "Even so mild an indorsement as that of Governor Gooding's 'splendid business administration,' could muster but three votes in a Republican county convention near by, where the people are familiar with the record." This part of the article does not set forth the action of the convention referred to. It is merely a reporter's opinion of the action, and does not even claim to be a report of such a convention. But the libelous part of the article which follows is not alleged or charged to be the action or acts of any convention or official proceeding. It does not appear to be the opinion of a reporter as to what took place at an official proceeding or convention. It is a positive declaration and assertion of an alleged fact, and does not come within the provisions of the statute as to a privileged communication. A newspaper has full right to publish the news, and to criticize and expose official misconduct and dishonesty; but, where an article published is libelous per se, the newspaper cannot justify the publication upon the ground that it is a report of an official body, unless the article is confined to the minutes or proceedings of the convention. It cannot shield itself behind a report giving an opinion of what such body or convention did. Where the article published is libelous per se, the truth of the article or the motive which prompted its publication are matters of defense. The prosecution is not required to prove the motive or bad faith. The good faith is a matter of defense.

We have made a careful examination of all the authorities cited in this case, and the authorities generally, and find that a large number of them have no bearing on the case under consideration, for the reason that the decisions have been made upon statutes different from that of this state. An examination of the statute of this state will at once impress the reader with the fact that it is very strict in its terms, and makes libelous any writing, printing, signs, or pictures which tend to impeach the honesty, integrity, virtue, or reputation of the person named, and thereby expose him to public hatred, contempt, or ridicule. The statutes of many states require, for the article to be libelous per se, that it charge the person named with a crime, or that as a fact it impeach the honesty, integrity, virtue, or reputation of the person named; but the statutes of this state only require that the article published tends to impeach the honesty, integrity, virtue, or reputation of the person named, and, if so, it is libelous per se. Counsel for both appellant and respondent cite the case of Douglas v. Douglas, 4 Idaho, 293, 38 Pac. 934. That was an action for damages for slander. The question in that case was whether or not the words spoken were slanderous per se, and the court held that, inasmuch as the words spoken did not charge the party against whom they were spoken with a crime, they were not actionable per se. We have no statute in this state defining slander, or providing what shall constitute slander; but we have a statute defining and prescribing what shall constitute libel. In determining whether particular words are actionable per se, the same rule does not apply to libel as to slander. What would not be actionable without alleging and proving special damages if simply spoken may be actionable per se if written or printed or otherwise published in a libel. Any words which would be actionable if spoken will be actionable if published in writing or its equivalent. Current Law, vol. 2, p. 709. The law of libel goes much further than the law of slander, and gives a cause of action without the necessity of alleging and proving any special damage, as in the case of slander; for any words which are false, and not justified or privileged, and which are either injurious to the character or credit, domestic, public, or professional, of the person concerning whom they are published, or in any way tend to cause men to shun his society, or bring him into hatred, contempt, or ridicule. The authorities treating of this subject generally are collected and cited in Current Law, vol. 2, p. 710. The case of Douglas v. Douglas, supra, is not authority in a prosecution for libel, where the alleged libelous matter is such per se, even though a crime is not charged. We are therefore of the opinion that the information states a public offense under the laws of this state, and that the district court erred in sustaining the demurrer.

The judgment of the district court is reversed, and the cause remanded.

BOSWELL v. FIRST NAT. BANK OF LARAMIE.

(Supreme Court of Wyoming. Feb. 10, 1908.)

1. EXECUTION—SUPPLEMENTARY PROCEEDINGS—SALE OF MORTGAGED CHATTELS—TITLE ACQUIRED.

One buying mortgaged chattels at a sale of a receiver, appointed in aid of execution instituted by a judgment creditor of the mortgagor, was bound to take notice that the court making the order of sale had no jurisdiction to do so.

2. CHATTEL MORTGAGES—TRANSFER OF PROPERTY—RIGHTS OF PURCHASER.

Where defendant in purchasing cattle took a bill of sale ending, "It is understood and agreed that we in no way guarantee the title to the cattle herein mentioned," he took the chances of the title acquired, and because he was honestly mistaken as to the validity of the sale at which he purchased is not a legal reason why he should be protected against mortgages on the cattle given to secure a valid indebtedness of former owners.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 9, Chattel Mortgages, §§ 468-470.]

On petition for rehearing. Petition denied. For former opinion, see 92 Pac. 624.

BEARD, J. The plaintiff in error has filed a petition for a rehearing in this case, in which it is urged that the court was in error on each and every question decided. The opinion appears in 92 Pac. 626, advance sheets. It is contended that a chattel mortgage on copartnership property is invalid unless the mortgage is signed by each and every member of the firm in person, and that authority to do so cannot be conferred by power of attorney. The statute requiring such mortgages to be executed by each member of the firm was evidently intended to limit the general agency of the members of the firm, and one of its purposes was to prohibit one member, without the knowledge or consent of the others, from creating specific liens upon the firm property. But we can perceive no good reason—nor has any been advanced—why such authority cannot be conferred by a proper power of attorney for that purpose, as well as in at least equally important business transactions such as the incumbrance or conveyance of real estate.

It is argued with much ability and at length, in counsel's brief in support of the petition for rehearing, that the record of the mortgages in this case did not constitute constructive notice by reason of the fact that they were acknowledged before a notary who was at the time a stockholder of the corporation, which was the mortgagee, and that the district court erred in refusing to permit the plaintiff in error to prove that fact on the trial. We are, and were at the time the decision in this case was handed down, aware of the conflict in the decisions upon that question. In the case before us the mortgages were valid between the parties although not acknowledged. (See paragraph 2 of the opinion.) The acknowledgments are in due form, and there is nothing either upon the faces of the instruments or in the certificates of acknowledgment to indicate that the notary was a stockholder in the mortgagee corporation or had any interest in the mortgages. They were fair and regular upon their faces. They were therefore admissible to record for the reasons stated in the opinion, and imparted constructive notice to subsequent purchasers. In addition to the authorities cited in the opinion, see Read v. Loan Co., 68 Ohio St. 280, 67 N. E. 729, 62 L. R. A. 790, 96 Am. St. Rep. 663, National Bank of Fredericksburg v. Conway, 17 Fed. Cas. 1202, Case No. 10,037, and Fair v. Bank, 70 Kan. 612, 79 Pac. 144, 67 L. R. A. 851. In the Kansas case last cited it was held that "a chattel mortgage, regular upon its face, duly filed for record, and accompanied by an affidavit of renewal, filed in proper time and regular upon its face, and regular in fact except for the latent defect that the notary public who administered the oath was a stockholder in the mortgagee corporation, imparts notice as fully as if such defect did not exist." (From syllabus by the court.) It must be remembered that we are considering a question of notice only, and not whether the acknowledgments of these mortgages (assuming that the notary was a stockholder in the bank) were sufficient proof of their execution to admit them in evidence. Their execution was otherwise proved. What we held, and now hold, is that the acknowledgments being fair and regular upon their faces, and there being nothing on the faces of the instruments or the certificates of acknowledgment indicating any disqualification of the notary or that he had any interest in the mortgages, they were admissible to record, and that the record imparted constructive notice to subsequent purchasers.

It is urged that "the case is one of peculiar hardship, and that the long residence and undoubted character for fair dealing and commercial integrity of the plaintiff in error, as disclosed by the records in this case, surely does not stamp him as a wrongdoer or trespasser. He evidently relied upon the order of the district court and the fact that the chief executive officer of the county acted at the sale." All this may be granted, but it does not change the situation. He was bound to take notice of the fact that the court making the order of sale had no jurisdiction to do so. He took his chances on the title he acquired, and that he did so knowingly appears from the bill of sale which he introduced as evidence of his title. The bill of sale is as follows: "Albany County, Wyoming, March 11th, 1903. This is to certify that for and in consideration of the sum of twelve hundred dollars to us in hand paid, we have this day sold to N. K. Boswell all our right, title and interest in and to the cattle described in a certain bill of sale, bearing even date herewith, given by Alfred Cook, sheriff of Albany county, state of Wyoming, as receiver of the property and effects of the co-partnership of Bird Brothers to us. It is understood and agreed that we in no way guarantee the title to the cattle herein mentioned. (Signed) Harden & Hartman." It is evident that the plaintiff in error understood that he was acquiring only such right, title, or interest in the cattle as Harden & Hartman acquired by virtue of their purchase from the receiver. That sale was held to be void for the reason that the court making the order of sale was without jurisdiction to order it. He took the chances, and because he was honestly mistaken as to the validity of the receiver's sale is not a legal reason why he should be protected against these mortgages given to secure a valid indebtedness of Bird Bros. to the bank. The other points presented by the petition for rehearing are so fully discussed in the opinion that we deem it unnecessary to enter upon a further discussion of them or to repeat what is therein stated.

The case was fully and ably presented at the hearing, both in briefs and in oral arguments, and we have again considered the questions presented by the petition for rehearing, but see no reason to depart from the decision as handed down. A rehearing is therefore denied.

Rehearing denied.

KOPPALA et al. v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Wyoming. Feb. 10, 1908.)

1. MINES AND MINERALS—OFFENSES BY COAL MINERS—INTENT.

Under the statute making it unlawful for a coal miner to enter any place in a mine against caution or to disobey orders, or to do any other act whereby lives or health of persons or the security of the mine, etc., is endangered, intent to endanger life or property is not an element of an offense; the intentional doing of an act with knowledge that in so doing life or property will be thereby endangered being the gist thereof.

2. SAME—"CAUTION" DEFINED.

To "caution," as used in the statute, making it unlawful for a miner to enter a place in a coal mine against "caution," or to do any other act whereby lives or the security of the mine, etc., means to give notice of, or warn against, danger.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 2, p. 1020.]

3. SAME—INFORMATION—SUFFICIENCY.

Under the statute making it unlawful for a miner to enter any place in a coal mine against caution or to disobey orders, or do any other act whereby the lives or health of persons or the security of the mine, etc., is endangered, an information is sufficient where it charges that defendants on a specified day in a certain county, against the caution and in disobedience of the mining boss of a specified coal mine, unlawfully, wrongfully, and willfully entered the mine and a specified mine entry thereof, an unsafe portion of the mine, thereby endangering the lives and health of persons employed in the mine and the security of the mine and its machinery, that defendants were miners and workmen employed in the mine, and that it was the property of a specified corporation, which employed an average of more than 10 persons in such mine during every 24 hours.

4. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION—STATUTORY OFFENSES—SUFFICIENCY.

An information charging a statutory offense in the language of the statute is usually sufficient, where the statute fully defines the offense, especially after the verdict.

5. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—CRIMINAL LAW—DUE PROCESS OF LAW—WHAT CONSTITUTES.

A criminal trial upon a sufficient information under a valid statute, a finding of guilty by a jury, and the imposition by the court of the minimum penalty presented by the statute, constitutes due process of law.

On petition for rehearing. Denied.

For former opinion, see 89 Pac. 576.

BEARD, J. This case was decided at the April, 1907, term of this court; the opinion appearing in 89 Pac. 576.

A petition for a rehearing was filed, and, as the case had been submitted on briefs without oral argument, the court requested oral arguments on the petition for rehearing, and the case has been argued orally and at length. The petition is based upon two grounds, viz.: That the information is insufficient and charges no offense; and that the statute is unconstitutional. The charge contained in the information is as follows: That the defendants "on the 24th day of July, A. D. 1905, at the county of Carbon and state of Wyoming, did then and there, against the caution and in disobedience of the mining boss of Hanna Coal Mine No. 1, at Hanna, Wyo., unlawfully, wrongfully, and willfully enter said Hanna Coal Mine No. 1, and did then and there, against the caution and in disobedience of the said mining boss, unlawfully, wrongfully, and willfully enter mine entry No. 28, of said Hanna Coal Mine No. 1, an unsafe portion of said mine, and did thereby endanger the lives and health of persons employed in said mine, and did then and there and thereby endanger the security of said mine and the machinery employed therein, the said Nels Koppala and the said Isaac Lampe then and there being miners and workmen employed in said mine, the said Hanna Coal Mine No. 1 then and there being the property of the Union Pacific Coal Company, a corporation, which said Union Pacific Coal Company, a corporation, then and there employed an average of more than 10 persons in said Hanna Coal Mine No. 1 during every 24 hours."

It is contended that the information is not sufficient because it does not state the names of the persons whose lives were endangered. But, as stated in the opinion, the information also charges that the security of the mine was endangered, which would constitute the offense without the allegation that the life or health of any one was endangered. The intent to endanger or injure life or property is not an element of the offense; but it consists of the intentional doing of an act with the knowledge that in so doing life or property will be thereby endangered; and the information in this case charges that the defendants, against the caution of the mining boss, entered an unsafe place in the mine, and did thereby endanger the life and health of those in the mine and the security of the mine and the machinery therein. To caution means to give notice of danger—to warn against danger—and a fair and reasonable construction of the language of the information is that the defendants did, after being notified and warned of the danger in so doing, intentionally entered an unsafe portion of the mine, and did thereby endanger the lives and health of those in the mine and the security of the mine and machinery. Accurate pleading might require a more definite statement in some respects than is contained in the information; but it contains all of the essential elements of the crime, and the charge is substantially in the language of the statute. The offense is purely statutory and the statute fully defines the offense; and in such case it is usually sufficient to charge the offense in the language of the statute. This is especially so after a verdict. The objections to the sufficiency of the information go to the manner of stating the offense, and not to the substance. It is not in a failure to state some essential element of the offense, but it is in the manner in which it is stated, of which complaint is made. Such objections are waived if not presented by motion to quash before plea.

It has been very earnestly urged in argument that the statute is unconstitutional, in that it is a delegation of legislative power; and, in the language of the brief of counsel for plaintiffs in error, gives "a mining boss or other person the right to make his word equivalent to a law the disobedience of which would make them criminals." We do not so construe the statute. It simply makes it a misdemeanor to enter a mine or some part thereof under certain defined conditions, among which is to intentionally enter any part of the mine against caution whereby life or property is endangered. It is not the entering of some safe place of the mine in disobedience of an arbitrary order of the mining boss when neither life or property would be endangered in so doing; but it is the intentional act of willfully and knowingly doing that which exposes life or property to danger that the law condemns. The statute makes it the duty of the mining boss to ascertain and know the condition of the mine, and it imposes a penalty upon him for permitting any one to work in an unsafe place except for the purpose of making it safe; and the provisions of the statute we are here considering makes the caution of the mining boss sufficient notice of the danger to render the act of intentionally entering after such caution, and thereby exposing life or property to danger, criminal. The Legislature certainly had the right to say that it should be a misdemeanor for one to intentionally do an act which would endanger life or property after being cautioned by one on whom the law imposed the duty of ascertaining the danger. In other words the provision is a protection against unreasonable criminal accusations rather than the reverse, since it exposes one to prosecution only upon the doing of an act after a specified notice of the danger attending it. The situation is the same, in effect, as to make one guilty of an offense upon knowingly doing the forbidden act. Statutes similar to ours and containing substantially the same provisions have been enacted and have been in force in a number of the states for many years, among which are Illinois, West Virginia, Missouri, Kansas, and Iowa; but, so far as we are advised, their constitutionality has not been questioned upon the ground that they were a delegation of legislative power. Counsel for plaintiffs in error say in their brief: "Unquestionably the Legislature under the police powers has a right to say that the omission of certain acts or the commission of certain acts productive of injury to life or property shall be a crime." That is what we understand the statute to do. It forbids the commission of certain acts whereby life or property is endangered; and such is the charge contained in the information. The Legislature, and not the mining boss, has defined what acts should constitute the offense. Upon a re-examination of the case, we discover no reason for reopening the case for further argument. The defendants were tried upon a sufficient information under a valid statute, found guilty by a jury, and the minimum penalty provided by the statute imposed by the court. This in our opinion constituted due process of law, and there is nothing presented by the record in the case showing the defendants to have been deprived of any substantial right, or that they have just cause for complaint. A rehearing is therefore denied.

Rehearing denied.

CHICAGO, B. & Q. R. CO. v. MORRIS.

(Supreme Court of Wyoming. Feb. 10, 1908.)

1. WRIT OF ERROR—REVIEW—FINDINGS ON CONFLICTING EVIDENCE.

A special finding by the jury on conflicting evidence will not be disturbed on writ of error.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, §§ 3935-3937.]

2. CARRIERS—CARRIAGE OF LIVE STOCK—DUTY TO FURNISH SUITABLE CARS—LIABILITY FOR INJURIES.

A carrier of live stock is bound to furnish cars suitably equipped to safely transport horses to their destination, and is liable for injuries to them from a failure to do so.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 9, Carriers, § 925.]

3. SAME—DUTY OF SHIPPER TO INSPECT CAR.

A shipper of horses is not required to inspect a car furnished by a carrier for their transportation to see if it is properly equipped.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 9, Carriers, § 931.]

4. SAME—LIABILITY OF CARRIER FOR DELAY.

While it is not every delay that will entitle a shipper of live stock to damages, if a delay is caused by the carrier's negligence and contributes to the injury of the stock, it constitutes a proximate cause and is ground for damages.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 9, Carriers, §§ 920-922.]

5. SAME—ACTIONS—EVIDENCE—PROXIMATE CAUSE.

Evidence examined, and held sufficient to support a special finding that the proximate causes of an injury to horses while being transported by a carrier were the defective condition of the car and delay in transportation.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 9, Carriers, § 900.]

6. SAME—QUESTION FOR COURT—CONSTRUCTION OF SHIPPER'S CONTRACT.

The rights, duties, and obligations created by a contract of shipment between a shipper and carrier are questions of law for the court.

7. WRIT OF ERROR—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR—SPECIAL FINDINGS.

In an action by a shipper against a carrier on an express contract to transport horses, where the question whether it was plaintiff's duty to accompany the stock was improperly submitted to the jury as a question of fact, their answer that there was no evidence showing such a duty was not prejudicial to defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, §§ 4059, 4231.]

8. CARRIERS—CARRIAGE OF LIVE STOCK—INJURY—VICES AND PROPENSITIES—BURDEN OF PROOF.

That a carrier may avoid liability for injuries to horses during transportation on the ground of their vices and natural propensities, it must appear that the injuries occurred by reason of such vices and natural propensities alone, or in conjunction with some innocent cause, and the burden is upon the carrier to prove that fact.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 9, Carriers, § 929.]

9. SAME—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—NEGLIGENCE.

In an action by a shipper against a carrier for injuries to horses during transportation, evidence held sufficient to support a finding that the carrier was negligent.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 9, Carriers, § 960.]

10. NEGLIGENCE—PROXIMATE CAUSE—QUESTION FOR JURY.

The proximate cause of an injury is a question for the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 37, Negligence, §§ 279-302.]

11. CARRIERS—CARRIAGE OF LIVE STOCK—ACTIONS—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

In an action by a shipper against a carrier for injuries to horses during transportation, evidence held to sustain a verdict for plaintiff.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 9, Carriers, § 960.]

12. WRIT OF ERROR—RESERVATION OF GROUNDS OF REVIEW—MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL—STATEMENT OF GROUNDS.

The allegation, as ground of a motion for a new trial, of "errors of law occurring at the trial," is too general and indefinite to present for review, in an action by a shipper against a carrier for injuries to live stock in transit, the question whether the court erred in refusing to permit the carrier to show that it was a custom to attach car loads of stock at the rear end of the train, but the particular error and matter complained of should be specified.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 2, Appeal and Error, § 1744.]

13. TRIAL—VERDICT—SPECIAL FINDINGS—RIGHT TO JUDGMENT.

The right to a judgment upon special findings returned with a general verdict, as expressly allowed by Rev. St. 1899, § 3653, is limited to cases where there is an inconsistency between the special finding and the general verdict by section 3657, providing that when the special finding of facts is inconsistent with the general verdict the former shall control the latter, and the court may give judgment accordingly.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 46, Trial, §§ 857-860.]

14. CARRIERS—CARRIAGE OF LIVE STOCK—LOSS—ACTIONS—EVIDENCE—NEGLIGENCE.

The fact that during transit the door of a stock car in which horses were being transported was found partly open, the bull board down, and a horse missing, is evidence of the carrier's negligence in failing to furnish a car provided with a secure and safe door to prevent the horses from falling out or escaping.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 9, Carriers, § 960.]

15. SAME—DAMAGES—EXCESSIVE DAMAGES.

Plaintiff shipped a car load of horses over defendant's railroad. By reason of the defective condition of the car and delay in transportation eight of them were injured by falling down in the car, and one escaped through the door in transit. Of the horses injured, one died, and the others were sold at prices much lower than they would have brought had they not been injured. Held, that $295 damages, being within the evidence, and not excluding the limit of value in the contract of shipment, was not excessive.

Error to District Court, Sheridan County; Carroll H. Parmelee, Judge.

Action by A. J. Morris against the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Lonabaugh & Wenzell and N. K. Griggs, for plaintiff in error. Robert P. Parker, for defendant in error.

SCOTT, J. This action was brought in the district court of Sheridan county by the defendant in error, as plaintiff, against the plaintiff in error, as defendant, to recover damages for injury to horses while in transit over plaintiff in error's line of railway, alleged to have been sustained by reason of the negligence of the company. The case was tried to a jury, and a general verdict returned December 13, 1906, in favor of Morris and against the company for the sum of $295, as damages and interest thereon from October 16, 1905. At the same time the jury returned their separate answers to interrogatories which the court submitted to them as follows, viz.: "Int. 1. Was the car containing plaintiff's horses overloaded or overcrowded? Ans. No. Int. 2. Did the overloading or the overcrowding of the car in question cause, or contribute to, the falling or injuring of plaintiff's horses while in transit between Aberdeen and Sheridan? Ans. Not overcrowded or overloaded. Int. 3. Was it the duty of the plaintiff to go himself, or have some one else do so, along with the car of horses in question, while same was in transit between Aberdeen and Sheridan, to prevent his horses from falling and being trampled upon while in the car in such transit? Ans. No evidence to show. Int. 4. Was the falling or the injuring of plaintiff's horses, while in transit between Aberdeen and Sheridan, due to any act of negligence or want of care of defendant? And, if so, state specifically in what such negligence or want of care consisted, and also state by whose testimony or by what evidence such negligence or want of care of defendant has been shown. Ans. Bad order car and delayed train. By defendant's witness and all others. Int. 5. Was the falling or injury of plaintiff's horses, while in transit between Aberdeen and Sheridan, caused by any rough or unusual handling of the car containing such horses? And, if so, state specifically where such rough and unusual handling occurred, and by whose testimony or by what evidence such fact is established. Ans. No testimony." A motion by the company for judgment on the special findings, as also a motion for a new trial, was overruled, and the company brings the case here on error.

1. The company assigns as error the overruling of its motion for a new trial. It is contended, first, that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict; second, that the verdict is contrary to law; third, that it was entitled to judgment upon its motion therefor upon the special findings.

It is admitted in the pleadings that plaintiff in error is and was a railroad company operating a line of railroad at the time of the shipment of the horses from Billings, Mont., to St. Louis, Mo., and a common carrier transporting merchandise and live stock for hire, and that it received a car load of horses from the defendant in error as such common carrier, and undertook to transport them over its line to their destination. There was conflicting evidence upon the question as to whether the car was overloaded or overcrowded. The jury, as seen by their special finding No. 1, found that it was not, and, in view of the conflicting evidence upon that question, such finding cannot be disturbed. The jury having so answered the first interrogatory, it follows that their second finding is correct, for, if there was no overloading or overcrowding of the stock in the car, it is apparent that the injury to the animals cannot be attributed to that cause.

The evidence tended to show that upon the plaintiff's application the company, on the 16th day of October, 1905, furnished him a car on its side track and at its loading pen at Aberdeen, Mont., for the purpose of shipping a car load of horses from that point to East St. Louis. The car was loaded about 11 o'clock at night, and shortly thereafter it was switched from the side track and attached to a freight train in rear of 47 car loads of lumber, and next forward of the caboose. The car had a broken drawbar on the front end, and was coupled to the car in front by a chain, there being about 18 inches of slack which was not taken up by the chain. The train was equipped with air brakes which were coupled onto the damaged car. The boiler of the engine was foaming, and the train was overloaded, so that in climbing Parkman Hill in going south from Aberdeen the train crew had to divide the train, and it was hauled in separate sections up that hill. The train was also delayed by having to wait at meeting points, and did not reach Sheridan, a distance of 40 miles from the starting point, until some time between 12:30 and 2:30 in the afternoon of the next day. Upon arrival at Sheridan the car was allowed to stand in the yards from 1½ to 1¾ hours before the horses were unloaded. It was then found that eight of the horses had been injured by having fallen in the car and having been trampled upon, one dying shortly thereafter, three were in such condition that they could not be shipped further, and the remaining four were reloaded with the rest. The three left in the stockyards at Sheridan were afterwards sold by the company, and the other four so injured were sold by the shipper at their destination at prices much below what they would have brought had they been free from injuries. At Newcastle, Wyo., the horses were again unloaded for water and feed, and, with the exception of those left at Sheridan, none were missing from the shipment. The horses were again reloaded, and upon arrival at Alliance, Neb., it was found that one horse was missing. The door of the car was discovered to be partly open and the bull board down. Neither the owner nor any one in his behalf accompanied the horses to care for them and attend to their needs between Aberdeen and Sheridan, and this fact was known to the conductor who was in charge of the train. No contract of shipment was signed at the initial point nor at the time of delivery and acceptance of the horses by the company for transportation. The shipment, with the exception of the four head left at Sheridan, was accompanied from that point by a Mr. Towns as agent for the shipper, and upon leaving Sheridan he signed a shipping contract as agent for his principal. The contract so signed purports to be dated at Parkman Station on October 16, 1905, and the number of head of horses as stated therein is 38. There was evidence on behalf of the defendant tending to show careful handling and management of the train, and the jury by their answer to interrogatory No. 5 found that there was no testimony to show that the injury to plaintiff's horses between Aberdeen and Sheridan was due to any rough or unusual handling of the car.

It was incumbent upon the company to furnish a car properly equipped to safely transport the horses to their destination, and it was liable for injuries resulting from a failure to do so. 5 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law (2d Ed.) 432; 6 Cyc. 440. It is conceded that the car which was furnished had a broken drawbar, and it is not shown that the plaintiff was cognizant of that fact, nor was it his duty to inspect the car. Union Pac. Ry. Co. v. Rainey, 19 Colo. 225, 34 Pac. 986; Mason v. Mo. Pac. Ry. Co., 25 Mo. App. 473; Gulf, etc., Ry. Co. v. Trawick, 80 Tex. 270, 15 S. W. 568, 18 S. W. 948; 5 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, 435. According to the evidence on behalf of the plaintiff, there was 18 inches of slack between the car in which the horses were and the next car ahead which was not taken up by the chain with which the coupling was made, and there was evidence tending to show that there would be more jarring and unsteadiness of the car by reason of such slack, and consequently a greater tendency of the horses to get down in the car and be trampled upon, than if the car had been properly equipped in this respect. One of the witnesses for the defendant, who at the time was superintendent of the division of defendant's railroad on which the injuries occurred, testified that any defect in a train might cause more jarring, and that a defective drawbar would be a serious defect.

The length of time consumed by the train in going from Aberdeen to Sheridan, a distance of 40 miles only, and the delay in reaching the latter point, was properly before the jury as bearing upon the question of proper equipment to handle the train and transport the animals with reasonable dispatch to where they could be unloaded and cared for. While it is not every delay that entitles a shipper to damages, yet if such delay was by reason of negligence of the company and contributed to the injury it constituted a proximate cause, and an action for damages would lie. The overloading an engine, or a defective engine which causes a delay, is evidence of negligence (Cleveland, etc., R. Co. v. Heath, 22 Ind. App. 47, 53 N. E. 198; Mich. So., etc., Ry. Co. v. McDonough, 21 Mich. 165, 4 Am. Rep. 466; McCrary v. R. Co., 109 Mo. App. 567, 83 S. W. 82), and, if such negligence contributed to the injury, there is no reason why damages should not be recoverable.

Negligence per se was not shown, but there was evidence sufficient to go to the jury, and therefore sufficient to sustain a finding of negligence. It was for the jury to say from all the evidence whether such negligence constituted the proximate cause of the injury to the animals, and by their special finding No. 4 they found the proximate causes to be "bad order car and delayed train." If the damaged car and the delay in transit increased the hazard and risk of injury to the horses by getting down and being trampled upon and injury also resulted in inability to unload the animals at an earlier hour, this court cannot say that the jury's finding is wrong. It would seem reasonable that the longer they were in transit and the consequent delay in getting those up which had fallen, together with the character and kind of animals, and their need of care and attention, should all be taken into consideration in determining whether such delay contributed to and was a proximate cause of their injury. This was a question of fact for the jury to determine, and we are of the opinion that the special finding No. 4 is not contrary to the evidence, and that it is sustained by sufficient evidence.

It is contended that the verdict is contrary to law, and in support of this contention it is argued that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence in failing to go or send some one along with the horses and attend to their needs and wants during transit between Aberdeen and Sheridan, and also that owing to the natural propensities of the horses and their liability to injure each other the injuries must be attributed to such propensities or vice, and that the company by the terms of the contract was not liable therefor. The contract of shipment provided that the company should furnish free transportation for the owner or his agent to accompany the horses, and that he or his agent should have sole charge of the car and horses, and that the company should not be responsible for such attention and care. The evidence is that the plaintiff and a stock inspector, together with the train crew, loaded the horses at Aberdeen. The plaintiff testifies that after loading them he left the car and horses in charge of the train crew. The evidence of the conductor who was in charge of the train is to the effect that he knew he was not carrying any one on the part of the plaintiff to care for the horses between Aberdeen and Sheridan.

The existence of the contract was one of fact, and was admitted by the parties. The rights, duties, and obligations created thereby were questions of law to be determined by the court. There was some evidence of a custom of stockmen to accompany or send some one along to care for their stock while in transit, but the shipment was under the terms of an express contract, and the rights of the parties must be measured thereby. A custom to that effect and a failure to comply therewith were not pleaded. The jury by their answer to interrogatory No. 3 stated that there was no evidence to show that it was the duty of the plaintiff to go, or have some one else do so, along with the car of horses while same was in transit between Aberdeen and Sheridan to prevent his horses from falling or being trampled upon while in the car in such transit. This question, we think, is one of law and not of fact, and that it was therefore improperly submitted to the jury, and its answer thereto—that there was no evidence—cannot be regarded as prejudicial to the defendant for that reason. That this was a question of law was recognized by the court in its instruction to the jury as follows: "You are instructed that the duty of looking after the horses in question, while on the way between Aberdeen and Sheridan, devolved on the plaintiff. Hence, if he allowed such horses to be transported between those points, without going along himself, or having some one do so, to look after them on the way, and some of them got down and were injured because of such want of care, he cannot recover in this action." In another instruction the jury were told that in order for the plaintiff to recover for injury to his horses he must affirmatively prove by a preponderance of the testimony that they were injured alone through the negligence of the company. The failure of the plaintiff to accompany or send some one along to care for his horses, under the verdict and finding of the jury, neither contributed to nor was it the proximate cause of the injuries.

If the injuries to the horses were due solely to their vices and natural propensities, then the company was not liable therefor, but in order for this to be a defense it must appear that such vices or propensities constituted the sole proximate cause of the injuries. 5 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, 445. It is true that the evidence shows that horses of this character are nervous and excitable, and would be more liable to get down in the car for the first hundred miles of the journey, and that that fact was known to the shipper as well as the company. The jury did not find that the natural propensities or vices of the animals was the sole proximate cause of the injuries, and upon the whole evidence it was for them to determine what the proximate cause of the injuries was (Giblin v. National S. S. Co., 8 Misc. Rep. 22, 28 N. Y. Supp. 69), and to have been the proximate cause, as a defense, the injuries must have occurred by reason of the natural propensities alone or in conjunction with some innocent cause (Chicago, etc., R. Co. v. Harmon, 12 Ill. App. 54), and the burden was upon the company to show that fact. 5 Cyc. 469. The jury by their special finding found the proximate cause of the injuries to have been bad order of car and delayed train. We do not think that the injuries could upon the evidence have been the result solely of the natural propensities of the animals, either alone or in conjunction with an innocent cause, for the damaged car and delayed train were not, nor could they be considered, an innocent cause. We are of the opinion that the verdict is sustained by sufficient evidence, and that it is not contrary to law.

2. It is urged in argument that the court erred in refusing to permit the defendant to show that it was the custom to attach car loads of stock at the rear end of the train. The motion for a new trial does not specify this ruling as a ground therefor, unless it be included in the general ground defined in the statute and alleged in the motion as "errors of law occurring at the trial." The ground is too general and indefinite, and upon the record it does not affirmatively appear that the specific question here argued was brought directly to the lower court's attention. Boburg v. Prah, 3 Wyo. 325, 23 Pac. 70. While it may have been argued and submitted to that court, the only way of showing that fact and presenting the question for review is by setting out and specifying in the motion the particular error and matter complained of. Section 853, Elliott on App. Proc.

3. It is assigned as error that the court erred in overruling the company's motion for judgment on the special finding of facts. The interrogatories were submitted to the jury to be answered and returned with their general verdict, in pursuance to the provisions of section 3656, Rev. St. 1899. Section 3657, Rev. St. 1899, is as follows: "When the special finding of facts is inconsistent with the general verdict, the former shall control the latter, and the court may give judgment accordingly." The right to a judgment upon the special finding of facts under these provisions of the statute is limited to those cases where there is an inconsistency between the special finding and the general verdict, and, unless there is such an inconsistency as to be irreconcilable, such a motion should be denied. Davis v. Turner, 69 Ohio St. 101, 116, 68 N. E. 819. The special finding of facts is reconcilable with the general verdict, and, that being the case, the company was not in a position to ask affirmative action on the part of the court upon its motion for judgment based upon such finding.

4. The correctness of the instructions is not here questioned, nor is the right to recover the value of the horse which was lost from the car between Newcastle and Alliance seriously questioned. There was some conflicting evidence as to whether the horse was loaded with the others, but that was a question for the jury, and, if so loaded, the condition of the door at the time the horse was found to be missing would be sufficient evidence to sustain the verdict on the ground of negligence on the part of the company in failing to furnish a car provided with a secure and safe door to prevent the horses from falling out or escaping. Smith v. New Haven, etc., R. Co., 12 Allen (Mass.) 531, 90 Am. Dec. 166; Pratt v. Ogdenburg, etc., R. Co., 102 Mass. 557; Indianapolis, etc., R. Co. v. Strain, 81 Ill. 504; Betts v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 92 Iowa, 343, 60 N. W. 623, 26 L. R. A. 248, 54 Am. St. Rep. 558; Central of Georgia R. Co. v. James, 117 Ga. 832, 45 S. E. 223; Root v. New York, etc., R. R. Co., 83 Hun, 111, 31 N. Y. Supp. 357.

5. It is urged that the damage awarded by the jury is excessive. The damage was variously estimated by different witnesses, and the amount found by the jury was within the evidence, and does not exceed the value placed upon the animals in the contract of shipment, and to which value the plaintiff limited the amount of his recovery for injury to or loss of the horses while in transit. The argument upon this question seems to be that a recovery, if at all, must be for the value of the horse which was lost from the car, and that there was no liability for damage for injury to the horses while in transit between Aberdeen and Sheridan. This contention, as we have seen, is not correct, for the plaintiff was entitled to recover for injuries to them as well. We are of the opinion that the damage assessed by the jury is not excessive.

No prejudicial error appearing in the record, the judgment will be affirmed.

Affirmed.

FRYE & BRUHN, Inc., v. PHILLIPS et al.
(Supreme Court of Washington. Feb. 8, 1908.)

1. PARTNERSHIP—ACTIONS AGAINST PARTNERS—BURDEN OF PROOF.

In an action on an account against a firm in which one of the partners defended on the ground that she had paid one-half of plaintiff's claim under an agreement that such payment should be in full of her liability thereon, the original debt being thus admitted, the burden of proof was on the answering defendant to establish her affirmative defense.

2. TRIAL—MOTION FOR JUDGMENT—EFFECT OF MOTION.

In an action on account against a partnership where one member set up an affirmative defense, the plaintiff, by moving for judgment at the close of defendant's case, does not waive his right to contest the affirmative matter set up in the answer.

On petition for rehearing. Former opinion modified and petition denied.

For former opinion, see 80 Pac. 559.

PER CURIAM. This was an action on account against a copartnership. One of the partners defaulted, the other partner interposed the defense that she had paid to the plaintiff one-half of the firm indebtedness, under an agreement that such payment would be accepted in full of all claims and demands against her, and that the plaintiff would look to the other partner for the balance due. The affirmative defense was denied by the reply. Inasmuch as the original indebtedness was admitted, the burden of proof rested upon the answering defendant to establish the allegations of her affirmative defense. At the close of her testimony, the court ruled that the agreement set forth in the answer was without consideration, and granted judgment in favor of the plaintiff for the full amount claimed. In the original opinion filed in this case (89 Pac. 559) we held that the agreement set forth in the answer was founded upon an adequate consideration and reversed the judgment, with directions to enter judgment in favor of the defendant. The plaintiff did not waive its right to contest the affirmative matter set forth in the answer by moving for judgment at the close of the defendant's testimony, any more than a defendant waives his right to contest the plaintiff's case by moving for a nonsuit.

For this reason a new trial should have been awarded, instead of directing judgment for the defendant. To this extent the original opinion is modified, but in all other respects the petition for rehearing is denied.

(Supreme Court of Washington. Feb. 5, 1908.)

1. ESTOPPEL—EQUITABLE ESTOPPEL—CHANGE OF POSITION.

Where the interest on a mortgage note is long overdue, and the mortgagee agreed to accept a lesser amount in full satisfaction of the amount due in reliance on which agreement the mortgagor paid the amount agreed on, and continued in possession and paid a large amount of interest subsequently accruing, the mortgagee cannot subsequently assert that the agreement was void as being without consideration.

2. CHATTEL MORTGAGES—INSURANCE ON MORTGAGED PROPERTY—LIABILITY FOR PREMIUMS.

3. TENDER—SUFFICIENCY.

Where a note requires payment in gold coin at a certain place, the payee cannot object that a tender of the amount due made and refused was not good, because made by draft, where the refusal was not based on that ground especially when previous payments were accepted, although not in gold coin.

Appeal from Superior Court, Clarke County; W. W. McCredie, Judge.

Action by L. M. Hidden and another against the German Savings & Loan Society. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Milton W. Smith, for appellant. H. W. Arnold, for respondents.

RUDKIN, J. On the 25th day of April, 1893, O. M. Hidden, Margaret Hidden, L. M. Hidden, Mary Hidden, and Arthur W. Hidden executed their promissory note in favor of the defendant, the German Savings & Loan Society, for the sum of $20,000, payable five years after date, with interest from date until paid at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum payable quarterly. On the same date, for the purpose of securing the payment of the promissory note according to its terms, the makers executed and delivered to the payee their indenture of mortgage on certain hotel property owned by them in the city of Vancouver, Clarke county. On the 21st day of February, 1898, the makers executed and delivered to Louis J. Goldsmith, as trustee, a chattel mortgage on the furniture and fixtures in the hotel situated on the lots covered by said first mentioned mortgage as additional security for the payment of $2,727.02, overdue interest on the loan. On the 1st day of January, 1902, interest was overdue and unpaid on the principal note to the amount of $4,947.88, and on or about that date the defendant agreed to accept the sum of $3,447.88 in full of all interest to January 1, 1902, and to reduce the rate of interest to 5 per cent. per annum thereafter, on condition that the back interest was promptly paid. The plaintiff accepted the offer, and paid the amount specified on the 27th day of January, 1902, receiving from the defendant a receipt acknowledging payment in full of all interest to January 1, 1902, as agreed. For upwards of three years thereafter the plaintiffs promptly paid the interest on the loan at the reduced rate, and the defendant accepted such payments, receipting in full for all interest accruing during the periods covered by the respective payments. On June 8, 1905, $10,000 was paid on the principal of the note, and on October 30, 1905, the further sum of $10,131.94 was tendered by draft, in full of the balance on the principal sum due and all accrued interest to that date at the reduced rate agreed upon by the parties. This tender was rejected, and the present action was thereafter instituted to cancel the note and mortgage, and for other relief. The complaint alleges that the plaintiffs are the successors in interest to the original mortgagors and this allegation is denied by the answer; but, in view of the conclusion we have reached on the merits of the case, this question becomes immaterial. The court below made findings in favor of the plaintiffs, and gave judgment according to the prayer of the complaint. From the judgment so rendered, the defendant has appealed.

While the appellant rejected the tender of October 30, 1905, for the reason that the respondent refused to repay certain sums paid out by the appellant for insurance on the personal property covered by the chattel mortgage above referred to, at the trial in the court below and again in this court it contended that the tender was insufficient for the following reasons: First, because the agreement of January 1, 1902, to accept a lesser amount in full satisfaction of the interest then overdue, was without consideration; second, because the respondent failed to tender the amounts paid out by the appellant for insurance on the personal property covered by the chattel mortgage; and, third, because the note called for payment in gold coin at San Francisco, and the tender by draft was not in accordance with the agreement of the parties. Other minor questions are discussed in the briefs, but we find them without merit. With these several contentions we cannot agree.

1. At the time the appellant agreed to remit the sum of $1,500 from the amount of the unpaid interest both principal and interest were long overdue. At that time it doubtless deemed itself insecure, else the remission would not have been made. The respondents were then at liberty to suffer the mortgage to go to a foreclosure, and permit the appellant to recover its indebtedness as it then stood as best it could. But, in reliance on the promise made, the respondents continued in possession of the property, and paid, not only the overdue interest which they were already obligated to pay, but additional interest under the modified agreement to the amount of more than $3,000. This interest was accepted by the appellant and the agreement of January 1, 1902, was fully acquiesced in by both parties until a dispute arose between them over the payment of certain insurance premiums. After the respondents had thus changed their position, and after the agreement had thus been executed and acquiesced in for such a length of time, it certainly does not lie with the appellant to say that the original agreement was without consideration or void.

2. The chattel mortgage contained no provision requiring the mortgagors to keep the property insured, or authorizing the mortgagee to procure insurance at their expense. The court below found that there was no collateral agreement to that effect and such finding is sustained by the testimony.

3. While the note required payments to be made in gold coin at the appellant's office in San Francisco, the tender was not refused because not so made, and this requirement of the contract was not insisted upon in the case of any prior payment. Under such circumstances, it would be highly inequitable to permit such a technical objection to be raised or suggested for the first time by answer.

Finding no error in the record, the judgment is affirmed.

VAN HORN v. VAN HORN.

(Supreme Court of Washington. Feb. 5, 1908.)

DIVORCE — ALIMONY — INTERLOCUTORY JUDGMENT — FOREIGN JUDGMENT.

An action will not lie in this state on an interlocutory order of a California court awarding plaintiff herein temporary alimony and suit money in an action for divorce pending in that court, since such order, though final and appealable under California statutes, is subject to modification by the court making it, and, this court not having jurisdiction of the original suit, its attempt to enforce the order might result in a conflict of authority.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 17, Divorce, § 841.]

Appeal from Superior Court, King County; Boyd J. Tallman, Judge.

Action by Marion V. Van Horn against Ross H. Van Horn on an interlocutory order of a foreign court awarding temporary alimony and suit money. From a judgment dismissing the complaint, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

William B. Allison, for appellant. Bamford A. Robb, for respondent.

RUDKIN, J. This action was instituted in the court below on an interlocutory order of the superior court of Alameda county in the state of California awarding temporary alimony and suit money to the plaintiff herein in an action for divorce pending in that court. A demurrer interposed to the amended complaint was sustained, and the plaintiff electing to stand on her complaint, and, refusing to plead further, a judgment of dismissal was entered. From that judgment the present appeal is prosecuted.

The order on which the action is based was made under section 137 of the Civil Code of California, which reads as follows: "When an action for divorce is pending, the court may, in its discretion, require the husband to pay as alimony, any money necessary to enable the wife to support herself and her children, or prosecute or defend the action." The authorities very generally agree that an action will not lie in another court or in the courts of another state on an order or judgment such as this. Baugh v. Baugh, 4 Bibb. Israel*, supra: "The decree for alimony may be changed from time to time by the chancellor, and there may be such circumstances as would authorize the chancellor to even change the amount to be paid by the husband, where he is in arrears in payments required under the decree. * * * The peculiar character of the obligation is such that it is always subject to modification by the court in which the decree was entered according to the varying circumstances of the parties, and no other court could undertake to administer the relief to which the parties are entitled except that having jurisdiction in the original suit. An attempt to do so by such other court would bring about a conflict of authority and a condition of chaos with reference to questions of this character, because no other court would have before it the facts with reference to such change and condition and as to such original right of the parties."

Without questioning the rule announced in these cases, counsel for the appellant earnestly insists that the order in question is a final one under the decisions of the Supreme Court of the state of California, and must be so considered here. In support of this contention he cites: Sharon v. Sharon, 67 Cal. 185, 7 Pac. 456, 635, 8 Pac. 709; Hite v. Hite, 124 Cal. 389, 57 Pac. 227, 45 L. R. A. 793, 71 Am. St. Rep. 82; Baker v. Baker, 136 Cal. 303, 68 Pac. 971. While the Supreme Court of California holds in the cases cited that an order such as this is a final order from which an appeal will lie under its statutes, it does not hold, and has not held to our knowledge, that such an order is not subject to change or modification in the discretion of the court in which it was made, and this is the principal objection to permitting an action to be maintained on such an order in another jurisdiction. It is a significant fact that, while the Supreme Court of California cites Lochnane v. Lochnane, 78 Ky. 468, and Blake v. Blake, 80 Ill. 532, in support of the right of appeal in the Sharon Case, the courts of both of these states hold that an action will not lie on such an order. Cuttler v. Cuttler, and Geisler v. Geisler, supra.

Finding no error in the record, the judgment is affirmed.

(41 Colo. 467)

DAY v. McPHEE et al.

(Supreme Court of Colorado. Dec. 2, 1907. Rehearing Denied Feb. 3, 1908.)

1. APPEAL — LIABILITY ON BOND — WHEN SURETY'S LIABILITY ATTACHES.

Upon affirmation of a judgment on appeal, the sureties' liability upon the appeal bond becomes absolute, and the obligee need not exhaust his remedy against the principal before proceeding against the sureties, but may elect which of the sureties he will proceed against, or what security holden for the judgment he will resort to for its satisfaction.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, §§ 4788-4790.]

2. SAME—ACTIONS—DEFENSES.

As a general rule, the only defense which a surety upon an appeal bond can interpose after affirmance of the judgment is one which discharges him from his obligation in whole or in part.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, §§ 4792-4794.]

3. SAME.

Plaintiffs sued their debtor, and sued out an attachment, under which funds of the debtor sufficient to pay the claim were attached. The attachment was discharged upon the debtor filing a bond, with R. as surety, conditioned to pay any judgment obtained, and the property released was turned over to the surety, R., to indemnify him against loss. Judgment was obtained against the debtor, and defendant became surety on his appeal bond, and the judgment was affirmed. Held, that on affirmance the judgment creditors could elect which bond they would first proceed upon, and it was immaterial which of the sureties was the primary surety, or whether R.'s bond was a substitute for the garnished assets, or whether R. held the assets as security to indemnify him.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, §§ 4785-4787.]

4. SAME.

The fact that an appeal is taken, and an appeal bond executed, in the interest and with the consent of a surety on a bond given for the dissolution of an attachment, conditioned to pay any judgment obtained against the principal, while it may raise a liability on the part of the first surety to the other one, does not affect the creditors' right to proceed upon either bond.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 3, Appeal and Error, §§ 4785-4787.]

5. SAME.

In an action against a surety on an appeal bond, an allegation that plaintiffs had collusively arranged with the surety on another bond for the dissolution of an attachment, conditioned to pay the judgment, to release him from his obligation, is no defense, since it does not allege that the other surety has been absolutely released, but merely alleges that which would result by operation of law if defendant paid the judgment, since plaintiffs could have but one satisfaction.

6. PRINCIPAL AND SURETY—RIGHTS OF SURETIES AS TO CO-SURETY.

If one surety is primarily liable, the right of the surety secondarily liable, who has discharged the liability, to compel the one primarily liable to repay the sum disbursed, attaches immediately upon payment, and is not affected by a subsequent attempt of the obligee to discharge the surety primarily liable.

7. SAME—RECOURSE OF SURETY TO OBLIGEE'S SECURITY.

As a general rule, the right of a surety on an appeal bond with respect to any security which the judgment creditor may subject to the payment of his judgment is to resort to it himself on paying the judgment, and not to compel the creditor to resort to it.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 40, Principal and Surety, §§ 474-479.]

8. SAME—RELEASE OF SECURITY BY CREDITOR.

The release by a creditor of security to which a surety has the right to resort upon paying the debt releases the surety to the extent that he is thereby deprived of indemnity.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 40, Principal and Surety, §§ 244-268.]

9. ATTACHMENT—BOND FOR RELEASE—EFFECT.

Where, by mutual arrangement between plaintiff and defendant in an action in which property of defendant has been attached, plaintiff takes defendant's bond with surety conditioned for the payment of any judgment in the action, and the attached property is released and the attachment dissolved, the surety taking over the property released for his indemnity, the liability of the surety on the bond becomes a substitute for the property attached which by virtue of the bond is released.

10. PRINCIPAL AND SURETY — DISCHARGE OF SURETY — RELEASE BY CREDITOR OF OTHER SECURITY.

In determining equities between a creditor and sureties on a bond, where the creditor's acts in releasing security to which the surety may resort on payment of a debt would result in loss to the surety, the result of the creditor's action is persuasive in adjusting the equities because the right of subrogation of a surety rests not on contract, but on principles of natural justice.

11. PRINCIPAL AND SURETY—RIGHTS OF SURETY—RELEASE OF SECURITY BY OBLIGEE.

Since, where a bond for the release of an attachment is taken, conditioned for the payment of any judgment in the action, the liability of the surety on the bond becomes a substitute for the property attached which a surety on an appeal bond in the action might resort to upon payment of the judgment, the release of the surety on the former bond will release the surety on the appeal bond.

12. SAME—LIABILITY OF CO-SURETIES.

Since, where a bond for release of an attachment is taken, conditioned for the payment of any judgment in the action, the liability of the surety on the bond is a substitute for the property attached, his obligation as against a subsequent surety on an appeal bond in the action is not within the doctrine that, if sureties are bound for the same thing or do not occupy towards each other the same relative position, a subsequent surety will have no right as against the first.

13. SAME — RIGHTS OF SURETY — RELEASE OF SECURITY BY OBLIGEE—RIGHT OF OBLIGEE TO PROCEED ON ONE OF SEVERAL BONDS.

While a judgment creditor may elect upon which of two bonds he will proceed to obtain satisfaction of his judgment, he may not proceed against one of them if by an affirmative act he has destroyed the surety's right to be subrogated to the only security there was for the payment of the judgment and which was sufficient to pay it.

14. APPEAL — LIABILITIES ON BONDS—ACTION —PARTIES — EQUITIES BETWEEN CO-SURETIES.

In an action by a judgment creditor against a surety on an appeal bond, defendant is not entitled to the delay of the case incident to bringing in a surety on a bond given to release an attachment merely to settle equities between defendant and such surety, unless plaintiffs were in some way responsible for the creation of such equities, or had, by affirmative action, destroyed them.

15. SAME.

The liability to a surety on an appeal bond of a surety on a bond for release of an attachment, conditioned to pay the judgment, in case the former should pay it, would not entitle the surety on the appeal bond to have the other surety made a party defendant in an action on the appeal bond, since that liability would not affect or postpone plaintiff's rights.

16. SAME.

Under Civ. Code, § 16, providing that, when a complete determination of controversies between the parties to an action cannot be had without the presence of other parties, the court shall order them to be brought in, where it is alleged that defendant, a surety on an appeal bond, was released by plaintiff destroying defendant's right to resort to a bond given for the release of an attachment, the surety on the bond for release of the attachment is properly made a party defendant.

Appeal from District Court, Weld County; Christian A. Bennett, Judge.

Action by Charles D. McPhee and others against William E. Day on an appeal bond. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

H. N. Haynes, for appellant. Chas. J. Hughes, Jr., Gerald Hughes, and Barnwell S. Stuart, for appellees.

GABBERT, J. The question presented by this appeal is the liability of appellant as surety on an appeal bond upon which suit was commenced against him by the appellees McPhee & McGinnity. In the complaint filed by these appellees in their action on the bond, it is alleged that they obtained a judgment in the district court of Arapahoe county against J. B. Hindry for a specified sum; that Hindry appealed from this judgment to the Court of Appeals; that, pursuant to an order of that tribunal, Hindry filed an appeal bond upon which appellant and another were sureties, conditioned for the payment of the judgment appealed from in case it was affirmed; that the judgment was affirmed, and has not been paid. To this complaint the defendant, Day, as an answer, interposed four defenses and a cross-complaint. To the latter the appellee Ross-Lewin, by order of court, was made a party defendant. By the same order he was also made an additional party defendant in the original action. To each defense and cross-complaint a general demurrer was interposed and sustained. The defendant Day elected to stand by his answer and cross-complaint, and judgment was rendered against him, from which he appeals. His liability on the bond in question, therefore, depends upon whether or not either defense or the cross-complaint stated facts sufficient to constitute a defense to the action upon the bond.

By the first defense, it is averred that the judgment mentioned in the complaint was rendered in an action instituted by plaintiffs in the county court of Arapahoe county against J. B. Hindry; that this action was supplemented by an attachment under which the city of Denver was garnished, by which sufficient funds of Hindry were attached to more than cover their claim; that following this garnishment, by stipulation of parties to the action, an order was entered by the county court reciting that the parties had stipulated to discharge the attachment upon Hindry filing a bond in the sum of $3,000, with sureties, conditioned for the payment of any judgment which might be obtained against him in the action; that such bond had been filed, and thereupon, by consent of all parties, it was ordered that the attachment be dissolved, and the city of Denver discharged as garnishee. It is also averred that the appellee Ross-Lewin was the surety on this bond; that it was executed by him to obtain a discharge of the writ of attachment, and the release of the city of Denver as garnishee, with the intent that such bond should stand in lieu of the garnishment; that Hindry thereafter collected the amount due him from the city, and paid the same to Ross-Lewin, pursuant to an agreement between Ross-Lewin and himself, made at and prior to the execution of the bond by the former to thus indemnify Ross-Lewin. It is then alleged that plaintiffs recovered a judgment against Hindry in the county court, from which Hindry, with the consent and in the interest of Ross-Lewin, prosecuted an appeal to the district court; that the result of the appeal was that judgment was again rendered against Hindry, and that from this judgment an appeal was taken to the Court of Appeals, where the judgment was affirmed. It is also alleged that, in order to prosecute this appeal, the defendant Day signed the appeal bond mentioned in the complaint. It is also charged that this appeal was in the interest of Ross-Lewin, and with his knowledge, concurrence, and consent, to the end that, if possible, the judgment would be reversed and Ross-Lewin released from his obligation. It is further alleged that plaintiffs have entered into an arrangement with Ross-Lewin to enforce collection of the judgment from this defendant upon his bond, and to discharge Ross-Lewin from all liability thereon when such judgment is so collected. It is also averred that Hindry is insolvent.

From the foregoing synopsis it is claimed by counsel for defendant that it appears from this defense that the judgment for which Day became surety on the appeal bond sued upon was originally fully secured by garnishment proceedings; that the Ross-Lewin bond was taken as a substitute for, and in lieu of, the assets secured by such proceedings; that these assets were, by the principal debtor, turned over to Ross-Lewin as security to indemnify him against loss in signing the bond which he executed, by virtue of which the attachment was discharged; that the appeal to the Court of Appeals was taken in the interest, and with the consent, of Ross-Lewin, and that McPhee & McGinnity have released Ross-Lewin. Upon these facts the following legal propositions are advanced by counsel for appellant in support of his contention that the court erred in sustaining the demurrer to the first defense: (1) A surety, on paying the indebtedness of his principal, has the right to be subrogated to the securities held by the creditor for the payment of the debt discharged by the surety. (2) That this right extends to securities of the principal debtor held by other sureties. (3) That a release by the creditor of a security to which the surety has a right of subrogation releases the surety. (4) That, as between Day and Ross-Lewin, the latter was the primary surety from whom the former, on paying the judgment, would be entitled to full indemnity. This proposition is based upon the further ones to the effect that the bond signed by Ross-Lewin was a substitute for the original garnished assets of Hindry; that Ross-Lewin held as security assets of the principal debtor, Hindry; and the appeal perfected by the bond of Day was taken in the interest, and with the consent, of Ross-Lewin. (5) That the agreement of plaintiffs to release Ross-Lewin from his obligation has released the defendant Day. Conceding, for the present, for the sake of argument, that these propositions are correct statements of the law, the facts to which it is sought to apply them do not relieve the defendant Day from his obligation upon the appeal bond. Upon affirmance of a judgment from which an appeal is prosecuted, the liability of the sureties upon the bond given to perfect the appeal becomes fixed and absolute. The obligee in such bond is not required to exhaust his remedy against the principal before proceeding against the surety, but may elect which of the sureties he will proceed against, or what security, holden for the judgment, he will resort to for its satisfaction. Anderson v. Sloan, 1 Colo. 484; Steinhauer v. Colmar, 11 Colo. App. 494, 55 Pac. 291; Wood v. Derrickson, 1 Hilt. (N. Y.) 410; Staley v. Howard, 7 Mo. App. 377; Bingham v. Mears, 4 N. D. 437, 61 N. W. 808, 27 L. R. A. 257; Davis v. Patrick, 57 Fed. 909, 6 C. C. A. 632. The reason for these rules of law is that a judgment debtor may appeal from a judgment rendered against him independent of the judgment creditor; and, when he is enabled to exercise this right through another engaging to pay the judgment appealed from in case it is affirmed, whereby the collection or enforcement of the judgment is stayed, the surety on the bond given for this purpose will not be heard to say that there is property of the principal debtor which can be subjected to the payment of the judgment, or that there are other sureties holden for the debt, or that, because of equities between himself and others liable for the debt which the judgment creditor was not responsible for creating, the discharge of his engagement should be postponed until such property is exhausted, or unless other sureties are proceeded against, or such equities between himself and others are first settled. So that, upon the breach of the condition of his obligation, he will not be allowed to escape liability thereon, or postpone discharging it except for the most cogent reasons. Shannon v. Dodge, 18 Colo. 164, 32 Pac. 61. Generally speaking, then, the only defense which a surety upon an appeal bond can interpose after affirmance of judgment is one which discharges him from his obligation, either in whole or in part. There may be exceptional cases, as where the judgment creditor has access to a fund for the payment of his debt which a surety cannot make available, but no facts are presented for our consideration by the first defense upon which any argument is based, which excepts this case from the general rules of law announced.

Applying these principles, it is clear that the facts upon which defendant relied as pleaded in his first defense were not sufficient in law for any reason suggested by counsel. The judgment which he engaged to pay by the appeal bond which he executed was affirmed. That Ross-Lewin may also have been liable to discharge such judgment by virtue of the bond which he executed did not concern the defendant, for the plaintiffs had the right to elect which bond they would first proceed upon. Whether Day or Ross-Lewin was the primary surety was also immaterial for the same reason. Neither was it material whether the bond signed by Ross-Lewin was or was not a substitute for the original garnished assets of Hindry, or that Ross-Lewin held as security to indemnify him assets of the debtor Hindry, because, as stated, the plaintiffs had the unquestioned right to elect which of the several sureties liable for the judgment they would proceed against. If it be true, as contended by counsel for defendant, that the allegation to the effect that the appeal of Hindry was taken in the interest, and with the consent, of Ross-Lewin, made him liable to Day if he should pay the judgment, that is a relation created between them for which the plaintiffs were in no manner responsible. Nor does the averment that plaintiffs have entered into a collusive arrangement with Ross-Lewin to release him from his obligation incurred by the bond given to dissolve the attachment in any manner affect the rights of the defendant. It is not equivalent to an allegation that the plaintiffs have absolutely released Ross-Lewin upon his bond, but is nothing more than the averment of what the result would be by operation of law if the defendant paid the judgment. The plaintiffs could have but one satisfaction, and, after payment by Day, they could not hold Ross-Lewin upon a bond when the condition which made him liable thereon did not exist. Neither would an attempt on the part of the plaintiffs to discharge Ross-Lewin, after payment by defendant, affect his rights, because, if, as contended, Ross-Lewin is primarily liable for the judgment and defendant would have the right to compel him to repay the sum disbursed to discharge it, that right would attach immediately upon his paying the judgment, and no action of the plaintiffs thereafter could affect that right. In short, from the facts pleaded by the first defense, nothing appears which would operate to release him as a surety upon the appeal bond or postpone plaintiffs' right of action against him for any reason urged by his counsel. Whatever his rights against Ross-Lewin may be, they are intact; but he can only assert and settle them after he has discharged his obligation to the plaintiffs and thereby been subrogated to such rights as they may have against others, or property liable for their judgment, which the law, by virtue of his payment, would confer upon him. As a general rule, the right of a surety on an appeal bond with respect to any security which the judgment creditor may subject to the payment of his judgment is to resort to it himself on paying the judgment, and not to compel the creditor to resort to it. Bingham v. Mears, supra; 1 Brandt on Suretyship (2d Ed.) § 97; (3d Ed.) § 110. There are no facts stated in the first defense upon which any argument is predicated by counsel for defendant which excepts this case from that rule.

The second defense is the same as the first, omitting the averment that Ross-Lewin was indemnified by the debtor, Hindry, and that the appeal by Hindry was taken with the consent of Ross-Lewin. By this defense, the alleged primary liability of Ross-Lewin and his liability to defendant Day appears to be based upon the allegation that the bond executed by Ross-Lewin was a substitute for the property of Hindry attached. That this is no defense, in connection with the other facts presented, although the contention of counsel for defendant may be correct as to the relative liability of Ross-Lewin and Day as between each other, has been shown in considering the first defense.

The third defense is the same as the first, except that, instead of alleging an agreement on behalf of plaintiffs to release Ross-Lewin upon collection of their judgment from defendant, it is averred, in substance, so far as necessary to notice, that defendant, because of certain facts stated, believes it probable that subsequent to the affirmance of the Hindry judgment by the Court of Appeals an agreement has been entered into between plaintiffs and Ross-Lewin, whereby the former have either absolutely released the latter from obligation upon his bond or on the contingency of their obtaining and collecting a judgment against defendant upon his bond. Then follow statements or averments to the effect that by reason of the premises, and by virtue of the relation between plaintiffs, Ross-Lewin and the defendant, he is entitled, as a condition precedent to plaintiffs' obtaining a judgment against him or collecting the same, to an assignment of their judgment against Hindry, and also an assignment from them of their cause of action against Ross-Lewin upon his bond, with satisfactory assurances and indemnity to protect him against any defense which Ross-Lewin might interpose to an action on his bond by virtue of any agreement of plaintiffs to release him therefrom. It is further stated or averred that, as a condition precedent to plaintiffs' obtaining judgment against defendant and collecting it, they be required to disclose whether or not they have entered into any arrangement or agreement whereby they have agreed absolutely or contingently to release Ross-Lewin from his obligation, so that by such disclosure the defendant may know whether his right to subrogation against Ross-Lewin has been impaired, lost, or discharged by the action of plaintiffs, to the end that, if by such disclosure it should appear that Ross-Lewin has been discharged from his obligation, either absolutely or contingently, defendant be discharged from all liability on his bond. Then follows an averment to the effect that, after suit was commenced against defendant, he requested of plaintiffs information as to whether or not they had agreed to release Ross-Lewin, either absolutely or contingently, and whether if he, the defendant, should pay plaintiffs the amount sued for, they would assign to him their judgment against Hindry, and their right of action against Ross-Lewin on his bond, coupled with assurances that such right of action would not be impaired by any arrangement, contract, or agreement, whereby Ross-Lewin could justly claim that he had been or should be released by plaintiffs from obligation upon his bond, but that plaintiffs fail and neglect to give the defendant the information or assurances requested, and fail to indicate or express any willingness to execute or deliver to defendant the assignments requested, in the event defendant should satisfy plaintiffs' claim against him.

The right of defendant to the disclosure requested is not challenged; neither is the sufficiency of this defense questioned, except upon the ground that, in no event, would Ross-Lewin be responsible to defendant in case the latter should discharge his obligation upon the appeal bond. That the alleged contingent release is immaterial has already been determined. It might be said that defendant is not entitled to a formal assignment from plaintiffs of security to which they could resort to satisfy their judgment, because, if defendant could resort to such security to indemnify him, his right to do so, upon payment of the judgment, would be protected by operation of law. But, as this question is not argued by counsel for plaintiffs, nor the right of defendant to a disclosure of whether or not plaintiffs have released Ross-Lewin from his obligation questioned, we shall express no opinion upon either of these propositions, but pass to the question of whether that obligation can be resorted to by defendant in case he pays the judgment, and such collateral ones connected therewith as are necessary to determine the rights of defendant with respect to the Ross-Lewin bond. We have said the defendant's liability upon the appeal bond is absolute, but it is not so in the sense that plaintiffs, by any affirmative act on their part, can destroy his right to indemnity and still hold him on such bond. The release by a creditor of security for a debt to which a surety therefor has the right to resort upon paying such debt releases the surety to the extent that he is thereby deprived of indemnity. Crosby v. Woodbury, 37 Colo. 1, 89 Pac. 34; Brandt on Suretyship (2d Ed.) § 301; Pomeroy's Equity (2d Ed.) § 1419. If, then, plaintiffs have absolutely released Ross-Lewin from his bond, and defendant would have the right, because of such bond, to compel him to repay any sum which he might pay to discharge his obligation, the defendant would be released from his bond. The important question, then, to determine, is whether or not the defendant, on payment of the judgment, could hold Ross-Lewin liable for the amount thus disbursed. Counsel for defendant contend that this bond was a substitute for the garnished assets of Hindry, and stands in lieu thereof; while, on behalf of plaintiffs, it is claimed that this obligation is but a common-law undertaking on the part of Ross-Lewin, whereby he is nothing more than a common-law surety for the payment of Hindry's debt. It is not the statutory forthcoming bond which a defendant may give in case of an attachment, for that would not have dissolved the attachment. Its purpose was to secure the debt sued for in the action in which the writ issued, and at the same time work a dissolution of the attachment by substituting the bond for the garnishment. The action of the parties indicate that such was their intent and object. It is so alleged in the defense under consideration. Plaintiffs, in the action against Hindry, had impounded sufficient assets of the latter to secure their claim. They were parties to the arrangement by which the Ross-Lewin bond was given. By consent, upon this obligation being executed, an order was entered by the court dissolving the attachment and discharging the garnishee. Thereby the Hindry assets were placed in his control, but plaintiffs were secured in lieu of such assets by the Ross-Lewin bond. Ross-Lewin was indemnified by having these assets placed in his hands. In jurisdictions where the defendant in a suit supplemented by an attachment may give a bond provided by statute which has the effect of releasing the attached property, it is held that such bond is a substitute for the property attached. Sutro v. Bigelow, 31 Wis. 527; Smith v. U. S. Express Co., 135 Ill. 279, 25 N. E. 525; Jayne's Ex'r v. Platt, 47 Ohio St. 262, 24 N. E. 262, 21 Am. St. Rep. 810; Inbusch v. Farwell, 1 Black (U. S.) 566, 17 L. Ed. 188. The person signing such an obligation assents to assume the identical liability of the garnishee, had no such undertaking been given; or, as in Sutro v. Bigelow, supra, where, by virtue of a statutory undertaking a garnishee had been released, the court, in speaking of the obligation of the surety on such undertaking, aptly stated: "Such appears to be the object and purpose of the statute enacted for the benefit of the defendant in the original action, and, when he avails himself of it * * * in order to procure the release of his own property from attachment, and to obtain the possession of it for himself, it seems not inaccurate to say that the persons signing the undertaking are his sureties with respect to the property or effects so released, and that they are content to assume, and do assume, the precise liability with respect to him as defendant in the action which would have rested upon the property, or the holder of it, in case they, as such sureties, had not intervened with the undertaking." In the Illinois case above cited, in speaking to the same point, it was said: "When the attachments were discharged and the funds attached were released, the bonds of the surety company stood in the place of such funds, and were substitutes therefor." There is certainly no good reason why a bond, although not given in accordance with any statutory provision, by virtue of which a garnishee is released and the attachment is dissolved, should not be so construed. We therefore conclude that where, by mutual arrangement between a plaintiff and defendant in an action in which an attachment has issued, and property of the latter has been attached, the plaintiff takes the bond of the defendant with surety conditioned for the payment of any judgment which may be rendered in that action, and the attached property is released and the attachment dissolved, and the surety, by arrangement with the debtor at the time of executing such undertaking, takes over the property so released for his indemnity, the surety signing such bond places himself in the attitude of a substitute for the property attached, which, by virtue of such bond, is released. Any other conclusion, according to the facts presented by the defense under consideration, would work a great hardship on the defendant. Ross-Lewin is secured upon his obligation by the identical assets of Hindry which were attached. Plaintiffs can subject this bond to the payment of their judgment. Hindry is insolvent. If plaintiffs have released Ross-Lewin from his obligation, these assets are released, and Hindry may do with them as he pleases, or other creditors may step in and subject them to the payment of their claims; and defendant, although he may discharge the judgment which he bound himself to do, by his obligation, will be without remedy, whereas, if Ross-Lewin should discharge his obligation, or is required to reimburse defendant in the event he pays the judgment, the payment by Ross-Lewin, either in satisfaction of the judgment or by way of reimbursing defendant in the event he pays it, will not be at his expense, because he is amply secured by property of the principal debtor. Loss to an obligor because he is required to discharge his obligation is not a conclusive reason why he should be relieved from his contract, but, in determining equities between a creditor and the sureties where the acts of the former in releasing security to which the surety may resort on payment of a debt would result in loss to the latter, the result of the action of the former is persuasive in adjusting such equities, because the right of subrogation of a surety rests not on contract, but is founded on principles of natural justice.

The next question to consider is the effect of plaintiffs' absolutely releasing Ross-Lewin from his obligation. Had his bond not been accepted by plaintiffs, the assets of Hindry would have been subject to their judgment, and, had they released them subsequent to defendant executing his bond, he would have been released therefrom, for his right to be subrogated to plaintiffs' rights in these assets would have been destroyed. The bond of Ross-Lewin stands in lieu thereof. Therefore the defendant would have the right to resort to it upon payment of the Hindry judgment. Consequently, a release of Ross-Lewin by plaintiffs would release defendant from his obligation. Counsel for plaintiffs advance the proposition that as between Day and Ross-Lewin the former is primarily liable, and this, because Day was an intervening surety in a legal proceeding for the collection of a debt, and Ross-Lewin is an original surety for that debt. The premise is wrong as to Ross-Lewin. True, he obligated himself to pay whatever judgment plaintiffs might obtain against Hindry in their action in the county court, but that obligation took the place of property of Hindry which had been attached. This excepts his obligation from the doctrine announced in Bispham on Equity, § 330, where it is said, in effect, if sureties are not bound for the same thing, or do not occupy towards each other the same relative position, a subsequent surety may have no right as against the first. It likewise distinguishes the rights of Ross-Lewin from the old English case of Parsons v. Bridgock, 2 Vernon, 608. In that case the principal on a bond was arrested and gave bail. Judgment was obtained against the bail. The sureties on the original bond or obligation of the debtor were compelled to pay it. They were adjudged to be entitled to an assignment of the judgment against the bail because he stood in the place of the principal, and could not be released from the obligation he assumed, except upon the same condition the principal would be; i. e., the discharge of the debt. Nor are the cases cited in point wherein it is held that sureties intervening in legal proceedings brought to recover a debt become primarily liable therefor as between each other in the inverse order they became such sureties. The feature of the obligation of Ross-Lewin which takes it without the rule contended for by counsel is that it is to be treated precisely as though it were the assets of Hindry, which were originally attached. This conclusion works out exact justice between the parties. The plaintiffs may satisfy their judgment by resorting to the Ross-Lewin bond. If they do, he, in turn, is indemnified by the assets of the judgment debtor placed in his hands. Plaintiffs may satisfy their judgment by resorting to the bond of defendant. If they do, he can require Ross-Lewin, by virtue of his obligation, to reimburse him, in which event Ross-Lewin can apply the assets of Hindry to indemnify him for any sum he may have paid to the defendant; so that, in the end, whichever course is pursued, the judgment is satisfied out of the property of the principal debtor, and at the same time the rights of the plaintiffs are fully protected and the sureties relieved. While, as we have stated, plaintiffs have the right to elect upon which obligation they will proceed to obtain satisfaction of their judgment against Hindry, they may not do so as against the defendant, if by any affirmative act on their part they have destroyed his right to be subrogated to their rights in the Ross-Lewin bond. A judgment creditor may release such security for the payment of his judgment as he elects, but he must do so at his own risk, and not at the expense of others liable for such judgment.

The fourth defense is the same as the third, omitting the allegations concerning the indemnity of Ross-Lewin by Hindry, and the statement that Ross-Lewin consented to the appeal perfected by the bond of defendant. From what has been said previously, we do not deem it necessary to determine specifically whether or not this defense was good.

The first nine paragraphs of the cross-complaint are essentially the same as the first seven paragraphs of the third defense. In addition, it is stated in substance, so far as we shall notice, that to avoid a multiplicity of suits, to obtain complete settlement in one action, and fully protect the rights of defendant, it is necessary that Ross-Lewin be made a party defendant to the original action and a party defendant to the cross-complaint. An order making Ross-Lewin defendant to both the original action and cross-complaint was entered. To merely settle equities between Ross-Lewin and Day which the plaintiffs were in no wise responsible for creating, or to settle such equities between Ross-Lewin and Day which the plaintiffs, by affirmative action, have not destroyed, would not entitle the defendant to a delay of the case to determine those questions. By the cross-complaint two vital questions are presented: First, the liability of Ross-Lewin to Day in the event the latter pays the Hindry judgment; and, second, whether or not, in case such liability exists, the defendant is released because plaintiffs have destroyed his rights to resort to the Ross-Lewin bond. Standing alone, the first question would not entitle the defendant to have Ross-Lewin made a party, because the mere question of the liability of Ross-Lewin to the defendant on his obligation would not affect or postpone plaintiffs' rights, but, when it is charged that Ross-Lewin has been released, his liability to defendant, as well as the question of his release, become vitally important in determining the liability of defendant to plaintiffs. Section 16 of our Civil Code provides: "The court may determine any controversies between the parties before it, when it can be done without prejudice to the rights of others, or by saving their rights; but when a complete determination of the controversies cannot be had without the presence of other parties the court shall order them to be brought in." By virtue of this provision, it has been decided that, where there are persons not parties whose rights must be ascertained and settled before the rights of the parties to the action can be determined, such persons must be made parties, upon proper application to that end being made. Pollard v. Lathrop, 12 Colo. 171, 20 Pac. 251; Bliss on Code Pleading, § 96; Pomeroy's Remedial Rights, § 418. Under this rule, it is manifest that Ross-Lewin was a proper party. If determined that he was liable originally, and that this liability continued because plaintiffs had not released him, then the defendant would not be released but the determination of these questions would not bind Ross-Lewin in his absence; so that, in determining the rights of plaintiffs and defendant as between each other, it was necessary, under the issues presented by the cross-complaint, to also settle and fix the rights of Ross-Lewin.

It is contended on behalf of plaintiffs and Ross-Lewin that the cross-complaint fails to state a cause of action, because, if it be true, as contended by defendant, that he has a right to resort to the Ross-Lewin obligation upon payment of the judgment, the release of Ross-Lewin by plaintiffs would not affect his rights. This contention is not tenable. Plaintiffs have the right to elect upon which obligation they will proceed to collect their judgment and they have the right to absolutely release Ross-Lewin from all obligation to them prior to defendant discharging his bond, but, if they do so, that, for reasons we have previously given, would prevent the defendant from holding him upon his bond, and this would operate to discharge the defendant from his obligation.

The judgment of the district court is reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings in harmony with the views expressed in this opinion.

Reversed and remanded.

SCOTT et al. v. SAN BERNARDINO VALLEY TRACTION CO. (L. A. 1,589.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 13, 1908. Rehearing Denied Feb. 10, 1908.)

1. STREET RAILROADS — COLLISION OF CAB WITH TEAM—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

Whether one who, on the busiest street in the city, at the busiest time, in driving across a street car track, had the hind wheel of his buggy struck by a street car going up a slight grade, at a speed of four miles an hour, without warning, and without attempt to stop it till it was within five or six feet of the buggy, was guilty of contributory negligence, is a question for the jury, though when he got into the buggy and started his horse the car, not seen by him, was standing at the crossing, with its front end 50 feet from where he must cross the track, and though, while he listened attentively, without hearing anything, he did not look beyond the side curtains of his buggy so as to see the car till his horse was across the track.

[Ed. Note.—For cases in point, see Cent. Dig. vol. 44, Street Railroads, §§ 235-257.]

2. SAME—NEGLIGENCE—INSTRUCTIONS.

Modifying the requested instruction of defendant, in an action for the collision of a street car with a buggy, that, if defendant's employes in charge of the car, as soon as they discovered the dangerous position of plaintiff, used ordinary care to prevent the collision, defendant would not be liable for any collision which might have been prevented, if such employes had had other appliance than what they had for preventing a collision, by adding the words, "unless a mere running of the car without having it provided with such additional appliances, if they were any, would in itself have amounted to wanton and reckless conduct on the part of defendant," was not error.

3. TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—ERROR CURED BY OTHER INSTRUCTIONS.

Where the complaint alleged $14,000 damages for personal injuries, and $1,000 for expenses in curing the same, and there was no evidence of expense, any error in instructing that the verdict should be "in such sum as damages, not exceeding the $15,000 asked for in the complaint," as may have been sustained by plaintiff on account of the collision, is harmless; the jury having otherwise been directed to estimate the damages from the facts and circumstances in evidence, that they should take into consideration all the facts and evidence before them, and that plaintiffs were entitled to such damages as the jury should find from the evidence, so that they must have understood they were unauthorized to give damages for expenses alleged, but not proven, and the verdict having been only for $1,500.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court. San Bernardino County; Benjamin F. Bledsoe, Judge.

Action by Jennie R. Scott and another against the San Bernardino Valley Traction Company. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

E. R. Annable, Goodcell & Leonard, and Byron Waters, for appellant. Prescott & Morris, for respondents.

SHAW, J. This is an action by husband and wife to recover damages sustained by the wife from personal injuries alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the defendant. Plaintiffs recovered, and the defendant appealed from the judgment within 60 days after its rendition. A bill of exceptions sets forth the evidence.

A street car operated by defendant collided with a buggy in which the plaintiffs were driving, whereby the plaintiff Jennie R. Scott was thrown out and injured. It is contended that the plaintiff George H. Scott was negligent in driving upon and across the track in front of the car, and that this negligence contributed to the injury. In considering this proposition, it is necessary always to bear in mind that the jury has found to the contrary. In this case it not only returned a general verdict to that effect, but, in answer to a specific question, it declared that George H. Scott did not negligently drive upon the track. If there was any substantial evidence in support of this fact, the verdict must stand, although the preponderance of the evidence may be against it. The question whether or not upon a given occasion the conduct of a person is negligent is always comparative and relative. The conduct must be compared to that of an assumed person of ordinary prudence, and must be considered with relation to all the circumstances attending the occasion which might reasonably be taken into consideration by a person of ordinary prudence in determining what his conduct should be. The circumstances to be considered are those which the evidence shows may reasonably be supposed to have been known to such person, and to have influenced his mind and actions at the time. These are not necessarily the circumstances which afterwards, in the light of the event, it can be seen should have been known to him, and should have influenced his conduct. Nor is his wisdom in determining what to do to be judged by the event. We must, as nearly as possible, put ourselves in his place; he being compelled to act without foreknowledge, and with only ordinary prudence and wisdom to guide him. In some particular cases of frequent occurrence it has been established by a long course of judicial decision that certain precautions are presumptively necessary to constitute due care, and that, if one of these precautions is omitted, negligence will be presumed as matter of law. For example, one who, in traveling a public road, crosses the track of an ordinary steam railroad, must, before going upon the track, look and listen for an approaching train, and must generally stop for that purpose. If it does not appear that he did these things, he will be considered guilty of negligence, unless he shows some extraordinary and unusual conditions which rendered it unnecessary. But in general negligence is a question of fact for the jury, and the law has fixed no exact standard of care other than the general one that it must be such as a reasonably prudent man would exercise in the particular circumstances. Hence in ordinary cases it is peculiarly a question for the jury or court trying the cause to decide as a matter of fact whether or not the person was culpably negligent. Judged by these rules, we think the verdict in this case is supported by sufficient evidence.

The collision occurred on Orange street, in the city of Redlands, at a point about 98 feet south of the south intersecting line of State street. Scott and his wife drove up Orange street from the north, and stopped in front of a store on the west side of that street at a point almost directly opposite where the collision took place, where, leaving the buggy and horse by the curb facing south, in care of his wife, Scott went into a hat store, one
